BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1813.

[WHOLE NO. 105.]

Hec olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

Printed and published by H. NILES, South-st. next door to the Merchants' Coffee House, at $ 5 per annum.

An Earnest Request.

On presenting the first number of the fifth volume of the WEEKLY REGISTER, the editor gratefully begs leave to offer his thanks for the past patronage of the work—and, for the purpose of accomplishing certain prospective arrangements of high importance to the future value thereof and his own happiness, he respectfully requests that all his friends may accommodate him by closing their several accounts up to the end of the present year, no. 156, in advance. This mark of their polite attention shall be duly acknowledged and thankfully requited by an increased attention to please, as the means are afforded.

Conditions of the Weekly Register.

It is published every Saturday at $5 per annum, (payable in advance) and makes two volumes a year, of between 4 and 500 pages each. It is packed with unparalleled care, and sent in safety to the most distant post-offices. Missing numbers are liberally supplied, without charge, to a reasonable demand.

The work began Sept. 7, 1811—the first number of the second vol. was published March 7, 1812—of the third, Sept. 5th—of the fourth, March 6, 1813—and first of the 5th vol. appears this day, herewith. Subscribers may commence with either of the volumes, which may be safely sent by the mails, and their delivery guaranteed by the editor, is except in some parts of the Mississippi Territory and Louisiana, by paying for the volumes required, with the current year's advance.

Additional patronage is respectfully invited.

Whys and Wherefores.

The editor has been sometimes reprehended (as he believes in friendship) for certain parts of his conduct in managing the REGISTER. It may be well, on an occasion so apt to the subject, to give a few of the whys and wherefores that have guided him—not with a belief that his reasons shall prove satisfactory to all; but under a hope that they may be useful to many.

FIRST. Of the WEEKLY REGISTER as a book of reference

Some would have this work to be a mere record of facts and papers; while others desire it active, zealous and original. To satisfy the former, we have never refused the insertion of a document or fact, within the scope of our plan, through its political bearing or tendency, or vice versa; but almost every thing important to be preserved, has been recorded; whether it regarded the general government, or the individual states. And the papers so furnished, could not be purchased in their usual form, for three times the amount of the subscription we claim; nay, their very binding would cost more than our work ready bound. This was the primary object of the REGISTER, and the editor feels self-assured that he has not neglected it. The pressure of those matters has generally prevented the free operation of the will to furnish articles from manuscript; though we have embraced many opportunities to speculate on passing events, &c. Here are two interests, opposite in their natures, that must be consulted. It is essential, that the REGISTER should partake of the durability of a magazine with the spirit of a newspaper, to hold a future and excite a present value.—The path is narrow and difficult; and sometimes we may aberrate from it. Our errors, we trust, are on the side of our country in its struggles for sovereignty—and, we think, if the matter be carefully examined, that no sentiment can be found in the work, against which a republican American will sustain an exception, further than he may question the policy of the war.

It will appear strange to a vast majority of our readers, that the editor should have been condemned as a "Jacobin" for his opposition to royalty; or that his endeavors to expose the rapacious hypocrisy and consummate villainy of church establishments, have made him suspected of atheism or deism. These comical notions may have arisen, perhaps, from supposing I had reference to England alone; but such conclusions are not warranted by the facts, and must be drawn from causes operating on the minds of individuals, essentially different from the principles we would establish. It is true, we have more frequently alluded to the despotism and churchism [to coin a little word that suits our purpose] of England than of France; as well because we are much better acquainted with her institutions, as on account of this—that no man considers Bonaparte but as a tyrant, or looks up to his church as the "bulwark of the religion we profess." Yet, honestly, the spirit of the two governments, in their political and clerical affairs, is precisely the same; and I detest the whole breed. All the charities of my heart are lost in the enormity of their crimes; and I would not turn on my heel to save either pack from instant annihilation, speaking of them in their official capacities. Generated in rapine and sustained by fraud. I truly believe them to be the chosen curses with which "Old Satan" would afflict mankind. Good and evil are not more opposite in their natures, than the genius of our institutions and the principle of monarchy and priestcraft. Thus I humbly presume, every American is constitutionally bound to esteem them: not so. I have, therefore, felt it my duty to use the feeble means I possess, to excite a "holy hatred" of these things, to laugh to scorn the "legitimacy" of princes, and provoke a national and American feeling, counteracting the power of prejudice, and the deleterious effects and dangerous influence that arises from the vile books unthinkingly put in to the hands of the youth, chiefly of English compilation, and made up of foreign ideas.*

* My opinion of kings may be gathered from the following little anecdote. Some time ago, one of my sons then about 7 years old, curiously said "Papa, what sort of things are kings?" Willing to hear his ideas, instead of answering the question, I asked him, what he thought they were? He replied "I did not exactly know; but he thought they were some kind of rogues." It is needless to say that I was delighted. Submon, himself, could not have given a judgment more congenial to my notions of a king.

Let nothing here said, be construed into a reproach of those who teach or profess the tenets of established churches; so far as they relate to spiritual things, or themselves as individuals, whether Catholic, Lutheran or Calvinist—I disavow every intent and meaning of the kind; yet am not without a belief that some may charitably impute it to me, judging of the future by the past. It is the system as connected with the state, that I consider so fatal to true religion and happiness. "The tree is known by its fruit"—look at the people of the U. States, and compare their morality and orderly lives, with those of the same classes of society in the best parts of Europe. Besides, in this opposition and reprehension I am sustained by the fathers of our country, who framed the constitution of the U. States, as well as by the constitutions of all the states; for all solemnly protest against every thing like established religions.

But—may be asked—why so great hostility to these things? If foreign nations are pleased to have kings and kingly priests, what is it to us? how is it your business? I answer—"let every man for nation manage his own affairs in his own way," this is my creed, political and religious—but let him not interfere with the concerns of others; if he does, the faults of his system must stand exposed as a beacon for the unwary. There is much of the spirit of royalty in the people of the United States; it is a foreign feeling, and must be attacked by referring to its effects in foreign places. I know a district of country where it was no uncommon thing, some few years ago, to "Hoza for king George!" and if a man will carefully examine the newspapers, he will find that authority frequently acknowledged; being spoken of as "his majesty," without the national qualification that it becomes us to give him, esteeming him a foreigner. This subject might be exceedingly enlarged, and its points sustained by hosts of facts. But we fear to become tedious, and dismiss it.

TATION. Of Foreign Influence.

As, from the wonderful workings of party, it seems almost impossible to touch this subject without being regarded a party-man—let us dispassionately consider it, and see if we cannot find out the root of the evil, by simple deductions to be drawn from the common operations of our own minds.

I do know there is a mighty and powerful "British influence," prevailing in the United States. I myself am oftentimes under it, in spite of reason and philosophy. I confess the weakness. If every man descended from English ancestors, (as I myself am,) will examine himself, and be equally candid, I think he will make a similar acknowledgment. The next generation may be free of this incumbrance: all we can do is to keep it within reasonable bounds; and teach our children differently. On several occasions the great causes of this influence have been noticed. See particulars, pages 99, 128 of Vol. IV. "On Foreigners." But the present object is to shew the effects of our British prejudices in a plain and simple manner, that every man may see for himself. I speak of and to those, (the bulk of the people of the United States) whose ancestors were English.

There is no fact better known to us than that the population of our country is made up of the descendants of many nations—chiefly of English, Irish, and French; and that many Englishmen, Irishmen and Frenchmen fought the battles of independence. The names of those people are as various as their places of nativity, and each have some national characteristic. Let me ask the English descendant, if he ever sees a Mac, an O or a B prefixed to a surname, without mentally enquiring if the person is not an Irishman or a Frenchman? If he were called White, Black, Brown or Green—Dick's-son, Tom's-son, Jack's-son, or Nell's-son—a Carpenter, a Smith, a Shoemaker, or a Waggoner—Miles, Viles or Stiles, or any other good English name, we should not question his citizenship, or so suppose him a foreigner. What would a delicate young lady, of this class, think of a matrimonial connection with Mr. Terrence O'Flagherly?—Why, the very name would frighten her into fits!—and yet Mr. O'Flagherly may as well be an amiable and a good man as Mr. "Cruikshank, Sheeshanks or Shufflebottom"—Mr. Guelph, Mr. Goodbehear, or any other of those abovementioned. "What's in a name?"

* The Mac, properly belongs to the Scot—but a vast majority of those who have the prefixure in the U. States, are Irish.

"A rose by any other name would smell as sweet," and the Mac, the O and the B, have exactly the same meaning as the word "son" attached to the English names of Dick, Tom, &c. But, here is the mystery—by tradition, books and conversation (all English) we at once apprehend that Mr. O'Flagherly must needs be a "wild Irishman," barbarous and uncivilized; fit to cut throats and dash out little children's brains;—if he has the B—we put him down for a "French dancing master," or, at least, consider him "an outlandish sort of a fellow." ALEXANDER COCKBURN, or GEORGE TECUMSEH, would do much better. There is no childish prejudice to operate against them. However infamous the present possessors of those names be,—if others had them, who would attach arson or murder to them on that account? Herein we see the dark policy of the British government, that artfully and imperceptibly forces its way into the very joints and marrow of the youth, exciting a hatred of Irishmen and Frenchmen, as well as in monopolising to itself all the virtue and talents of the world.

It is thus, without reason, we are trammelled in a thousand other ways by "British influence"—it works itself all the circumstances of life. I will mention another familiar case: It is perfectly notorious that the outrages and oppressions of the "Church of England" drove the great body of our forefathers from their native land to this then savage country. Every body knows this. Yet in many parts of the United States, and remarkably so in such as are pre-eminently conspicuous for being peopled by those who were truly "kicked" out of England for conscience sake, how does the blood recoil when a Roman Catholic is mentioned! What evil hath he done to us? Why attach terror to his religion, and call that the "bulwark" which drove us from the land of our forefathers, through its vile persecutions? Are not the Catholics men like ourselves; and in Holland, and some other states, among the very best of our citizens? It comes from the incessant English cry of "church and state" and "no popery;" set in motion by rosy gilded priests and prostituted statesmen, to keep the machine of monarchy a-going. It is banded from father to son, and dished up in many new shapes to stead into the mind—with the common view of sustaining—the bench of bishops, and the king (poor silly, mad George!) as the head of the church!

As it regards France, the million of prejudice is decidedly against her; and hence the clamor of "French influence." I call it a clamor, for it appears to me a natural impossibility that it can really exist, though many honest men, led by the prejudices hinted at, may honestly believe that it does. To what possible rational cause can such an influence be attributed? We have nothing French in our language, manners or habits—from the garret to the cellars of our houses, all things are of the English fashion. Very few French books are read, and none of them are used in our schools. Where is the avenue by which a "French influence" can reach us? Through blood connections—through trade, or the sociabilities of private life?—Impossible. The Frenchman is always a "foreigner;" he constantly feels himself to be so, and rarely, very rarely, mingles in society. If LA FAYETTE, the illustrious, had remained in the United States from the period of the revolution to the present day, would he not yet have been known and regarded as a Frenchman? Let every man examine and answer for himself. The affirmative is demonstrated by the actual condition of those Frenchmen who fought for American freedom, and remained with us to enjoy the blessings they helped to win—they still are Frenchmen; we know them to be so, and are increasingly jealous of them. Thus it was even in the times of the revolution, when they fought by our sides, and made a common cause with us. No possible thing they could do, was able to eradicate the effect of that English education which taught us to regard them as "natural enemies." The arch traitor, BENJAMIN ARNOLD, well knew the force of this prejudice; and excused his own "British influence," by charging the old congress and the commander in chief, the immortal WASHINGTON, with being under the influence of France—But we have enough on this. The people of America unanimously agree that Bonaparte is a tyrant—a rapacious being that "feels power and forgets right." O, that we could think all kings to be so!—for such, in truth, they really are. Earth does not hold a viler family of beings than that of the Guelphs; nor is there a government more prodigal of blood than that of England. The excesses of the French revolution were children's play compared with her ravages in India—and behold her now in America, holding a market for scalps!

FOURTH. On the union of the states.

Here is, indeed, a fruitful subject for animadversion and remark. If we have not said much upon it, it was because, in obedience to the precepts of the FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY, I would not lightly speak of it; or have it supposed a dissolution were practicable. Nor do I apprehend that it is. Yet those who urge it (and I must believe they are paid for it, the project being the great favorite of the enemy) should be reprehended. The Boston folks take the lead in this bug-bear; and certainly have somewhat loosened the "bonds that made us one people;" by a system of falsehood and perversion of fact, unprecedented. So outrageous have been the proceedings of certain "head men," that many are ready to say, "let them go." This is almost as bad as the other. It will be no difficult matter to shew, that the "shipping interest" of Massachusetts of which we have heard so much, owed its rise and prosperity entirely to the products of other states; and that, without their commodities, she cannot employ, on any terms, one fourth of her tonnage; and that her population could not be sustained, in the event contemplated. In 1750, Massachusetts proper (for Maine was then a wilderness) had 220,000 inhabitants—and all the rest of the colonies did not contain 800,000 more. On this, some curious statistical remarks present themselves, and we shall sit the subject to the bottom ere long, whether as it regards taxation, population and representation, or the future prospects of the several states. I sincerely hope the "Saturn-like violence of an ambitious few may not hasten the decline of Massachusetts in the scale of the union. She can expect nothing more than her population gives her; and thousands are leaving her every month. Herein, perhaps, is the cause of that frenzy which continually furnishes new matter to feed its own folly. It may not be considered hazardous to say, that Ohio, "glorious Ohio," whose civil institutions and active patriotism are above all value, will have a greater representation in congress after the census of 1820, than Massachusetts (proper) if her leading characters pursue the wayward policy that now directs them. Never did men (through party and foreign influence) commit so gross a political blunder as they, in discountenancing the establishment of manufactories. Many thousands of their artists and mechanics, beholding the road to independence opened in other places through the liberality of the capitals invested, have abandoned their homes; and are to be found in every state, and in almost every town and county of the union, south and west of the Hudson. All these might have been retained; and a full population, by the more easy distribution of labor, would have enabled them to furnish us with goods on better terms than we ourselves could have made them; nay, perhaps, have rendered unnecessary some hundreds of the establishments that spring up, as by magic, in the middle and western states. There is yet time to do much in that way—the persevering industry and ingenuity of this people, is happily fitted to establish and sustain the great sources of wealth that flow from manufactories.

But the subject is too copious for the room at present afforded. We shall embrace some early opportunity of appealing to the reason of the people; not because we believe they are disaffected to the union, (for we do not apprehend any such thing) but with the view of collecting and arranging some facts, by which they may expose the British, anti-union demagogues, and rouse themselves to the exertion that becomes them, as men and republicans, to put down by the force of their sentiment, that outcry which disgraces their country, and cherishes the hopes of its barbarian foe.

FIFTH. Of the war.

This article has extended to so great a length, that I must refer my readers, generally, to the essays and facts inserted in the preceding volumes of the Register for "whys and wherefores" of the support that I give to it. I will only add, and I verily believe this—that there is no man of respectable political standing in the United States, (I care not of what "party,") that would put his hand to paper, and acknowledge as rights, the pretensions of the enemy, about which we contend. A resistance of those pretensions might have been delayed yet longer; but the "trumpet is passed," and they must be exploded or sanctioned. If this opinion, as to the universality of sentiment in favor of our claims, be correct, and it assuredly is,† what is to be done, but by supporting the war to finish it speedily? Then, if the people please, let them condemn the administration for commencing it improperly or prematurely—but until then, though like man and wife we may differ, let us cease the quarrel of ourselves, and unitedly fall upon the adversary of both. Had this spirit of union existed some years ago, the war would not have been. As it is, may we profit from folly, and

† For example—ask any one, "Shall American ships be searched for men? Will you agree to acknowledge this as the right of Great Britain?" Let there be no twisting or quinking; but have the plain naked principle settled, yea or nay, as it now must be by treaty, come peace when it will.

* Saturn, in fabulous history, is said to have devoured his own children.

end it as becomes a high spirited and free people. Our love of peace is known to all the world—the principle of our government is founded upon it—may the world also see and be convinced, that the republican system can avenge and sustain itself against the inroads of kings, on the rights of humanity.

SIXTH. Of our manner of making up the Events of the War.

This is, in truth, the most difficult and laborious part of our work. It requires more reading, care and attention than any one can conceive, who has not witnessed the toil bestowed on it—that nothing worthy of record and reference, or as news, may be omitted, and that if possible, “the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth,” may be told. The official papers are easily arranged; but to examine the clouds of unofficial reports and statements, to revise and digest the mighty whole, and put it into regular form, is no easy business! The editor is aware that it is the insertion of the thousands of little incidents occurring, beneath the dignity of official communications, that gives a zest to the domestic history of a country—and, though some may think, at the moment of receiving them, that certain articles might well be left out, it is believed they will generally have a different opinion of them a little time hence. Such, at least, it is our hope and design that they shall.

We have yet some heavy articles before us to complete the original prospects of the REGISTER. One of them, the insertion of the constitutions of the United States and of the several states, has been effected. The others of a permanent nature, are only postponed; and shall liberally appear as we get forward.

In vol. IV, page 26, we confessed our surprize at the impudence of this Englishman in exercising his consular functions after the declaration of war.—From the following law report, copied from the Boston Patriot, it appears he has been “brought into court.”

On Saturday last, (Aug. 21) before the hon. judge Davis, Andrew Allen, Esq. late the British consul resident at Boston, was examined on a complaint, in behalf of the United States, for receiving and obtaining, while resident in the United States, from an officer of the British government, a license for vessels to transport merchandise to, and to trade with the enemy’s ports. The complaint being founded on a section of the statute of the United States, passed on the 6th of July, 1812; which for the information and caution of the citizens, we will extract.

“Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That every person being a citizen of the United States, or residing therein, who shall receive, accept, or obtain a license from the government of Great Britain, or any officer thereof, for leave to carry any merchandise, or send any vessel into any port or place within the dominions of Great Britain, or to trade with any such port or place, shall on conviction for every such offence, forfeit a sum equal to twice the value of any such ship, merchandise, or articles of trade, and shall moreover be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be liable to be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months, and to be fined not exceeding one thousand dollars.”

Mr. Allen pleaded not guilty. The evidence appeared to be a license found on board the ship “Imvora,” which was lately captured on her way to the West Indies, and sent into Newport, by the American privateer “Gen. Tompkins,” and there libelled and condemned to the captors, in both the district and circuit courts; which license was authenticated by the hand writing of Allen, his name appearing on several papers which accompanied it, and by the old official seal of the late British consulate at Boston. The signatures of Allen being denied, were proved by Mr. Thomas H. Perkins, a witness in court. Among these papers was a certificate of Allen, dated October 1, 1812, authenticating a copy of a letter of general license to export flour and other dry provisions to British, Portuguese and Spanish ports, addressed to Allen by vice-admiral Sawyer, on the 5th of August, 1812, and which appeared to be in answer to a previous communication of Mr. Allen, of 18th July, pointing out to admiral Sawyer the “means of ensuring a constant supply of flour and other dry provisions to Spain, Portugal, and the West India Islands,” which method so devised by Allen, admiral Sawyer seems to have adopted in the license produced in this examination. The copy of Sawyer’s letter of license was as follows:

His Majesty’s ship Centurion, at Halifax, the 5th of August, 1812.

SIR—I have fully considered that part of your letter of the 18th ult. which relates to the means of ensuring a constant supply of flour and other dry provisions to Spain and Portugal, and to the West India Islands, and being aware of the importance of the subject, concur in the proposition you have made.

I shall therefore give directions to the commanders of his majesty’s squadron under my command, not to molest American vessels so laden, and unarméd, bona fide bound to British, Portuguese, or Spanish ports, whose papers shall be accompanied with a certified copy of this letter under the consular seal.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

(Signed) H. SAWYER, Vice-Admiral.

ANDREW ALLEN, Esq. British Consul, Boston.

It was ingeniously argued at great length, in defence of the respondent, that he was not the obtainer nor receiver, but the fabricator and maker of this license, and therefore his offence, if one, could not come within the statute. In reply, was an able argument on behalf of the government, pointing out the general mischief and abuses which the statute was intended to remedy, and shewing that the offence of Mr. ALLEN of obtaining a license, was completed so soon as he had received, on his own request and solicitation, the letter of admiral SAWYER; which was a general license to export in American vessels to ports of the enemy, flour and other dry provisions, and to be used on board of such vessel or vessels as the obtainer and receiver, Mr. Allen, might think proper, which came clearly within the letter and meaning of the statute, and it was not necessary to constitute a license that any particular vessel should be named. Had Mr. A. destroyed or suppressed this license, thus obtained from admiral Sawyer, without making any use of it, the offence would have remained the same, and equally within the statute.

The hon. judge, at some length drew a distinction between his duty as an examining officer, and as judge presiding at a final trial, and then ordered Andrew Allen to recognise for his appearance at the next circuit court.

Counsel for the government, George Blake and J. E. Smith, esqrs.—for the respondent, H. G. Otis and Wm. Sullivan, esquires.

“Once English always English.”

To gentlemen of the Bar—

A letter from one of the most distinguished legal characters in the United States to the editor of the Weekly Register, has the following paragraph:

"I intended to have sent you the case of the Parsons, of Baltimore, (which occurred soon after the British treaty) who had been naturalized in this country, but who were held to be British subjects, trading with an enemy, in order to condemn the property—and also to have furnished you with a striking contrast in the case of an American citizen who had resided a short time at Cinnacoa, that they [the British] made a Dutchman, that his property might also be condemned. But I have lost a bundle of newspapers containing "Admiralty Decisions," and among them the paper in which a report of this last case was published. I cannot recollect in what paper, or at what time it issued, but I think it must have been since 1802. I well remember the remarkable expressions of Sir WILLIAM SCOTT, who observed, "IT HAD BEEN CONTESTED, IN THE PROUD LANGUAGE OF ROME, THAT ONCE AN AMERICAN CITIZEN ALWAYS AN AMERICAN CITIZEN, BUT SUCH A POSITION WAS NOT WARRANTED BY THE LAWS OF NATIONS," &c. In Robinson's report of a case I take to be the same, he omits these expressions."

Can any gentleman furnish a copy of the report of the important case last mentioned, that it may be Registered? Such an opinion was certainly given by the learned judge, and it ought not to be lost.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Chesapeake and Shannon.—It is a glorious fact, for which we have the unanimous testimony of the enemy, that our naval heroes finished their fame, by the humanity they observed to the conquered. See the various enemy statements. The most minute article of individual property was respected, and Lawrence and his crew immortalized themselves by clothing the people of the Proveset, and liberally administering to all their wants. The brutality of the British, after the capture of the Chesapeake, has been constantly stated—were the facts different from the reports given to the world, they would have been denied; for we have thousands that "leave no stone unturned" to exhibit the enemy as models of perfection—"the shield of afflicted humanity, and bulwark of religion." But the verity of these things have not been impeached; and we accept them as incontrovertible truths. We shall not notice this outrageous matter again, except in extenuation, if the "well inclined" shall furnish a statement; but invite our readers to the following from the New-Jersey "Fredonia."

"Our readers will recollect an account we some time since published from a Salena paper, concerning the execrable and horrid treatment experienced by the surviving officers and crew of the unfortunate frigate Chesapeake, after her surrender to the British frigate Shannon. We had the pleasure a few days since of conversing with one of the officers of the Chesapeake, who shared the insults and sufferings on that memorable occasion. We were particular in our enquiries, and received a full and complete confirmation of what has already been published, with the addition of some facts which we do not recollect to have seen noticed.

This gallant and unfortunate officer stated, that after the surrender of the Chesapeake the British officers and men indulged in the most horrid and barbarous excesses—no quarter was for some time given—himself was wounded in three several places, dragged from the top and precipitated to the deck where he lay for some time senseless, weltering in his gore. His trunk was broken open and all his clothes and upwards of $100 in cash taken out.—After their arrival at Halifax and in attending the funeral rites of their late gallant commander, he was reduced to the humiliating and degrading necessity of wearing the same clothes he wore in the engagement and had worn ever since, literally stiff with blood!—Capt. Lawrence, when momentarily expecting to breathe his last, requested that his private papers—HIS WIFE'S LETTERS! would be given up—this was refused. He also had some choice wine which he seemed inclined to taste, but with brutal feeling this was peremptorily refused.

Such are among the insults and sufferings experienced by as noble and brave officers as ever fought. We leave our readers to make their own comments."

Russian mediation.—The master of a Swedish vessel that has arrived at Newport, R. I. reports that the ship Neptune, with Messrs Gallatin and Bayard on board, had anchored in the Sound (the entrance of the Baltic) on the evening of the 21st. of June. This vessel brought despatches to our government from Mr. Adams, and also from the Russian government for Mr. Daschkoff.

Many persons, with views not easily reconcilable to their professions, appear sincerely to desire that the proposed mediation of Russia may fail. Among the million of things they have said about it, they have lately denied that Mr. Daschkoff was authorized to propose it. The question is at issue as follows:

A Boston paper says, "We are even prepared to prove that the offer of mediation was an unauthorized act on the part of Mr. Daschkoff."

The National Intelligencer rejoins, "We aver in the most peremptory manner that the assertion, which the Boston editor says he is prepared to prove is false; and we dare him to the proof.—Unless he produce it, he stands convicted of having said the thing that is not."

The Federal Gazette, of Baltimore, states, that "Admiral Warren had informed a gentleman who was lately on board of his ship, that the English government had declined accepting the offered mediation of the Emperor of Russia."

The allies.—Extract of a letter to a gentleman of Pittsburg, dated Fort Meigs, Aug. 9: "In consequence of the communication being cut off, I had not an opportunity of writing you until now. The enemy found he could not do us any injury. The first day they made their appearance, the Indians killed five of the picket guard, and took four prisoners. The night before they left us, then had a war dance, and BURNED SOME OF THE PRISONERS—we do not know how many, as the bones were nearly burnt up. We are all well."

Baltimore, the "devoted city."—We are delighted to observe in the Richmond papers, the following honorable testimony in favor of Baltimore, from the commander of an invaluable body of patriots we are proud to esteem:

Extract of a letter from Capt. Booker, commander of the Richmond Washington Volunteers, to Thomas Ritchie, esq. dated Baltimore, Aug. 23:

"We have been much fatigued, though cheerful in the discharge of our duty, at Annapolis, from which place we marched on Friday last, and reached this place on Saturday evening: Never were soldiers more hospitably treated than our volunteers are by the citizens of Baltimore. Their treatment is such as to excite and deserve the acknowledgments of all the men. We are ordered to York, Penn. there to wait the orders of col. T. M. Randolph, who is now in Virginia, perhaps at Norfolk."

On Monday morning, the 29th of August, this company of elegant young men, took up their march for York. They were escorted through the city and some distance on the road, by the Baltimore Independent Blues and the Yagers, with their full band of music. The streets through which they passed were crowded by a people that knew how to respect them, and the windows were filled with sympathising beauty. They took with them the best wishes of Baltimore.

Two seamen, Thomas Dennis and William Power, of Baltimore county, sailed from Baltimore for Lisbon in Aug. 1812, in a licensed vessel. The ship was captured and sent into Bermuda, where she and her cargo were cleared—but the crew were sent to England as prisoners of war!!!—This is "British justice."

A full account of the solemn honors paid to the remains of Capt. Lawrence and Lieut. Ludlow, at Salem, has not yet reached us; and it would be doing injustice to the subject to give it partially: it is, therefore, postponed.

A Swedish vessel, that sailed from New-Haven for St. B. wholoomeys, was sent to Halifax, and there compelled to sell her cargo. As provisions are badly wanted in—Canada, she will probably return to take out a second load to—St. Bartholomews. This is a vile business; but it is nearly stopped from all the places where the articles desired are to be had in large quantities.

Mrs. Gen. Dearborn. A splendid public dinner was given to Gen. Dearborn, at Boston, on the 27th ult. Many distinguished citizens attended; among the Vice-President of the U. S. Gen. Cushing, &c. After dining, the following, among many other like patriotic, toasts were given:

The American Armies—The best negotiators for peace, are those who contend for the successful issue of the war.

The Navy of the U. States—It has inscribed in its letters of glory, the national sentiment of Free Trade and Sailors' Rights, which no American will consent to erase.

The memory of Washington—His sainted spirit beckons us to the same field, where he first unfurled the sacred banner of independence.

The War—May the God of battles crown it with success.

THE WAR—May its progress be as vigorous, as its objects are sacred.

THE WAR—Like that of the Revolution, may it serve to strengthen the principles of civil liberty, and add to the happiness and virtue of mankind.

Washington, Jefferson, Franklin and Barlow—In war, politics, philosophy, and literature, four goodly pillars in the great temple of our national character.

Pike, Cassin, Ludlow, and other gallant spirits, who have fallen in defence of their country's rights—Their characters will ever be in idly sacred remembrance.

Our respected fellow-citizen, George Cramwinshield, and his ten worthy associates, whose sympathies prompted them to remove the brave from a foreign land, to the sepulchre of their fathers.

VENTURES.

By Gen. Dearborn—May the state of Massachusetts support, in the present war, the high and dignified character her statesmen, and in a day, man, so honorably supported in the glorious contest for our independence—18 cheers.

By the vice-president of the U. States—May justice in Great Britain, moderation in France, and patriotism in the U. States, prevail over avarice, ambition, and party contention, and present Mars as a victim on the sacred altar of peace.

By the president of the day—Our respected fellow-citizen, Gen. Dearborn—The man who was so well and so deserved beloved by the officers and soldiers of the army lately under his command.

By the same—The vice-president of the U. States—A Cato in integrity, a Sidney in intrepidity.

DESERVERS. From the Baltimore Patriot.—We have received the following letter in the common and ordinary channel, affording no information as to its author. The enclosure alluded to was actually in the letter. This made the stewards of the writer's liberality, for the purposes he mentions, we have no other course to take than to give publicity to his letter:

"SIR—Being of opinion to encourage the troops employed against you to desert, is a justifiable and cheap mode of counteracting the public enemy, sanctioned by common usage, a moral and humane way of carrying on war, than burning villages, abusing helpless women, killing old men, or even shooting dead or iron balls into soldiers or sailors, by what is called regiments and arms, viz. men ranked up into rows.

"For these and other reasons that will suggest themselves to you, permit me to request you and all the editors in the U. States, not devoted to the enemy, to introduce into every paper you publish, as full information to men composing the land and sea forces the British have on our coast and frontier; giving them to know that on coming among us, they will be well treated, allowed to follow any business they please, and in any town or place in the U. States they think proper; that deserters will not be given up, nor considered prisoners of war; neither will they be asked to enter into the army or navy of the U. States.

"As these men, on their coming over to us, cannot be well furnished with clothes or money, and as it is a point of interest, as well as honor to the United States, that they should be comfortably provided for on their starting here, let us give the poor fellows a little help.

"For this, the enclosed one hundred dollar note is sent to you; with a request, that you pay to the ten soldiers or sailors, that first desert from the British in the Chesapeake, ten dollars each. Should you manage the business well, the donor may have another hundred forth coming, for the same purpose; and if each citizen that can spare some such sum, has it employed in the same way, it is probable we shall soon free our waters of their present troublesome visitors.

"This plan, it is presumed, will be approved of, and supported by the Quakers."

The public have now information of the object of our unknown correspondent; and we can only announce that we are ready to comply with the terms of the above offer.

To the editor of the Buffalo Gazette.

SIR—I enclose for publication, the subsequent letter of M. T. Simpson, esq. which scarcely needs a comment: such an instance of genuine patriotism is rarely to be found. Mr. S. had nothing to stake on the frontier, his residence is in the interior, and to avoid the imputation of sinister motive, in the praise worthy transaction, the public are informed that he is a "federalist." A SUBSCRIBER.

August 9, 1813.

Buffalo, July 27, 1813.

Captain HORATIO JONES,

SIR—In consideration of the gallant defence made by a party of your Indians, in the late attack of the British on Black Rock, I take leave to enclose you one hundred dollars, which I request you will order to be equally distributed among them, and which I hope they will unhesitatingly receive as a proof of the respect I entertain for their brave and efficient exertions, in dispersing the invading enemy. In haste, but very respectfully,

Your most obedient servant.

M. T. SIMPSON, of Penn.

P. S. On reconsideration, I request the above donation may be distributed in proportion to the hazard and exposure of the individual who led the party and showed the best example; to ascertain which I request you will authorise the nicest enquiry.

From an Alexandria paper, Sept. 1.

TORPEDOES.—It appears to be acknowledged on board Admiral Cockburn's ship that Mr. Mix's torpedo had marked near the Cat head, although it had in ways injured the line of battle ship Plantagenet; and that in the whole fleet there is plentiful abuse of the American government (who in fact gave no sort of patronage or encouragement to its perpetrator or inventor) although it was merely the effusion of an enterprising active young man in the naval service. They unfairly condemn it as a villainous, invidious, improper and cowardly means of warfare (for such are the terms they use in execration of it); never reflecting, that their ruling administration had paid Mr. Fulton a very handsome stipend for his invention after experiencing its full efficacy upon a designated vessel, and in presence of the lords of the admiralty with many naval characters assembled to view its effect from the Sand-Down Castle of the Cinque port near to Deal and the Downs. They also forgot lord Grey's recent statement in parliament as to the commuted payment as the then lord of the admiralty which he made Mr. Fulton upon it. (Vide his lordship's speech upon the naval enquiry question, as published in the London Morning Chronicle of May 15th, 1813.) Nor reflecting either that the British ministry has induced the trial of the effect from torpedoes upon the French flotilla at Bologne, a long time after Mr. Fulton's Sandown Castle experiment!"

From the N. Y. Columbian of August 31.

One of the torpedoes which was anchored at the Narrows on the 21st of last June, was taken up to be examined on Sunday; the powder was perfectly dry, and the lock in good order. This is an interesting proof that torpedoes can be preserved under water for months.

MILITARY.

The North-Western army will soon consist of at least 4,000 regulars and 3,000 Ohio and Kentucky volunteers.

The Delaware and Shawanoe Indians on this frontier have turned out about two hundred men who have marched to the relief of gen. Harrison. The Wyandots within our lines, the Senecas and Mingoos have also turned out their disposable force, about two hundred more. The whole intend to continue with the army during the campaign.

JNO. JOHNSTON, Indian Agent.

Piqua, August 3, 1813."

At Fort George, we learn, we have 6,000 effective men and 500 Indians. Deserters from the enemy come in almost daily; and agree in stating that the British are short of provisions: they also report their force in the neighborhood to be about 2,000 regulars, 5 or 600 militia, and 4 or 500 Indians.

Gen. Boyd's letter, inserted in page 418, last volume, should have been dated August 17, instead of "15." We have another account of the same affair, from a private source which states, that an ambuscade being formed near a camp of British Indians, on the Indians in front, and the regulars so placed as to cut off the retreat of the enemy—at day light the American Indians gave the war-whoop—the British Indians taking this for a friendly call, came forth, and were within half rifle shot before they discovered the stratagem. They were fallen upon on all sides, and made but little resistance. Seventy-five of them were killed on the spot, and 16 prisoners taken, as represented by gen. Boyd. The account further says "six scalps were brought in by our Indians; but this we understand was disapproved of by gen. Boyd?" Boyd says, on the contrary, (see the page above referred to) that they "committed no wanton cruelties on the dead;" and speaks of their humanity as being "conspicuous."

At Sackett's Harbor the number of troops is not stated; we presume it is not less than 6,000 men.

Major-general Wilkinson arrived at Sackett's Harbor on the 20th Aug. His presence has given great confidence to the troops. We believe the secretary of war is at or in the neighborhood of fort George.

From Lake Champlain. Our naval force on the lake sailed down towards the enemy's lines, about 12 days ago, and discovering that he had added 10 galleys to his force which gave him a decided superiority, they returned to Burlington; at which place there were then collected 5,000 regulars, under major-general Hampton—2,000 more were on their march and immediately expected from the eastern states, and several smaller bodies were pushing to that post from other quarters.

The Plattsburg paper confirms all the accounts we have published of the wanton barbarities of the enemy at that place, and adds considerably to the amount of depredations.

The Creeks.—The war party is reported to be 3000 strong—the peace party at 1000. The governor of Georgia has went on to the frontiers to prepare for the reception of the military force he had called out; which has marched under the command of brig. gen. Stewart.

A letter from Fort Stoddart, dated July 29, says "the post rider has been stopped and robbed of his mail, his horse shot under him, and his hat shot off." It appears that several other mails have been taken by the war Creeks. The civil war rages through the whole country.

An account from New Orleans of Aug. 2, says that 700 Indians had advanced to the settlements on Fish river; but 1000 regulars were in the neighborhood, and it was hoped, might meet them.

It is stated that the secretary of war will locate himself for a while at Sackett's Harbor—which gen. Wilkinson has probably left before this for Fort George. The time of busy action is evidently at hand, at every post—say Burlington, Sackett's Harbor, Fort George, and Fort Meigs. The flotillas are also ready on Champlain, Ontario, and Erie. And from the prudent and wise measures that appear to be adopted, we calculate on a series of splendid events.

Two hundred newly enlisted recruits were encamped at Winchester, Va. Aug. 21—500 arrived at New-York, on their way to the north, Aug. 26.

Many of the officers of the Ohio Militia, now in the service of the United States, have solicited gen. Meigs to take the command of them in person, to which also he has been earnestly invited by general Harrison.

"We understand, (says the National Intelligencer) that the president has conferred on major GEORGE CROGHAN, the Brevet rank of lieutenant-colonel in the army of the United States, to rank from the 2d of August 1813—a day which will ever be conspicuous in the biography of this youthful hero, while it affords a memorable proof of the gallantry and Spartan valor of the little band under his command in the fortress of Sandusky.

ATTACK ON SANDUSKY.

COLUMBUS, August 12.—In the last gazette, we stated that major Croghan, in consequence of his disobeying an order, to burn and evacuate fort Stephenson, had been succeeded in his command by col. Wells. After the arrival of major Croghan at headquarters, he gave to the commanding general such satisfactory evidence of his ability to maintain his post, that he was immediately sent back and resumed the command.

On the evening of the 1st inst. the British and Indians who had came up the Sandusky river from the bay, commenced from their boats a heavy cannonading upon the fort, and threw in a great number of shells from their bomb batteries. The enemy continued his operations without success until the evening of the 2d, when after throwing a great number of balls from a six pounder, at the north-west angle of the fort for the purpose of making a breach, a column under the command of lieutenant-colonel Short, advanced to the point on which the artillery had played, with the intention of storming, but the judicious management of major Croghan, foiled the enemy in his attempt. The ditch which surrounded the works was about eight feet wide and of equal depth—this the enemy had to enter before he could approach the pickets, (through the top of each of which a bayonet was driven in a horizontal direction). While in this situation, the 6 pounder which was masked in a block-house and placed so as to rake the ditch, and a ravine adjacent, poured upon the storming column a tremendous shower of musket balls, which did terrible execution, and so confounded the assailants, that Lt. Col. Short, who had previously ordered his men to scale the pickets, and "show the damned Yankee rascals no quarters," exhibited a white handkerchief as a signal of distress, evincing his disposition to have quarters shewn him, after he had proclaimed that the garrison should be massacred. It was, however, too late—the next discharge proved fatal—he fell—and Lieut. Gordon of the 49th regiment died by his side. This was near two hours before sun set. The fire from the block-house was now principally directed at the enemy who had taken refuge in the ravine—the slaughter there was immense, and gen. Proctor who commanded in person, ordered the allied enemy to retreat to their boats. The greater part of the night was occupied in carrying off the dead and wounded—from the number of trails discovered in the grass it is evident, that not less than fifty of the dead were dragged away. About thirty killed, including the two officers mentioned above, were left in the ditch and ravine, and thirty prisoners, eighteen severely wounded, were afterwards brought into the fort, which the general, in his hurry, left behind. It is a fact, worthy of observation, that not one Indian was found among the dead, although it is known that from three to four hundred were present, under the celebrated captain Elliot. The number of regulars was four hundred and ninety from the 49th regiment. Major Croghan had but one man killed, and seven slightly wounded. His whole force amounted to but 145 effectives.

Major Croghan, who has thus nobly defended, and gallantly defeated the choicest troops commanded by Proctor and Tecumseh, is a native of Kentucky. He is not more than 22 years of age!

BURLINGTON, August 20.—While the British were at Plattsburgh, Col. Murray, conversing with some gentlemen, accidentally drew from his pocket, with his handkerchief, a paper which lodged upon the ground. A bye stander observing it, stepped aside of the colonel, and to appearance accidentally dropped his handkerchief, which covered the paper, both were secured. This paper contains a plan of Plattsburgh and this town, the situation of this camp, all the bays upon this shore, recommends Shelburn bay, (a few miles south of Burlington) as the best for an army to land, gives all the roads leading from said bay to this village, &c. &c. We understand that on comparison of writing, one Joseph Ackley a citizen of Plattsburgh, had been charged with the crime; he for some time denied it, but finally has acknowledged the fact, and that he was to receive one hundred dollars for the plan. Fifty he had received, the remainder was due to him.

He was secured, and immediately sent to Albany.

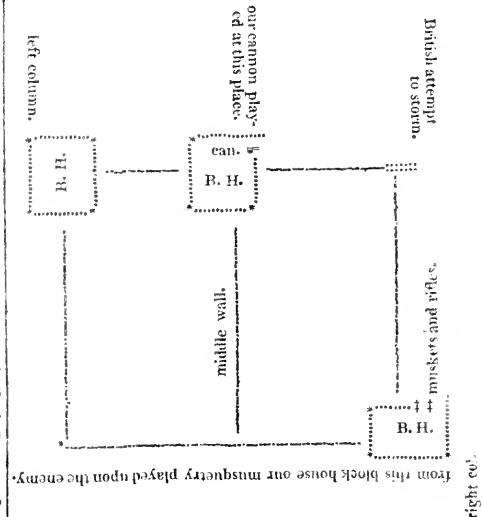

From the Pittsburg Mercury.

LOWER SANDUSKY, August 3, 1813.

Yesterday, sun about an hour and an half high, the British to the amount of about 500, with a large body of Indians, attempted to storm this post, aided with six field pieces, playing upon the N. W. corner. In order that you may form some idea of the place, mark the following.

The pickets 18 feet high, bayonets nailed to the sides of the tops with pieces of iron, with their points outwards, a ditch six feet deep and six wide, but not having enough of bayonets, about twenty-five feet of the east side was left destitute of them, as well as of a block-house in the S. E. corner.

The enemy were under the impression, that our piece of artillery, a six pounder, was in the block house, having discovered by the manœuvres of the enemy where they intended to storm.

In twenty-four hours, they had struck our works with upwards of 500 shot; 100 of them, shells, &c. came within the fort, and more than 300 balls struck the place where they attempted to storm, and made considerable havoc among the pickets.

The enemy's middle column came up 15 deep and 150 strong, commanded by Lieut. Col. Short, sustaining a heavy fire from our muskets; when they came up to the ditch, and saw what was before them, the soldiers stopped; but Short and a lieutenant drove them into the ditch, and followed in quick succession themselves. Col. Short was the first who endeavored to gain the summit of the picketed side; but failed and fell back into the ditch. At this moment, our piece of artillery was let loose about 35 yards from, and upon them. In this fire, Short received a small slug in his body. The terror which took place in consequence of the execution done, together with his own critical and perilous situation, caused him to hoist a white handkerchief on the end of his sword, and cry for quarters; but being enveloped in smoke and dust, our engineers did not see his flag. A second fire carried it away, and drove through his body several slugs, of one and a fourth inch square, and one through his mouth. The enemy gave way in every direction, and left dead, dying and wounded in the ditch 52, including their two officers.

Previous to the attempt to carry the post by storm, Colonel Elliott came with a flag, and demanded the surrender of the fort. Ensign Shipp went to meet him; an Indian came up and made an attempt to take off his coat. He drew his sword and made him stand off, and informed Elliott and Dixon that major Croghan and those under him were determined not to capitulate to a combined British and Indian force. Says Elliott you are a fine young man, but I am sorry for you; our Indians are so numerous, col. Proctor says he will not be able to restrain them in case of obstinacy, and now is the only time mercy can be expected. The insult offered to ensign Shipp attracted the attention of Croghan, who mounted the pickets and hallowed out, what does that mean? Shipp, come in, and we'll blow them all to hell. Shipp retired, bidding Elliott and Dixon good-bye. At this time the Indians and engineers had advanced within forty steps of the pickets. Croghan ran to the other side and ordered his men to fire, which they did, and killed a lieutenant and some Indians. The contest lasted till sun-set, and with small arms till an hour after dark, and scattering shots till midnight, during which time our people supplied the wounded in the ditch with water, by throwing full canteens over the pickets. They got in all the wounded by 1 o'clock in the morning. From the marks of blood, &c. there could not be less than 200 killed and wounded.

They left 70 muskets, 2000 cartridges, 100 rounds of fixed ammunition, a boat with a considerable number of blankets and clothing, three kegs powder, and a quantity of cannon ball.

CAMP, SENECA, August 5, 1813.

I came up last evening, four of the British are dead and dying last night. Amongst the prisoners here, are a sergeant and corporal who stood guard over me in Canada last winter, and I dressed the wounds of a soldier who took me by the throat.—They appeared glad to see me, and I know that I was glad to see them here.

Major Croghan not having a disposable force, the enemy were enabled to take away most of their killed and wounded (after dark) to their boats. It does appear that the enemy were confident of success, as they came up col. Short was whistling, and the lieutenant swearing. It also seems that they did not intend to be merciful; as the colonel was heard to say, "press on boys, no quarters."

From the National Intelligencer.

"We are sorry to perceive that all the accounts hitherto received, concur in representing the conduct of the British on this occasion, as affording ample proof of the characteristic barbarity and the sanguinary disposition of that nation, which has been called by men professing themselves to be Americans, the "bulwark of our religion," and the "shield of oppress'd humanity." From sources entitled to credit, we learn that when col. Elliott demanded the surrender of the fort, he stated that, unless his demand was promptly acceded to, a general massacre would ensue. And when col. Short, who commanded the British regulars destined to storm the fort, had formed his troops in a line parallel with the ditch, he ordered them, in the hearing of our men, to leap the ditch, cut down the pickets and give the Americans no quarter. This barbarous order, which none but a savage could give, was not, however permitted to go unpunished; for the words were hardly out of the mouth of the British commander, when the retributive justice of Providence arrested him; and the wretch was obliged to sue for that mercy which he had determined not to extend to others. It may be observed here, in honor of the character of the American soldier, that though our little band were well aware of the fate which the enemy had prepared for them: yet, they were no sooner subdued, than the Americans forgot their crimes in their sufferings; and the wounded in the ditch, whose groans and constant calls for water were heard by our men in the fort, were supplied with that necessary article, on the night succeeding the discomfiture of the enemy by the generosity of the Americans, who, with considerable hazard, ventured to risk their lives in order to alleviate the sufferings of the very men who had plotted their entire destruction."

It may be well still further to impress on the mind, the sublimity of those generous deeds, by stating the fact: that the fire upon the fort was yet occasionally kept up; and that the garrison could not possibly discover, in the night, the real condition of the enemy. Let the "shield of humanity" emulate this example, and furnish us with one instance of like hazardous magnanimity, to ameliorate her barbarous conduct. Compare this with the privations suffered by our gallant seamen; and call to memory the starvations on board the Jersey prison ship. [E. D. RES.]

Copy of a letter from brig. gen. Boyd to the secretary of war, dated

HEAD-QUARTERS, FORT GEORGE, August 14.

SIR—I have the honor to report, that at day break this morning, the enemy attacked us at all our pickets, which retired towards the camp, pursued by his advance guards. A skirmish ensued in the village, with little effect upon us; after which he retreated, having come within reach of our cannon, but never within musket shot of our entrenchments. One captain of the 49th and a few privates have been brought in prisoners. We lost two men and a few wounded; the enemy left about 15 dead on different grounds. He is supposed to have brought his whole force into the field; but finding our position so strong desisted from a general attack. Sir George Prevost was in person at the attack. His force is withdrawn out of our reach into his strong holds.

I have the honor to be, sir, your respectful obedient servant,

JOHN P. BOYD, B. G. C.

Copy of a letter from col. William Russell to governor Thomas Posey, dated Vincennes, July 25, 1813.

SIR—I have completed my intended scout, and reached every point of destination, and arrived at this place in four weeks. On our route we had much rainy weather and consequently high waters, which destroyed much of our provisions, and made the route much more disagreeable than otherwise it would have been.—The route from this place until we returned amounts to upwards of 500 miles, the greater part of which is certainly equal (if not superior) to any tracts of country upon the western waters; all of which lies in your territory. We proceeded from Vallonia to the Delaware towns, from thence to the Mississinawa towns, there we found four or five distinct villages; one pretty strongly fortified, adjoining which a very considerable encampment of Indians had been kept up, all of which we destroyed. We supposed the Indians had evacuated those towns very early in the spring.—From thence we proceeded down the Wabash to Eel river town, from thence to Winemack village, from thence to the Prophet's town, from thence we re-crossed the Wabash, and took the Winbago town in our route to Fort Harrison. We went to every place where we could expect to fall in with the enemy (that our situation would justify) as our provisions were then very short and our horses much fatigued.

I had a part of six companies of rangers and a few volunteers from the territory, and was joined by one hundred volunteers of Kentucky—when I found our force was 573 effective men. The army marched in five distinct columns, with instructions how the front the rear and the flanks were to act in case of an attack on either. The right flank was commanded by general Cox of the Kentucky volunteers; the extreme left was commanded by col. Evans, of the Indiana territory; the other column on the right was commanded by general Thomas of the Kentucky volunteers, the other column on the left was commanded by col. Wilson of this territory, and the centre by maj. Z. Taylor of the U. S. army; all those officers discovered so much zeal for the success of the expedition, as convinced me they would have done themselves credit had we encountered the enemy.—Col. Bartholomew acted as my aid-de-camp; this veteran has been so well tried in this kind of warfare, that any encumbrances from me would be useless—major J. Allen from Kentucky, acted as quartermaster, Mr. Hancock Taylor, as quartermaster sergt. maj. Harden acted as adjutant, and Homer Johnson of the rangers as his assistant. All those gentlemen acted with such promptitude as gave me but little trouble, and that only to check their zeal on certain occasions—gen. Clever of Kentucky, commanded the advanced party, and acquitted himself much to my satisfaction—I find also in the Kentucky corps several professional and other characters of high standing—which are deserving of their country; from the zeal of the officers and privates I entertain great hopes that they will render considerable service to their country. The volunteers from the territory were principally men of experience in Indian warfare, consequently capable of rendering service.

Messrs. Barron and Laptant, your Indian interpreters, accompanied us as guides, assisted by licut. Caselle, who were always on the alert, and discharged the duties assigned them with great promptitude.

Such was the disposition of the army, and happy should I have been, could they have had an opportunity of realizing the high expectations I entertained of them.

I have the honor to be, with high respect, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM RUSSEL.

P. S. Col. Bartholomew and lieutenant Shields (of captain Peyton's company of rangers) volunteered and crossed through the country from below the Prophet's town to the Ohio, in two places; from this you will discover, that the country has been completely chequered in all directions—and strange to tell, saw no fresh sign of Indians.

Extract of a letter from col. William Russel of the 7th regiment U. S. army to gov. Posey, dated Vincennes, August 4, 1813.

On my return from the Mississinawa, I found the Indians had got in small parties on this side of the Wabasha, between this place and the mouth of White river. Those two rivers for some distance up, are skirted with profligious swamps and brush, which afforded them a complete shelter, I despatched rangers in different directions in order to drive them out, the citizens also assembled and assisted to chequer the country—some of the Indians had got possession of some horses and were making off.—They were pursued by capt. Dubois, and a party of men, who overtook them and recovered three horses, but did not get sight of an Indian—captain John Andre of the rangers volunteered his services to follow them, he went on with 16 or 18 rangers. He was also joined by captain Dubois, and Mr. Barron your interpreter, together with a Potawatomy Indian that resides with Mr. Barron; they soon discovered a trail of horses making out from the settlement, which they pursued, and soon overtook a spy that was kept in the rear; they pushed on and dispatched him, which gave notice to those in front who left their horses and fled with great precipitation—and from the nature of the country could not be followed; they got from this party also 5 horses; the party returned on the 2d inst. Capt Dubois and Mr. Barron are active men; captain Andre is also a very brave active and enterprising man. I hope this friendly Indian will in future prove serviceable, as I am told nothing can exceed his activity in the woods particularly on a trail.

CAMP MEIGS, August 4, 1813.

General orders. Col. Mills, with a portion of his command, as also that of major Pitzer, having honorably served out the period for which they were called into the service of their country; are hereby discharged and permitted to return to their respective homes. Events not within the control of the present commander in chief of this army, or of our government, has rendered it necessary that the militia of the western states should compose a considerable portion of the north western army. OHIO stands conspicuous for the great zeal and promptness with which her citizens have yielded the comforts of private life, for the toils and privations of the camp. In the return of the present detachment of Ohio troops to their families and homes; it is due to Ohio and her sons, to record their honorable services.

To col. Mills, and major Pitzer, their staff and respective commissioned and non-commissioned officers and privates, whose term of service has expired, and to whose promptness in discharge of every duty he has been an eye witness—the commanding general tenders his sincere thanks.

In their return to domestic life they will be cheered by the reflection that they have toiled in a good cause—the cause of our country.—Nor will that country be unmindful of those who have been foremost to avenge her wrongs.

By order of G. Clay, com. gen.
J. H. HAWKINS, Aid de camp,

Head-quarters, Camp Ohio Freeman, U. Sandusky,

August 10, 1813

His excellency the commander in chief, acknowledges with satisfaction, the ready zeal of the different corps, who have with so much spirit and alacrity marched to the frontiers on the present emergency, to repel an invading enemy.

The siege at fort Meigs is abandoned: The allied enemy have again retired. They had the audacity to attack our post at Lower Sandusky, and vainly attempted to carry it by storm. The garrison with unusual gallantry have relieved themselves. The enemy have learnt wisdom from their presumption and will not meet our armies equal in the field.

The invasion which hastened the march of the troops to the frontiers, having terminated in a total defeat, the commander in chief will retain a portion under his immediate command, subject to any future emergency, and improves the first opportunity to dismiss a number of the different corps now in service.

On this, as on all other occasions, they have exceeded his expectations, and entitled themselves to the honor and gratitude of their country.

For their patriotic ardor, obedience to orders, and continued manifestations of respect, he returns his sincere thanks. He further assures them that they will not be called, but to protect their own frontiers, and to aid the general government in pursuance of the requisitions that may be made for the common defence.

His excellency orders an honorable discharge of the mounted men in gen. Manary's brigade under the command of col. Dunlap.

They will deposit their public arms and munitions of war with col. Moses Byxbee, at Delaware, or with the quarter-master-general at Franklinton.—The contractors will furnish the necessary supplies or provisions on their return.

By order of the commander in chief,
JESUP N. COUCHI, Aid-de-camp—

“BRITISH OFFICIALS”

HEAD-QUARTERS, Kingston, August 4, 1813.

By accounts received from his excellency the governor and chief and commander of the forces, from commodore sir James Yeo, dated off York, at half past one P. M. on the 11th inst. the following particulars have just been transmitted, of the capture and destruction of four of the enemy's armed schooners.

On Tuesday evening last, the 10th instant, the enemy's squadron, under commodore Chuncey, got under way from their anchorage off the mouth of the Niagara river, and with a fine breeze from the eastward stood towards our fleet, which was becalmed off the port at Twelve Mile Creek. At sunset, a fine breeze coming off the land, gave us the wind of the enemy, when our squadron stood for them, on which they immediately bore away from us under as much sail as the schooners could carry to keep up with the larger vessels. The enemy's fleet formed a long line; the Pike, Madison, Oneida, and six schooners; two schooners being placed to windward, for the purpose of raking the masts of our squadron, as they should come up. At eleven o'clock, got within gun-shot of the schooners, when they opened a brisk fire, and from their going so fast, it was more than an hour before the Wolf, our headmost ship, could pass them.

At this time the rest of the squadron was between two and three miles astern of the Wolf, and on her coming up with the Madison and Pike, they put before the wind and made sail, firing their stern chase guns. Sir James Yeo, finding it impossible to get the squadron up with the enemy, as the Wolf was the only ship which could keep up with them, made sail between them and the two schooners to windward, which he captured and which proved to be the Julia and Growler, each mounting one long thirty-two and one long twelve pounder. Two of the enemy's largest schooners, the Scourge of 10 and the Hamilton of 9 guns, upset on the night of the 9th inst. in carrying sail to keep from our squadron, and all on board perished, in number about one hundred.

By the loss and capture of the two schooners the enemy's squadron has been reduced to ten vessels, and ours increased to eight. It is ascertained that the Pike mounts 28 long 24 pounders, and has a complement of 420 men, and that the Madison mounts 22, 32 pound cannonades, with 340 men.—Nine boat loads of troops were taken on board the squadron on Monday, for the purpose it is supposed of repelling boarders.

The Wolfe has not received any material damage, and not a man was hurt on board. The prisoners were landing from her on the 11th inst. and the damages of the Growler were repairing. She had lost her bowsprit and was otherwise much cut up.

Nothing could exceed the eagerness and enthusiasm manifested by the officers and men serving on board our squadron, for a close engagement with the enemy, and the only apprehension and regret expressed by all were, that their opponents though superior guns and weight of metal, and men, would be too wary to afford them the opportunity of terminating, by a decisive action the contest to ascendancy of the lake.

Ogdensburg, August 11.

A flag crossed from Ogdensburg to Prescott on Friday last. The commanding officers politely sent the following handbill across: which was handed to us for publication.

Kingston Gazette Office, 5th Aug. 1813.

The following account of the enemy's late visit to York is published by authority.

At 11 o'clock on Saturday morning, the 31st ult. the enemy's fleet, consisting of 12 sail, were seen standing for the harbor—about half past 4, the Pike, the Madison and Oneida, came to anchor in the offing—the schooners continuing to pass up the harbor with their sweeps—about 4 o'clock three of them came to near the town, and the remainder near the garrison, and immediately afterwards several boats full of troops landed at the garrison, and proceeded from thence to the town, of which they took possession.

They then opened the jail, liberating the prisoners, and taking three soldiers confined for felony. They then went to the hospitals and paroled the few men that could not be removed. They next entered the stores of major Allen and Mr. St. George, and seized the contents, consisting chiefly of flour, the same being private property. Between 11 and 12 o'clock on Saturday night, the three schooners which had anchored abreast of the town, towed out, and it was supposed that the fleet would have sailed immediately—but information having been given by some traitors, whose names it is hoped will be discovered, that valuable stores had been sent up the river Don, the schooners went up the harbor on Sunday morning, the troops were again loaded, and 3 armed boats proceeded up the Don, in search of the stores. In consequence however of the very meritorious exertions of a few young men, amongst whom were two by the name of Platter, every thing was conveyed away, and the boats sunk before the enemy reached the place. Two or three boats containing trifling articles, which had been hid in the marsh were discovered and taken, but in their main object, the enemy was completely disappointed. As soon as the armed boats had returned, the troops went on board, and by sunset both sailors and soldiers had evacuated the town, the barracks, wood yard, and store houses on Gibraltar Point, having been first set on fire by them, and at day light on the following morning, the enemy's fleet sailed.

The troops which were landed were acting as marines, and appeared to be all they had on board the fleet, and did not exceed 240 men.—They were under the command of com. Chamcey and lieutenant col. Scott, an exchanged prisoner of war on his parole, both of whom landed with the troops. The town upon the arrival of the enemy was totally defenceless, the militia were still on parole, and the principal gentlemen had retired from an apprehension of being treated with the same severity used towards several of the inhabitants near Fort George, who had been made prisoners and sent to the United States. Lt. col. Battersby, with the troops under his command, had upon the first appearance of the enemy's fleet off York on the 29th, proceeded from thence with his guns to Burlington heights, where he had joined major Maule, and concentrated his force on the following evening. The enemy had, during the course of the day, landed from the fleet 300 men near Brandt's house, with an intention of storming the heights, which they hoped to carry, but finding maj. Maule well prepared to receive them, and being apprized of lieutenant col. Battersby's march, they re-embarked and stood away for York.

The plunder obtained by the enemy upon this predatory expedition has been indeed trifling, and the loss has altogether fallen upon individuals, the public stores of every description having been removed; the only prisoners made by them being confined felons and invalids in the hospital. We are sorry to be obliged to observe that there is too much reason to believe that the enemy was furnished with exact information respecting the movements of our troops, and of the state of York and the position at Burlington heights from traitors amongst ourselves, from men too who are holding public situations in the country, and whose names, we trust, when correctly known, will lead to their conviction and punishment, and hold them up to the just detestation of every loyal subject of his majesty.

10 o'clock A. M.—We stop the press to lay before our readers the British official account of the capture of the public property at Plattsburg:

Head-Quarters, Kingston, 8th August, 1813.

His excellency the commander of the forces, has received from major-general sir Robert Sheaffe, a despatch conveying the official report of lieutenant-col. Murray, detailing the operations of a combined movement on lake Champlain, which took place on the 29th July. The objects of this service have been fully accomplished by the total destruction of all the enemy's arsenals, block houses, barracks and stores of every description at Plattsburg, Swanton and Champlain town, and the extensive barracks at Saranack, capable of containing 4000 men, have been burnt. All naval, ordnance and other stores on the west side of the lake, have been destroyed or carried away.

His excellency has received from capt. Everard of the royal navy, to whose prompt zealous and able assistance, his excellency feels highly indebted, a report, informing him that after having co-operated in the complete accomplishment of the service above stated, he proceeded with his majesty's sloops Brooke and Shannon, and a gun-boat to Burlington, where he found the enemy's flotilla, superior in force, moored under the protection of a high bank, on which were placed a numerous artillery, supported by a strong body of regular and other troops, under major-general Hampton, who was reported to have collected all the troops in the vicinity of the lake, amounting to about 5000.

Capt. Everard proceeded 20 miles above Burlington, captured and destroyed four vessels within sight of the enemy's armed ships, when finding that they could not be induced to venture from a position in which it was impracticable to attack them, and every object of the service being fully achieved, he returned with the armed vessels to the isle Aux Noix on the 14th inst.—The land forces under lieutenant-col. Murray having arrived the day preceding.

EDWARD BAYNES,
Adjutant-General.

Extract of a letter, dated St. Louis, July 19.

"One of our gun boats under lieutenant Campbell was attacked a few days ago on the Illinois river by a large party, received but little injury—three men wounded. They had no cannon to destroy the Indian canoes. The boat left them after the 3d attack, which was made by the lieutenant. Our rangers have skirmishes every day or two with small parties of Indians. Fort Madison has been attacked the second time, only 2 men killed and 1 wounded on our side."

The enemy on the southern coast. The following memorandum (says a Charleston paper of the 25th ult.) was made upon the back of the Beaufort post-office, received by yesterday's southern mail:

Aug. 22.—We are all under arms here—two British 18 gun brigs came within Port Royal bar last evening and are now at anchor.

Endorsed upon the way-bill, received from Well's post-office, Beaufort district:

"Aug. 23.—The British effected a landing at Hilton Head, (ten miles from Beaufort) with about 100 men yesterday morning, and is supposed to be preparatory to an attack to-day—I am now on my way with a portion of the 10th regt.

WM. HUTSON WIGG, major commandant.

NAVAL.

Com. Rodgers. It is stated on the authority of a gentleman of Kent Island, at whose house admiral Warren held his quarters, that he had received despatches from Hulifax on the 22d ult. which stated that com. Rodgers had fallen in with the homeward bound Jamaica fleet, destroyed eighteen sail of them and manned two others (one of them a valuable packet) for the United States, both which were retaken the next day. A 90 gun ship and 2 frigates had been sent after him, and, it was said, they had information of having twice been within 18 hours sail of him.

President and Congress frigates.—A letter received in New York from Carthage, via St. Bartholomew's, says—"The United States' frigates President and Congress are off the coast of Carthage, at which place it was reported on the first of July, that the former had taken the British frigate Theseus, with specie; and the latter three British brigs from the Brazils, the crews of which had arrived at Barbadoes." [The Theseus is rated a 74 in Seel's list. The Thetis frigate mounts 38 guns which must be the vessel alluded to.]

A razee.—We have often heard of the things called razees, that the enemy conjured up to retrieve his lost honor. The Majestic (razee) has arrived at Hulifax, prepared for the purpose of fighting the U. S. frigates President or Constitution: she carries on the lower deck 28 32 pounders long guns, 38 42lb carronades and 2 brass 12 pounders—by which it appears her weight of metal is nearly, or quite, double that of our heaviest frigates; and her strength is equally proportionate.

The Ontario Fleet.—The Sylph, pierced for 24 guns, and carrying 20, of the burthen of 340 tons, schooner rigged, was built and ready for service in "thirty-three days from the stump." An instance of expedition, perhaps, unknown to the history of ship-building. She accompanied the fleet in the cruise which commenced on the 21st August. A fine brig is also nearly ready for the lake.

On the 14th of Aug. com. Chauncey sailed from Sackett's Harbor and fell in with the enemy's squadron, of whom, after a good deal of manœuvring, he got the weather gage—the British then bore away, and he chased them to Kingston. Our fleet then returned to port and sailed again on the 21st, the Sylph in company. But it was thought the enemy would not give them a chance of the combat so earnestly desired by the officers and crews.

It is positively stated that the two schooners were captured for want of obedience to orders; perhaps, by having too much eagerness to meet the foe. We are sorry to learn that two or three lieutenants have tendered their resignations to com. Chauncey, to take effect after the hoped for fight with com. Yeo; in consequence of supposing themselves overlooked in the late promotions. It is agreed upon, that our gallant commodore never yet had the power to bring the enemy to action—his vessels, in general, sailing much better than ours. The Sylph, however, is a valuable auxiliary in the business of catching the foe. The British official statement, as their "officials" gene-ally are, is full of arrant falsehoods—see it in page 11. It seems there was only one man killed on board the schooners captured. They carried together 8 guns. Those lost, the Hamilton and Scourge, mounted, in all, 17 guns. The following is the present comparative statement of the force on the lake:

AMERICAN.
General Pike	34
Madison	24
Sylph	20
Oneida	18
Duke of Gloucester*
Gov. Tomkins	6
Conquest	3
Ontario	2
Asp	2
Fair American	2
Pert	2
Lady of the Lake	2
Raven	1
GUNS	116
BRITISH.
General Wolfe	32
Royal George	22
Earl Moira	16
Prince Regent	14
General Simcoe	12
Seneca	4

To these may be added the Growler of 5 guns and the Julia of 3 guns, captured from us—they also have some gun boats, at Kingston.

The General Pike has her main battery of long 24 pounders—the Wolfe carries only carronades.

The British are building a 40 gun frigate at Kingston, and, as it is said, two sloops of war. They are reported to be in great forwardness; and we anticipate that sir James Lucas Yoe, will avoid a battle, if possible, until they are finished. It appears however, as though they may be attacked in the harbor, a land force assisting.

CHILICOTHE, Aug. 24.

Extract of a letter from capt. Richardson, dated head-quarters, Seneca Towns, Aug 18, 1813.

I am just arrived in camp; and before the mail closes have only time to inform you, that on the morning of the 12th inst. I sailed from Erie, in the brig Lawrence, with com. Perry, and arrived off Sandusky bay on the evening of the 15th, together with the following vessels:

- Brig Lawrence, commodore O. H. Perry 20 guns.
- Brig Niagara, captain J. D. Elliot, 20 guns.
- Brig Caledonia, Purser H. Magrath, 3 do.
- Schr. Ariel, lieutenant John Packet, 3 do.
- Sloop Trippe, lieutenant Jos. E. Smith, 1 do.
- Schr. Tygress, lieutenant A. C. Conklin, 1 do.
- Schr. Somers, S. M. Thomas Almy, 2 do.
- Schr. Scorpion, S. M. St. Champlin, 2 do.
- Schr. Ohio, S. M. Dan'l Dobbins, 1 do.
- Schr. Porcupine, Midshipman G. Senat, 1 do.

Upon our arrival at Sandusky bay a British sail was discovered at anchor near one of the islands by a pilot boat which was sent out. Signal for chase was made immediately, and I discovered that our vessels in general sail one third faster than those of the enemy. This took place just before sun set,

* We understand that this vessel is now called the Fork. She was fitted out, but found too weak to carry heavy guns, and is dismantled. Her rate was 10 guns.

and by dark commodore Perry had arrived almost within gun-shot of the enemy's schooner: one hour more day light, and she would have been captured. A very severe storm came on, and for fear of getting the squadron separated we anchored for the night. I start at reveille in the morning to accompany the general down to the fleet.

WASHINGTON CITY, Sept. 12.

Letters have been received from gen. HARRISON, dated at Seneca Town the head-quarters of the north-western army, as late as the 22d ult. at which time all was well. Gen. Harrison had just returned from a visit to com. Perry, who had arrived with his fleet, 10 sail, off Sandusky bay.

A Savannah paper of August 15, says—We are informed by a gentleman in this city, that the Baltimore letter of marque schooner Siro, of 18 guns, is expected to cruise between Charleston and Tybee bars, after her short cruise is finished—now nearly out.

CONTRASTS.—Admiral Cockburn stole a coach from a private individual at Harre de Grace, a defenceless and unoffending village. Captain Bainbridge gave up to lieutenant Hyslop, all his private property, among it a valuable box of plate, fairly won in fight with Java frigate. Decatur gave to capt. Carden of the Macedonian, all things he claimed as his own; and among them several casks of fine wine—the dying Lawrence was refused a drop of that which belonged to his private stores!—The barbarians!—See page 5.

The British cartel brig Agnes, that had been detained some days at Portland by the marshal, escaped on the night of the 18th ult. the extreme darkness of which did not, however, prevent the fort from saluting her, and several shot are supposed to have told, but she got off. The cause of this singular procedure is unexplained. One report says that she was detained in consequence of information having been given to the marshals of the U. States that a certain British officer had broken his parole; and that they were looking for him.

Several British vessels of war were in sight from Salem, on the 25th ult. They had captured some small craft.

The Anaconda, late a privateer, captured by the British in North Carolina, is fitted out and commissioned by the enemy. It is said she forms a part of the squadron in the Chesapeake.

The British, from two brigs, landed on Derece island, on the coast of South Carolina, where they committed all possible depredation on the property of the inhabitants, leaving them destitute of every necessary, destroying what they could not carry away, though they did not burn the houses.

Norfolk, Aug. 27.—On Tuesday last a party of men from the Plantagenet, 74, and another from the Dotterel, (18 gun brig) captain Damel, went ashore on Cape Henry beach to haul the seine, when six of the latter and one of the former, pretending to catch some pigs that were feeding in the bushes, took to their heels and made off. They were fallen in with by a guard of our militia who conducted them to town. Their reason for deserting, they stated, without any hesitation, to be, their abhorrence of the practice of impressment, for which they were compelled to fight against a nation who were opposing it.

These men say that the neutral vessels that have passed out to sea, supplied the squadron with newspapers, smoking from the press, and every other information they could obtain relative to our strength, dispositions of force, &c. and that they were occasionally supplied with all the delicacies of the season, by small vessels that came off for the purpose.

One of these petty traitors, after he had sold his cargo at enormous prices, cut several holes in his mainsail, to shew when he went home, that he had been fired at and compelled (solely against his will!) to go along-side of one of the enemy's ships. They further state that the two 74's and two frigates which came down the bay, went to sea, and, as they learnt, were bound to Halifax to bring provisions to the Chesapeake squadron; and that a 74 and a frigate came in about the same time and went up the bay. The whole force below consists of the Plantagenet, Dotterel and a tender.

Extract of a letter from capt. John H. Dent, commanding naval officer at Charleston, (S. C.) dated August 21, 1812.

"SIR—I have the honor to inform you that the privateer schooner Decatur, of this port, arrived here yesterday, with H. B. M. schooner Dominica, her prize.

She was captured on the 15th inst. after a most gallant and desperate action of one hour, and carried by boarding, having all her officers killed or wounded except one midshipman. The Dominica mounts 15 guns, one a 32-pounder on a pivot, and had a complement of 83 men at the commencement of the action, sixty of whom were killed or wounded.

She was one of the best equipped and manned vessels of her class I have ever seen. The Decatur mounts seven guns, and had a complement of 103 men at the commencement of the action, nineteen of whom were killed and wounded.

"I have the honor to be with the greatest respect, your most obedient servant, JOHN H. DENT.

"Hon. Wm. Jones,
Secretary of the navy.

CHARLESTON, August 21.

Relation of the battle between the American privateer Decatur, armed with six 12lb carronades, and one 18 pounder on a pivot, with 103 men, commanded by captain DOMINIQUE DIRON; and H. B. M. schooner Dominica, of twelve 12lb carronades, two long 6's, one brass 4 lb. and one 32-lb. carronade on a pivot, with 83 men, commanded by lieutenant GEORGE WILMOT BARRETTE—carried by boarding.

On the 5th of August, 1813, lat. 23, 4 north long. —, standing north—at half past ten in the morning, the man at the mast head discovered two sail to the southward—at 11 these vessels were ascertained to be a ship and a schooner—at half past 11, went about and stood towards them, in order to reconnoitre—at half past 12 found ourselves abreast of the schooner, which hoisted English colours; at 1, the Decatur wore round; half an hour after the schooner fired a shot, without effect; the captain then gave orders to prepare every thing for action, to load all the cannon and musquetry, to have the grappings, swords, &c. and having previously got up the necessary ammunition, water &c. from below, ordered the hatches to be fastened down.—At 2 o'clock, the schooner having wore ship in order to take the schooner abaft, she fired another shot and passed over us; at a quarter past 2 we fired our large gun and hoisted American colours at the peak; we fired our piece a second and third time; which she answered by firing two guns from her battery; our distance was now about half gun shot, it was now half past two o'clock; the schooner evinced a desire to bear away; observing this the Decatur hauled upon the larboard tack, in order to present her bow to the enemy; 10 minutes after the enemy fired a whole broadside, which caused no other damage to the Decatur, than some trifling injury to the rigging. After having answered her by a shot from our 18 pounder, the captain of the Decatur ordered every one to his post, in order to carry her by boarding when the necessary preparations were made for that purpose; it was now about three-quarters past 2, the distance about pistol shot—the crew of the Decatur having cheered preparatory to boarding, our fire of musquetry commenced and was very well kept up; the enemy bearing away in order to avoid the boarding, seized the opportunity to fire a broadside into us, which killed two of our men and otherwise materially injured our rigging and sails. The Decatur continued to follow up the manoeuvres of the enemy, endeavored again to board her, which she once more avoided and fired another broadside. The captain of the Decatur having ordered the drum to beat the charge, the crew cried out to board. At that moment endeavored again to board her, which the enemy could no longer resist, and which was effected by passing into her stern over our bowsprit, our jibboom running into her mainsail. It was now half past 5—the fire from the artillery and musquetry was terrible, and well supported on both sides. The enemy not being able to disengage himself, dropped alongside; and it was in this position that capt. Diron ordered his whole crew to board, armed with pistols, sabres, &c. which order was executed with the promptness of lightning—Mr. Vincent Siffith, 1st prize-master, and quarter-master Thomas Wasborn, were the two first on board of the enemy; in doing which the prize-master received three wounds; the crew of the enemy fought with as much courage and bravery as that of the Decatur did with valor and intrepidity. Fire-arms now became useless, and the crews were fighting hand to hand with cutlasses, and throwing cold shot; when the captain of the enemy and the principle officers being killed, the deck covered with dead and wounded, the English colors were hauled down by the conquerors. In consequence of the orders given by the captain of the Decatur, the vessels were then separated, the rigging and the sails being in the worst state possible.

During the combat, which lasted an hour, the King's Packet Princess Charlotte, remained a silent spectator of the scene, and as soon as the vessels were disengaged from each other she tacked about and stood to the southward. She had sailed from St. Thomas, bound to England, under convoy, to a certain latitude, of the Dominica.

Killed and wounded on board the Decatur.

Killed 4—wounded 16—one of whom (the carpenter) since dead.

On board the Dominica.

Killed, 13—wounded, 47—5 of whom are since dead of their wounds.—Total killed and wounded, 60.—Among the killed are G. W. Barrette, commander; Mr. J. Sacker, master; Mr. D. Brown, purser; Mr. Archer and Mr. Parry, midshipmen—wounded, Mr. J. Nichols, midshipman. The surgeon and one midshipman were the only officers on board who were not killed or wounded. The lieutenant was on shore, sick.

Remarks of the Charleston Courier.

From the above statement it would appear that this engagement has been the most bloody, and the loss in killed and wounded on the part of the enemy, in proportion to the number engaged, perhaps the greatest to be found in the records of naval warfare. The surviving officers of the Dominica attribute the loss of their vessel to the superior skill of the Decatur's crew in the use of musquetry, and the masterly manœuvring of that vessel, by which their carriage guns were rendered entirely useless. Capt. BARRETTE was a young man, of not more than 25 years of age; he had been wounded early in the action by two musket balls in the left arm, but he fought till the last moment, refusing to surrender his vessel, although he was urged by the few survivors of his crew to do so; declaring his determination not to survive her loss. One of the lieutenants of the Decatur received a severe sabre wound in the hand from capt. B. a few moments before he fell.—Capt. DIXON is a Frenchman, and most of the officers and crew of his vessel are his countrymen; they have done themselves immortal honor by their humanity and attention towards their prisoners after victory, which are spoken of in high terms of approbation, by the surviving officers of the enemy's vessel.

The crew of the Dominica, with the exception of 3 or 10 boys, were fine looking young men; but to see them in the mangled state in which they arrived was enough to freeze the blood of one not accustomed to such sights, with horror. Among her crew is a small boy, not eleven years old, who was twice wounded, while contending for victory upon her deck.

The Dominica is the vessel that captured the privateer schooner Providence, of Rhode-Island, some months since, in the West-Indies; and it was remarked to us by one of her officers, as she was coming up the harbor yesterday, that the American ensign and pennant which were then flying over those of Britain, were the ones which belonged to the Providence when captured by them.

The day after capturing the sch. the Decatur fell in with, and captured without any action, the British ship London Trader, from Surinam bound to London, with a cargo consisting of 209 hhds. of sugar, 140 tierces of molasses, 55 hhds. rum, 700 bags coffee, about 50 or 60 bales cotton, and some other articles. She anchored in five fathom hole yesterday.

There never was a greater instance of good fortune than that experienced by these vessels, in the moment of their arrival on the coast—had they got here one day sooner, they would have stood a great chance to have fallen into the hands of the enemy's brigs, which had been cruising some time off here, and which had passed the bar and stood to the southward, with the wind at S. E. on Thursday morning. The Decatur, with her prizes, made the land near Georgetown on the same day, and running down the coast that night, were directly off the bar yesterday morning.

Copy of a letter from capt. Blakely, forwarded by capt. Hull to the navy department.

United States brig Enterprize,
Portsmouth, N. H. 20th Aug. 1813.

SIR—I have the honor to report to you the capture of the British privateer schooner the Fly, she was captured yesterday afternoon off cape Porpoise after a chase of eight hours.

Very respectfully, &c.

J. BLAKELY.

U. S. Naval forces on the eastern station, Portsmouth, New Hampshire.

BLOCKADE OF NEW LONDON.

The blockading squadron on the 24th ult. consisted of 4 74's, 1 frigate, and 2 smaller vessels. Com. Hardy is removed from that station and the command devolves on capt. Oliver, of the Valiant. A New-York paper of the 30th says, that on the day preceding a small fleet of coasters and fishermen had arrived there from New London, the entrance of the harbor having been cleared, of the enemy's ships and barges, by the dread of torpedoes or commodore Decatur's boats. Some large galleys or barges, to carry heavy guns, are building at New London to cruise in the Sound, and meet the barges of the enemy.

BLOCKADE OF THE DELAWARE.

The enemy remains inactive in the Delaware, where his force consists only of a frigate and two or three smaller vessel.

BLOCKADE OF THE CHESAPEAKE.

By accounts from the Eastern shore of Maryland, it appears that sir John B. Warren had an electioneering as well as a military object. We are assured that the officers of distinction talked much of their love of peace; advising the people, most pointedly, to elect such men as would seek it of England. The amiable Cockburn deplored the unnatural war, attributing it to "French influence," &c. and swearing vengeance at Baltimore as the fountain of opposition to his government. We have heard those things in so many ways, that we cannot refuse implicit credit to them. As facts, they ought to be remembered.

Like the locusts of Asia, "whose browsing may be heard a great distance like an army foraging," the enemy have left Kent island naked and bare. The whole moveable property of the people (that of a favored few excepted) was consumed and wasted or wantonly destroyed. The poorer classes of the people are destitute of every thing; without a mouthful of provisions or an article of furniture or clothing, save what they had on their backs. The destruction has no parallel in the events of latter times, but in the proceedings of the same barbarians in India.—The beds of the people were uniformly ripped open, and the feathers scattered to the winds—and their bedsteads, looking-glasses, clocks, bureaus, &c. &c. broke or hacked to pieces. This island furnished Baltimore, Annapolis, &c. with great quantities of poultry, but it is said the stock is literally exterminated; and of horned cattle, sheep or hogs, none remain but a few solitary animals, venerable for their years, to show how things once were!—Kent island is fertile, and before the late invasion contained from 100 to 120 families.

Rifle-barrelled cannon.—The enemy officers, in our bay, on many occasions, have expressed their astonishment at the precision with which the Americans use their great guns and small arms. They speak of the discharges from Craney Island with wonder; declaring they never before witnessed such dreadful effects; and think it very strange that a large portion of their men, killed in the predatory excursions, have come to their death by wounds in the head, "past all surgery."

Two regiments of Baltimore county militia yet remain encamped on the heights near the city; they have made excellent progress in discipline. The additional works for the defence of the place are prosecuted with unceasing activity. The flotilla of barges and gun-boats, under commodore Barney, will be a very respectable establishment.

Progress of the enemy.—The British, in fifty-three barges, went to attack St. Michaels on the morning of the 26th, and then—went back again; after stealing a hula as usual. About 700 hardy fellows were prepared to give them a yankee reception. The desertion of their men, for many have come in and, it is said, nearly 100 left them in this expedition, may have hastened their departure. (C) To a soldier of a mutiny, or pretty general determination of the troops to desert, while in Kent Island, which is said to have been discovered to general Beckwith by a "well inclined" citizen of the island, to whom the Englishmen had trusted their secret, supposing it safe, is also attributed their leaving that place. If this be true, we shall hear more of it.] After the expedition against St. Michaels was given up, the whole fleet went down the bay. They were supposed to be below the Potomac on the 30th, proceeding towards the sea, one or two vessels excepted, suspected of being in the "slave trade."

518. "His majesty's" schr. Dominica, 15 guns and 88 men, captured by the privateer Decatur of Charleston, of 7 guns and 103 men, after a desperate action. See the account, page 14. The Dominica has arrived at Charleston.

519. Ship London trader, 2 guns, from Surrinam for London, sent into ditto by ditto, laden with 209 hhd. sugar, 140 tierces of molasses, 55 hhd. rum, 700 bags coffee, 50 or 60 bales of cotton, and some other articles. It may be here worthy to remark, that the late act of congress reducing the duty on prize goods, acts as a bounty on this cargo, as follows—say

209 hhd. sugar, 12 cwt. each, 2½ cents per lb.	$ 6,220
140 tierces molasses—160 gallons each, 5 cents per gallon	700
55 hhd. rum—115 galls. do. 28 cents. pr. g.	1,771
700 bags of coffee—120 lbs. each, 5 cents	4,200

Three cents per lb. might also be estimated upon cotton; but as it goes to a bad market, we shall not take it into the account.

Whole reduction of duties, or bounty for the capture - - - - - $12,891

520, 521, 522, 523, 524. Brigs Good Intent, Venus, Happy, barque Reprisal, and schooner Elizabeth, captured by the Snap-Drum, of North Carolina and destroyed or given up. The privateer when last seen, had in company the brig Ann, from England for Nova Scotia, with a full cargo of cloths, cassimeres, &c. valued at $500,000.

525. Privateer Fly, — guns, captured by the U. S. brig Enterprize, and sent into Portsmouth.

The Yankee's cruise. May 20, left Newport. May 23, re-took brig William, (re-cap.) 30th, took brig Thames, 14 guns, worth $180,000 dollars, arrived, see no. 452. June 22, close in with Ireland, took the cutter sloop Earl Camden, valued at 10,000 dollars—ordered for France. 30th, took brig Elizabeth, 2 guns, laden with cotton, valued at $40,000—ordered for France. Same day, took brig Watson, with cotton, valued at $70,000—ordered for France. July 1, took schooner Ceres, her valuables removed, and given up to release the prisoners on parole. 2nd, Ireland in sight, took brig Mariner, laden with rum, sugar, &c. worth $70,000—ordered her for France. 23d, after many fruitless attempts to manifest her friendly character, the Yankee engaged, and soon captured the Spanish ship New Constitution, of six 42 pounders and two 12's—overhauled her papers and permitted her to proceed. Boarded several other Spanish and Swedish vessels, and arrived at Providence, R. I. August 19. We have yet to learn the fate of her valuable prizes ordered for France. The Yankee had not a man killed or wounded during her cruise.

526. Schooner Ceres, captured by the Yankee, as above.

527. Barque Henrietta, sent into Beaufort, N. C. by the Snap-Drum, of Newbern.

528. Brig Ann, — with a cargo of dry goods, worth $500,000, captured by the Snap-Drum, and the most valuable part of the cargo taken on board the privateer, which has safely arrived at Beaufort. The brig and one other prize taken by the S. Drum, is yet to be heard of.

"Patriots."

Within a few years past we have had many sorts of "Patriots"—Spanish patriots—Portuguese patriots—Prussian patriots—Russian patriots—Turkish patriots—and Cossack patriots. One other kind of patriots was yet wanting, and we find them (WHERE ALL "PATRIOTISM" FIRST BEGINS) in a London ministerial paper—they are SAVAGE "PATRIOTS"—Speaking of the Indians, it says—"with patriotism that would do honor to men who pretend to be more enlightened, they joined the tomahawk and the scalping knife to the bayonet and sword, and swelled the British shout of victory with the yell of the Indian war whoop?"

Now these patriots are just like all other "patriots" of British or anglo-American manufacture—and made in the same way, by purchase. If the British had not tempted the savages by the price of six dollars for every scalp, whether of man, woman or CHILD, they would have been quiet.

THE CHRONICLE.

We have a report that appears entitled to credit, that 7000 Swedish troops are expected in the West Indies, to make neutral islands of Guadalupe, and St. Martins, and their dependencies; those islands being ceded to Sweden by the British.

A Shark, nearly nine feet long and weighing about 500 pounds, was taken in Fly-market-slip, N. York, last week.

POSTSCRIPT.

Copy of a letter from capt. John H. Dent, commanding officer at Charleston, (S. C.) dated August 26, 1813.

SIR—I have the honor to acquaint you, that I received a letter express last night from Mr. Jenkins, commanding the St. Helena militia, stating that the enemy's two brigs, Colibri and Charybdis, got under way on Monday morning, with an intention of proceeding to sea, when the wind shifted to the eastward; and in attempting to beat over the bar, one of them (supposed to be the Colibri) grounded on Cold Scarg Reef, and in a short time after bilged and became a complete wreck.

The crew was taken off by the other, which now lies about 5 miles from Bay Point, waiting a wind to proceed to sea.

Major Jenkins states that they landed twice at the plantation of Mr. Pope's and took one of his large canoe off, with some provisions.

It appears their object in entering Port Royal was principally to sound the bar, and roadstead, which they have effected, as their boats were seen in that service the whole time they were at anchor.

The officers who delivered major Jenkins' letter further states, that the wreck had entirely gone to pieces, and a great part drifted on shore—among which are her boats and the stolen canoe.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant.

JOHN H. DENT

"Hon. Wm. Jones, secretary of the navy."

Law of U. S.—Direct Tax.

[This law, either for present information or general reference, is important. We have inserted the several sums levied, in figures instead of letters, as well for the sake of easier comparison, as to save room.]

An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That a direct tax of three millions of dollars shall be and is hereby laid upon the U. States, and apportioned to the states respectively, in the manner following:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the amount of taxes which by virtue of the provisions of the act for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties, and of this act, should be laid and collected on non-residents' lands, so called, in the state of Kentucky and Ohio shall be ascertained and levied in the same manner and at the same rates respectively, as they were by the laws of those states in the year eighteen hundred and eleven; and lands in that year entered for taxation as non-residents' lands, which since that time may have been sold and transferred to residents, or where the owners of such lands may have become residents, and have had their lands entered for taxation, as residents, the tax on the same shall be collected as the tax on non-residents' lands. Provided, in all cases where sales and transfers shall have been made as aforesaid, or where non-residents have become residents, if they reside on the lands formerly entered as non-residents' lands, they shall have notice from the collector, as in other cases of residents. And if the amount thus laid, shall in either of the said states exceed or fall short of the amount fixed by this act as the quota to be laid on non-residents' lands in said states respectively, the difference shall, in the next ensuing direct tax laid by the authority of the United States, be deducted from or added to the quota of such state, as the case may be.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said tax shall be assessed and collected in the manner provided, and by the officers to be appointed under and by virtue of the act aforesaid, entitled "An act for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties." Provided, That there shall be appointed in the state of Ohio six additional collectors, who shall collect the tax due from non-resident proprietors of lands in the said state, shall have the same districts assigned them by the secretary of the treasury, reside at the same places which are or may be designated for similar officers under the state authority, and in other respects shall be under the same rules and regulations, be subject to the same penalties and forfeitures as are provided by the above recited act.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the principal assessors shall issue their precepts to the assistant assessors for the purpose of carrying into effect this act on the first day of February next, and the assessments shall have reference to that day.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That each state may vary by an act of its legislature, the respective quotas imposed by this act on its several counties or districts, so as more equally and equitably to apportion the tax hereby imposed, and the tax laid by this act shall be levied and collected in conformity with such alterations and variations, as if the same made part of this act, provided that an authenticated copy thereof be deposited in the office of the secretary of the treasury prior to the first of April next; in which case it shall be the duty of the said secretary to give notice thereof to the proper principal collectors in such state.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That each state may pay its quota into the treasury of the United States, and thereon shall be entitled to a deduction of fifteen per centum if paid before the tenth day of February next, and of ten per centum if paid before the first day of May, in the same year: Provided, That notice of the intention of making such payment be given to the secretary of the treasury one month prior to such payment, and in case of payment so made he shall give notice thereof to the principal assessors and collectors of such state; and no further proceeding shall thereafter be had under this act in such state.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That if either the states of Ohio or Louisiana shall pay its quota according to the provisions of the preceding section, the legislatures thereof shall be, and they are hereby authorized and empowered to collect of all the purchasers of public lands, under any law of the United States, a just and equal proportion of the quota of said states respectively, the compact between the United States and the said states to the contrary notwithstanding.

Jefferson on weights and measures.

LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF STATE TO THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

New-York, July 4, 1790.

SIR,—In obedience to the order of the house of representatives, of January, 15th, I have now the honor to inclose you a report on the subject of measures, weights and coins. The length of time, which intervened between the date of the order and my arrival in this city, prevented my receiving it, till the 15th of April; and an illness, which followed soon after, added, unavoidably, some weeks to the delay; so that it was not till about the 20th of May that I was able to finish the report. A desire to lessen the number of its imperfections, induced me still to withhold it awhile, till, on the 15th of June, came to my hands from Paris, a printed copy of a proposition made by the bishop of Autun, to the national assembly of France, on the subject of weights and measures: and three days after I received through the channel of the public papers, the speech of sir John Riggs Miller, of April 13th, in the British house of commons, on the same subject. In the report, which I had prepared, and was then about to give in, I had proposed the latitude of 33° as that which should fix our standard; because it was the medium latitude of the United States: but the proposition before the national assembly of France, to take that of 45°, as being a middle term between the equator and both poles, and a term which might consequently unite the nations of both hemispheres, appeared to me so well chosen, and so just, that I did not hesitate a moment to prefer it to that of 33°. It became necessary, of course, to reform all my calculations to that standard—an operation, which has been retarded by my other occupations.

These circumstances will, I hope, apologize for the delay which has attended the execution of the order of the house: and perhaps a disposition, on their part, to have due regard to the proceedings of other nations, engaged on the same subject, may induce them still to defer deciding ultimately on it, till their next session. Should this be the case, and should any new matter occur in the mean time, I shall think it my duty to communicate it to the house, as supplemental to the present report.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the most profound respect, sir, your most obedient, and most humble servant.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

To the speaker of the house of representatives.

The secretary of state, to whom was referred, by the house of representatives, to prepare and report a proper plan or plans for establishing uniformity in the currency, weights, and measures of the United States, in obedience thereto, makes the following REPORT.

To obtain uniformity in measures, weights and coins, it is necessary to find some measure of invariable length, with which, as a standard, they may be compared.

There exists not in nature, as far as has been hitherto observed, a single subject or species of subject, accessible to man, which presents one constant and uniform dimension.

The globe of the earth itself, indeed, might be considered as invariable in all its dimensions, and that its circumference would furnish an invariable measure: but no one of its circles, great or small, is accessible to admeasurement through all its parts: and the various trials, to measure definite portions of them, have been of such various result, as to shew there is no dependence on that operation for certainty.

Matter then, by its mere extension, furnishing nothing invariable, its motion is the only remaining resource.

The motion of the earth round its axis, though not absolutely uniform and invariable, may be considered as such for every human purpose. It is measured obviously, but unequally, by the departure of a given meridian from the sun, and its return to it, constituting a solar day. Throwing together the inequalities of solar days, a mean interval, or day, has been found, and divided, by very general consent, into eighty-six thousand four hundred equal parts.

A pendulum, vibrating freely, in small and equal arcs, may be so adjusted in its length, as, by its vibrations, to make this division of the earth's motion into eighty-six thousand four hundred equal parts, called seconds of mean time.

Such a pendulum, then, becomes itself a measure of determinate length, to which all others may be referred, as to a standard.

But even the pendulum is not without its uncertainties.

I. The difficulty of ascertaining in practice its centre of oscillation, as depending on the form of the bob, and its distance from the point of suspension—the effect of the weight of the suspending wire, towards displacing the centre of oscillation—that center being seated within the body of the bob, and, therefore, inaccessible to the measure—are sources of considerable uncertainty.

II. Both theory and experience prove, that to preserve its isochronism, it must be shorter towards the equator, and longer towards the poles.

III. The height of the situation, above the common level, as being an increment to the radius of the earth, diminishes the length of the pendulum.

IV. The pendulum being made of metal, as is best, it varies in length with the variations in the temperature of the atmosphere.

V. To continue small and equal vibrations, through a sufficient length of time, and to count the vibrations, machinery and a power necessary, which may exert a small, but constant effort to renew the waste of motion: and the difficulty is, so to apply these, as that they shall neither retard nor accelerate the vibrations.

1. In order to avoid the uncertainties, which respect the centre of oscillation, it has been proposed by Mr. Leslie, an ingenious artist of Philadelphia, to substitute, for the pendulum, an uniform cylindrical rod, without a bob.

Could the diameter of such a rod be infinitely small, the centre of oscillation would be exactly at two-thirds of the whole length, measured from the point of suspension. Giving it a diameter which shall render it sufficiently inflexible, the centre will be displaced, indeed; but in a second rod, not the $\frac{1}{600,000}$ th part of its length, and not the hundredth part as much as in a second pendulum, with a spherical bob, of proper diameter. This displacement is so infinitely minute, then, that we may consider the centre of oscillation, for all practical purposes, as residing at two-thirds of the length, from the centre of the suspension. The distance between these two centres might be easily and accurately ascertained in practice. But the whole rod is better for a standard, than any portion of it, because sensibly defined at both its extremities.

2. The uncertainty arising from the difference of length requisite for the second pendulum, or the second rod, in different latitudes, may be avoided by fixing on some one latitude, to which our standard shall refer. That of 33° , as being the middle latitude of the United States, might seem the most convenient, were we to consider ourselves alone; but connected with other nations by commerce and science, it is better to fix on that parallel, which bids fairest to be adopted by them also. The forty-fifth, as being the middle term between the equator and pole, has been heretofore proposed in Europe: and the proposition has been lately renewed there, under circumstances which may very possibly give it some effect. This parallel is distinguished with us also, as forming our principal northern boundary. Let the completion of the forty-fifth degree then give the standard for our union, with the hope that it may become a line of union with the rest of the world.

The difference between the second rod for 45° of latitude, and that for 31° , our other extreme, is to be examined.

The second pendulum for 45° of latitude, according to sir Isaac Newton's computation, must be of (2.) 39,14912 inches, English measure: and a rod, to vibrate in the same time, must be of the same length between the centres of suspension and oscillation, and, consequently, its whole length 58.7 (or more exactly 58,72560) inches. This is longer than the rod, which shall vibrate seconds in 31° of latitude, by about $\frac{1}{777}$ part of its whole length: a difference so minute, that it might be neglected, as insensible, for the common purposes of life: but in cases requiring perfect exactness, the second rod, found by trial of its vibrations in any part of the United States, may be corrected by computation for the (3 .) latitude of the place, and so brought exactly to the standard of 45° .

3. By making the experiment in the level of the ocean, the difference will be avoided, which a higher position might occasion.

4. The expansion and contraction of the rod, with the change of temperature, is the fourth source of uncertainty before mentioned. According to the high authority, so often quoted, an iron rod, of given length, may vary, between summer and winter, in temperate latitudes, and in the common exposure of house-clocks, from $\frac{1}{777}$ to $\frac{1}{577}$ of its whole length, which, in a rod of 58.7 inches, will be from about two to three hundredths of an inch. This may be avoided by adjusting and preserving the standard in a cellar, or other place, the temperature of which never varies. Iron is named for this purpose, because the least expansible of the metals.

5. The practical difficulty, resulting from the effect of the machinery and moving power, is very inconsiderable in the present state of the arts: and in their progress towards perfection, will become less and less. To estimate and obviate this, will be the artist's province. It is as nothing, when compared with the sources of inaccuracy hitherto attending measures.

Before quitting the subject of the inconveniences, some of which attend the pendulum alone, others, both the pendulum and rod, it must be added, that the rod would have an accidental, but very precious advantage over the pendulum in this country, in the event of our fixing the foot at the nearest aliquot part of either; for the difference between the common foot and those so to be produced, would be three times greater in the case of the pendulum, than in that of the rod.

Let the standard of measure, then, be an uniform cylindrical rod of iron, of such length, as, in latitude 45° in the level of the ocean, and in a cellar, or other place, the temperature of which does not vary through the year, shall perform its vibrations, in small and equal arcs, in one second of mean time.

A standard of invariable length being thus obtained, we may proceed to identify, by that, the measures, weights, and coins of the United States. But here a great presents itself, as to the extent of the reformation meditated by the house of representatives. The experiment made by congress in the year 1796, by declaring that there should be one money of account and payment through the United States, and that its parts and multiples should be in a decimal ratio, has obtained such general approbation, both at home and abroad, that nothing seems wanting, but the actual coinage, to banish the discordant pounds, shillings, pence and farthings of the different states, and to establish, in their stead, the new denominations. As it is in contemplation with the house of representatives, to extend a like improvement to our measures and weights, and to arrange them also in a decimal ratio?—The facility, which this would introduce into the vulgar arithmetic, would, unquestionably, be soon and sensibly felt by the whole mass of the people, who would thereby be enabled to compute for themselves, whatever they should have occasion to buy, to sell, or to measure, which the present complicated and difficult ratios place beyond their computation, for the most part. Or, is it the opinion of the representatives, that the difficulty of changing the established habits of a whole nation, opposes an insuperable bar to this improvement? Under this uncertainty, the secretary of state thinks it his duty to submit alternative plans, that the house may, at their will, adopt either the one or the other, exclusively—or the one for the present, and the other for a future time, when the public mind may be supposed to have become familiarized to it.

I. And first, on the supposition, that the present measures and weights are to be retained, but to be rendered uniform and invariable, by bringing them to the same invariable standard.

The first settlers of these states, having come chiefly from England, brought with them the measures and weights of that country. These alone are generally established among us, either by law or usage; and these, therefore, are alone to be retained and fixed. We must resort to that country for information of what they are, or ought to be.

This rests, principally, on the evidence of certain standard measures and weights, which have been preserved of long time in different deposits. But differences among these having been known to exist, the house of commons, in the years 1757 and 1758, appointed committees to enquire into the original standards of their weights and measures. These committees, assisted by able mathematicians and artists, examined and compared with each other, the several standard measures and weights, and made reports on them in the years 1758 and 1759. The circumstances, under which these reports were made, entitled them to be considered, as far as they go, as the best written testimony existing, of the standard measures and weights of England: and as such, they will be relied on in the progress of this report.

Measures of length.—The measures of length in use among us are,

The league of three miles; the mile of eight furlongs; the furlong of forty poles or perches; the pole or perch of five and a half yards; the fathom of two yards; the ell of a yard and a quarter; the yard of three feet; the foot of twelve inches; and the inch of ten lines.

On this branch of their subject, the committee of 1757, 1758, says, that the standard measures of length, at the receipt of the exchequer, are a yard, supposed to be of the time of Henry VII. and a yard and ell, supposed to have been made about the year 1591; that they are brass rods, very coarsely made, their divisions not exact, and the rods bent: and that, in the year 1742, some members of the royal society had been at great pains in taking an exact measure of these standards, by very curious instruments, prepared by the ingenious Mr. Graham; that the royal society had had a brass rod made, pursuant to their experiment, which was made so accurately, and by persons so skilful and exact, that it was thought not easy to obtain a more exact one; and the committee in fact found it to agree with the standard at the exchequer, as near as it was possible. They furnish no means to a person at a distance of knowing what this standard is. This, however, is supplied by the evidence of the second pendulum, which, according to the authority before quoted, is, at London, 39,168 $\frac{1}{2}$ English inches, and consequently, the second rod, there is of 58,752 $\frac{1}{2}$ of the same inches. When we shall have found, then, by actual trial the second rod for 45° by adding the difference of their computed length, to wit, $\frac{1}{100000}$ of an inch, or rather $\frac{1}{100}$ of a line (which in practice will endanger less error, than an attempt at so minute a fraction as the ten thousandth part of an inch) we shall have the second rod of London, or a true measure of 58 3-4 English inches. Or, to shorten the operation, without varying the result,

Let the standard rod of 45° be divided into 587 1-5 equal parts and let each of these parts be declared a line;

Ten lines an inch; twelve inches a foot; three feet a yard; three feet nine inches an ell; six feet a fathom; five yards and a half a perch or pole; forty poles or perches a furlong; eight furlongs a mile; three miles a league.

Superficial measures.—Our measures of surface are the acre of four roods; and the rood of forty square poles: so established by a statute of 33. E. 1. Let them remain the same.

Measures of capacity.—The measures of capacity in use among us, are of the following names and proportions:

The gill, four of which make a pint; two pints a quart; two quarts a pottle; two pottles a gallon; two gallons a peck, dry measure; eight gallons make a measure, called a firkin, in liquid substances, and a bushel dry; two firkins or bushels, make a measure, called a rundlet, or kilderkin, liquid, and a strike, dry; two kilderkins, or strikes, make a measure called a barrel, liquid, and a coomb, dry—this last term being ancient and little used; two barrels, or coombs, make a measure called a hoghead, liquid, or a quarter, dry; each being the quarter of a ton; a hoghead and a third makes a tierce, or a third of a ton; two hogheads make a pipe, butt, or puncheon, and two pipes make a ton.

But no one of these measures is of a determinate capacity. The report of the committee of 1757-3 shews, that the gallon is of very various content: and that being the unit, all the others must vary with it.

The gallon and bushel contain 224 and 1792 cubic inches, according to the standard wine gallon, preserved at Guildhall; 231 and 1848, according to the statute of the 5th Anne; 264.8 and 1218.4, according to the ancient Rumford quart of 1228, examined by the committee; 265.5 and 2124, according to three standard bushels preserved in the exchequer, to wit, one of Henry VII. without a rim, one dated 1091, supposed for 1591, or 1601, and one dated 1601; 266.25 and 2150, according to the ancient Rumford gallon of 1228, examined by the committee; 266.75 and 2150, according to the Winchester bushel, as declared by statute 13.14. W. 3. which has been the model for some of the grain states; 271. less 2 spoonfuls, and 2168, less 16 spoonfuls, according to the standard gallon of Henry VII. and another, dated 1601, marked E. E. both in the exchequer; 271 and 2168, according to a standard gallon in the exchequer, dated 1601, marked E. and called the corn gallon; 272 and 2176, according to the three standard corn-gallons, last mentioned, as measured in 1688, by an artist for the commissioners of the excise, generally used in the sea-port towns, and by mercantile people, and thence introduced into some of the grain states; 277.18 and 2217.44, as established for the measure of coal by the statute of 12 Anne; 278, and 2224, according to a standard bushel of Henry VII. with a copper rim, in the exchequer; 278.4 and 2227.2 according to two standard pints of 1601, and 1602, in the exchequer; 289, and 2240, according to the standard quart of 1601, in the exchequer; 282 and 2256, according to the standard gallon for beer and ale, in the treasury.

There are, moreover, varieties on these varieties, from the barrel to the ton inclusive: for, if the barrel be of herrings, it must contain 28 gallons by the statute 13 El. c. 11. If of wine, it must contain 31 1-2 by the statute 2 Henry VII. c. 22. and 1. Richard III. c. 15. If of beer or ale, it must contain 34 gallons by the statute 1 William and Mary c. 24. and the higher measures in proportion.

In those of the United States, which have not adopted the statutes of William and Mary, and of Anne before cited, nor their substance, the wine gallon, of 231 cubic inches, rests on the authority of very long usage, before the 5th of Anne, the origin and foundation of which are unknown. The bushel is the Winchester bushel, by the 11 Henry VII. undefined; and the barrel of ale, 32 gallons, and of beer 36 gallons by the statute 23 Henry VIII. c. 4.

The secretary of state is not informed whether there have been any and what alterations of these measures, by the laws of the particular states.

It is proposed to retain this series of measures, but to fix the gallon to one determinate capacity, as the unit of measure, both wet and dry: for the convenience is in favor of abolishing the distinction, even between wet and dry measures.

The wine gallon, whether of 224 or 231 cubic inches, may be altogether disregarded, as concerning, principally, the mercantile, and the wealthy, the least numerous part of society, and the most capable of reducing one measure to another by calculation. This gallon is little used among the mass of farmers, whose chief habits and interests are in the size of the corn bushel.

Of the standard measures before stated, two are principally distinguished in authority and practice. The statute bushel of 2150 cubic inches, which gives a gallon of 268.75 cubic inches, and the standard gallon of 1601, called the corn gallon, of 271 or 272 cubic inches; which has introduced the mercantile bushel of 2176 inches. The former of these is most used in some of the grain states, the latter in others. The middle term, of 270 cubic inches, may be taken as a mutual compromise of convenience, and as offering this general advantage, that the bushel being of 2160 cubic inches, is exactly a cubic foot and a quarter, and so facilitates the conversion of wet and dry measures into solid contents and tonnage, and simplifies the connexion of measures and weights, as will be shewn hereafter. It may be added in favor of this, as a medium measure, that eight of the standard or statute measures, before enumerated, are below this term, and nine above it.

The measure to be made for use, being four-sided, with rectangular sides and bottom.

The pint will be 3 inches square and 3 3-4 inches deep; the quart 3 inches square and 7 1-2 inches deep; the pottle 3 inches square and 15 inches deep, or 4 1-2, 5, and 6 inches; the gallon 6 inches square and 7 1-2 inches deep; or 5, 6, and 9 inches; the peck 6, 9, and 10 inches; the half-bushel 12 inches square and 7 1-2 inches deep; and the bushel 12 inches square, and 15 inches deep, or 9, 15 and 16 inches.

Cylindrical measures have the advantage of superior strength: but square ones have the greater advantage of enabling every one, who has a rule in his pocket, to verify their contents, by measuring them. Moreover, till the circle can be squared, the cylinder cannot be cubed, nor its contents exactly expressed in figures.

Let the measures of capacity then, for the United States, be,

A gallon of 270 cubic inches; the gallon to contain two pottles; the pottle two quarts; the quart two pints; the pint 4 gills: 2 gallons to make a peck; 8 gallons a bushel or firkin; 2 bushels of firkins, a strike or kilderkin; 2 strikes or kilderkins, a coomo or barrel; 2 cooms or barrels, a quarter of a hoghead; a hoghead and a third one tierce; 2 hogheads a pipe, butt, or puncheon; and 2 pipes a ton.

And let all measures of capacity, of dry subjects, be stricken with a strat stroke.

Weights.—There are two sorts of weights in use among us—the one called avoirdupois, the other troy.

In the avoirdupois series, the pound is divided into sixteen ounces; the ounce into sixteen drams; the dram into four quarters.

In the troy series, the pound is divided into twelve ounces; the ounce, according to the subdivision of the apothecaries, into 8 drams; the dram into 3 scruples; the scruple into 20 grains.

According to the subdivision for gold and silver, the ounce is divided into 20 penny-weight; and the penny-weight into 24 grains.

So that the pound troy contains 5760 grains, of which, 7,000 are requisite to make the pound avoirdupois; of course the weight of the pound troy is to that of the pound avoirdupois, as 5760 to 7000, or as 144 to 175.

It is remarkable, that this is exactly the proportion of the ancient liquid gallon of Guildhall, of 224 cubic inches, to the corn gallon of 272; for 224 are to 272, as 144 to 175 (4.)

It is further remarkable still, that this is also the exact proportion between the specific weight, of any measure of wheat, and of the same measure of water. For the statute bushel is of 64 pounds of wheat. Now as 144 to 175, so are 64lb. to 77.7lb. but 77.7lb. is known to the weight of (5.) 2150.4 cubic inches of pure water; which is exactly the content of the Winchester bushel, as declared by the statute 13. 14. W. 3. That statute determined the bushel to be a cylinder of 18 1-2 inches diameter, and 3 inches depth. Such a cylinder, as nearly as it can be cubed, and expressed in figures, contains 2150.425 cubic inches; a result, which reflects authority on the declaration of parliament, and induces a favorable opinion of the care with which they invested the contents of the ancient bushel, and also a belief, that there might exist evidence of it at that day, unknown to the committees of 1758 and 1759.

We find then in a continued proportion, 64 to 77.7 as 224 to 272, and as 144 to 175, that is to say, the specific weight of a measure of wheat to that of the same measure of water, as the cubic contents of the wet-gallon, to those of the dry; and as the weight of a pound troy to that of a pound avoirdupois.

This seems to have been so combined as to render it indifferent whether a thing were dealt out by weight or measure; for the dry gallon of wheat, and the liquid one of wine were of the same weight; and the avoirdupois pound of wheat, and the troy pound of wine, were of the same measure. Water and the vinous liquors, which enter most into commerce, are so nearly of a weight, that the difference, in moderate quantities, would be neglected by both buyer and seller; some of the wines being a little heavier, and some a little lighter than water.

Another remarkable correspondence is that between weights and solid measures. For 1000 ounces avoirdupois of pure water, fills a cubic foot, with mathematical exactness.

What circumstances of the times, or purposes of barter or commerce, called for this combination of weights and measures, with the subjects to be exchanged or purchased, are not now to be ascertained. But a triple set of exact proportionals, representing weights, measures, and the things to be weighed and measured, and a relation so integral, between weights and solid measures, must have been the result of design and scientific calculation, and not a mere coincidence of hazard. It proves, that the dry and wet measures, the heavy and light weights, must have been original parts of the system they compose: contrary to the opinion of the committee of 1757—1758, who thought, that the avoirdupois weight was not an ancient weight of the kingdom, nor ever even a legal weight, but during a single year of the reign of H. 8. and therefore, concluded, otherwise than will be here proposed, to suppress it altogether. Their opinion was founded chiefly on the silence of the laws, as to this weight. But the harmony here developed in the system of weights and measures, of which the avoirdupois makes an essential member, corroborated by a general use, from very high antiquity, of that, or of a nearly similar weight under another (6.) name, seem stronger proofs, that this is a legal weight, than the mere silence of the written laws is of the contrary.

Be this as it may, it is in such general use with us, that, on the principal of popular convenience, its higher denominations, at least, must be preserved. It is by the avoirdupois pound and ounce, that our citizens have been used to buy and sell. But the smaller subdivisions of drams and quarters, are not in use with them. On the other hand, they have been used to weigh their money and medicine with the penny-weights and grains troy-weight, and are not in the habit of using the pounds and ounces of that series. It would be for their convenience, then, to suppress the pound and ounce troy, and the dram and quarter avoirdupois; and to form into one series the avoirdupois pound and ounce, and the troy penny-weight and grain. The avoirdupois ounce contains 18 penny-weights 5 1-2 grains troy-weight. Divide it then into 18 penny-weights, and the penny-weight, as heretofore, into 24 grains; and the new penny-weight will contain between a third and a quarter of a grain more than the present troy penny-weight; or, more accurately, it will be to that, as 875 to 864, a difference not to be noticed, either in money or medicine, below the denomination of an ounce.

But it will be necessary to refer these weights to a determinate mass of some substance, the specific gravity of which is invariable. Rain-water is such a substance, and may be referred to every where, and through all time. It has been found, by accurate experiments, that a cubic foot of rain-water weighs 1000 ounces avoirdupois, standard weight of the exchequer. It is true, that among the standard weights, the committee report small variations; but this experiment must decide in favor of those particular weights, between which and an integral mass of water, so remarkable a coincidence has been found. To render this standard more exact, the water should be weighed always in the same temperature of air; as heat, by increasing its volume, lessens its specific gravity. The cellar of uniform temperature is best for this also.

Let it then be established, that an ounce is of the weight of a cube of rain water, of one-tenth of a foot, or rather, that it is the thousandth part of the weight of a cubic foot of rain-water, weighed in the standard temperature; that the series of weights of the United States shall consist of pounds, ounces, penny-weights, and grains; whereof 24 grains shall be one penny-weight, 18 penny-weights one ounce, 16 ounces one pound.

Coins.—Congress in 1786 established the money unit at 375.64 troy grains of pure silver. It is proposed to enlarge this, by about the third of a grain, in weight, or a mill, in value; that is to say, to establish at 376 (or, more exactly, 376.02985) instead of 375.64 grains; because it will be shown thus, as the unit of coin, will link in system with the units of length, surface, capacity, and weight, whenever it shall be thought proper to extend the decimal ratio through all these branches. It is to preserve the possibility of doing this, that this very minute alteration is proposed.

We have this proportion, then, £75 to 864, as 376.02985 grains troy to 371,30251, the expression of the unit in the new grains.

Let it be declared, therefore, that the money unit, or dollar of the United States, shall contain 371.3 American grains of pure silver.

If nothing more then be proposed, than to render uniform and stable the system we already possess, this may be effected on the plan herein detailed; the sum of which is, 1. That the present measure of length be retained and fixed by an invariable standard: 2. That the measures of surface remain as they are, and be invariable also, as the measures of length, to which they are to refer: 3. That the unit of capacity, now so equivocal, be settled at a medium and convenient term, and defined by the same invariable measures of length: 4. That the more known terms, in the two kinds of weights, be retained, and reduced to one series; and that they be referred to a definite mass of some substance, the specific gravity of which never changes: And 5. That the quantity of pure silver in the money unit be expressed in parts of weights so defined.

In the whole of this, no change is proposed, except an insensible one in the troy grain and penny-weight, and the very minute one in the money unit.

II. But if it be thought that, either now or at any future time, the citizens of the United States may be induced to undertake a thorough reformation of their whole system of measures, weights and coins, reducing every branch to the same decimal ratio already established in their coins, and thus bringing the calculation of the principal affairs of life within the arithmetic of every man, who can multiply and divide plain numbers, greater changes will be necessary.

The unit of measure is still that which must give law through the whole system: and from whatever unit we set out, the coincidences between the old and new ratios will be rare. All that can be done, will be to choose such an unit as will produce the most of these. In this respect, the second rod has been found, on trial, to be far preferable to the second pendulum.

Measures of length.—Let the second rod, then, as before described, be the standard of measure; and let it be divided into five equal parts, each of which shall be called a foot: for, perhaps, it may be better generally to retain the name of the nearest present measure, where there is one tolerably near. It will be about one quarter of an inch shorter than the present foot.

Let the foot be divided into 10 inches; the inch into 10 lines; the line into 10 points: let ten feet make a decal; 10 decads a rood; 10 roods a furlong; 10 furlongs a mile.

Superficial measures.—Superficial measures have been estimated, and so may continue to be, in squares of the measures of length, except in the case of lands, which have been estimated by squares, called roods and acres. Let the rood be equal to a square, every side of which is 100 feet. This will be 5,483 English feet less, than the English (7.) rood every way, and 1311 square feet less in its whole contents, that is to say, about one-eighth; in which proportion also, 4 roods will be less than the present acre.

Measures of capacity.—Let the unit of capacity be the cubic foot, to be called a bushel. It will contain 1620.23 cubic inches, English; be about one fourth less than that before proposed to be adopted as a medium; one-tenth less than the bushel made from 8 of the Guildhall gallons; and one-fourteenth less than the bushel made from 8 Irish gallons, of 217.6 cubic inches.

Let the bushel be divided into 10 pottles; each pottle into 10 demi-pints, each demi-pint into 10 metres, which will be of a cubic inch each.

Let 10 bushels be a quarter, and 10 quarters a last or double ton.

The measures for use being foursided, and the sides and bottoms rectangular, the bushel will be a foot cube.

The pottle 5 inches square and 4 inches deep; the demi-pint 2 inches square, and 2 1-2 inches deep; the metre, an inch cube.

Weights.—Let the weight of a cubic inch of rain water, or the thousandth part of a cubic foot, be called an ounce; and let the ounce be divided into ten double scruples; the double scruple into ten carats; the carat into ten minims, or demi-grains; the minim into ten mites. Let ten ounces make a pound; ten pounds a stone; ten stones a kental; ten kentals a hogshead.

Coins.—Let the money unit, or dollar, contain eleven-twelfths of an ounce of pure silver. This will be 376 troy grains (or, more exactly, 376,92985 troy grains) which will be about a third of a grain (or, more exactly, .38995 of a grain) more than the present unit. This, with the twelfth alloy, already established, will make the dollar or unit, of the weight of an ounce, or of a cubic inch of rain-water exactly. The series of mills, cents, dimes, dollars, and eagles to remain as already established. (8.)

The second rod, or the second pendulum, expressed in the measures of other countries, will give the proportion between their measures and those of the United States.

Measures, weights, and coins, thus referred to standards unchangeable in their nature (as is the length of a rod vibrating seconds, and the weight of a definite mass of rain-water) will themselves be unchangeable. The standards too are such as to be accessible to all persons, in all times and places. The measures and weights derived from them fall in so nearly with some of those now in use, as to facilitate their introduction; and, being arranged in a decimal ratio, they are within the calculation of every one who possesses the first elements of arithmetic, and of easy comparison, both for foreigners and citizens, with the measures, weights, and coins of other countries.

A gradual introduction would lessen the inconveniences, which might attend too sudden a substitution, even of an easier, for a more difficult system. After a given term, for instance, it might begin in the custom-houses, where the merchants would become familiarized to it. After a farther term, it might be introduced into all legal proceedings; and merchants and traders in foreign commodities, might be required to use it in their dealings with one another. After a still further term, all other descriptions of people might receive it into common use. Too long a postponement, on the other hand, would encrease the difficulties of its reception with the encrease of our population.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Secretary of state.

APPENDIX:

Containing illustrations and developments of some passages of the preceding report.

(1.) In page 21. In the second pendulum, with a spherical bob, call the distance between the centres of suspension, and of the bob, 2×19.575 , or $2d$, and the radius of the bob $= r$, then $2d : r :: r : rr \div 2d$, and two-fifths of this last proportional expresses the displacement of the centre of oscillation, to wit, $\div 2r \times 2d = rr \div 5d$: two inches have been proposed as a proper diameter for such a bob. In that case r will be $= 1$ inch, and $rr \div 2d = 1 \div 97.375$ inches.

In the cylindrical second rod, call the length of the rod 3×19.575 , or $3d$, and its radius $= r$, and $rr \div 2 \times 3d = rr \div 6d$ will express the displacement of the centre of oscillation. It is thought, the rod will be sufficiently inflexible, if it be one-fifth of an inch in diameter. Then r will be $= 1$ inch, and $rr \div 6d = 1 \div 117.45$ inches, which is but the 120th part of the displacement in the case of the pendulum, with a spherical bob; and but the 689,710th part of the whole length of the rod. If the rod be even of half an inch diameter, the displacement will be but $\frac{1}{1379}$ of an inch, or $\frac{1}{119335}$ of the length of the rod.

(2.) Page 21. Sir Isaac Newton computes the pendulum for 45 deg. to be 36 pouces 8,428 lignes. Picard made the English foot 11 pouces 2.6 lignes, and Dr. Maskelyne 11 pouces 3.11 lignes. D'Alembert states it at 11 pouces 3 lignes, which has been used in these calculations as a middle term, and gives us pouces 36, lignes 8,428—39,1491 inches. This length for the pendulum of 45 deg. had been adopted in this report before the bishop of Autun's proposition was known here. He relies on Mairan's ratio for the length of the pendulum in the latitude of Paris, to wit, $504 : 237 :: 72$ pouces to a 4th proportional, which will be pouces 36,71428—39,1619 inches, the length of the pendulum for latitude 48 deg. 50. The difference between this and the pendulum for 45 deg. is .0113 of an inch: so that the pendulum for 45 deg. would be estimated, according to Mairan, at $39.1619.0113 = 39.1506$ inches, almost precisely the same with Newton's computation herein adopted.

A passenger in the Sabine from France reports the receipt of letters there from England, stating the ministry had rejected the proposition of Russia. A Copenhagen paper of the 6th July says, that the 4th of July was duly celebrated on board the ship Neptune.

A public dinner was given to com. Bainbridge at Portland, about twelve days ago. The company was mixed, "all federalists, all republicans." Among the guests were William Gray, esq. Tobias Lear, and major Saelling—After dinner, the following, with many other, American toasts were drank:

The American people.—Love to their country, respect to its rights, and protection to its flag.

The naval heroes of our revolutionary war.—A year of glory has passed, a year of triumph comes.

The constitution of our nation on the land, and its CONSTITUTION on the ocean.

The American nation.—We do not, and ought not to assume attributes of omnipotence; but we can and will with our united energies, have our weight in the scale of nations.

Com. Wm. BAINBRIDGE.—Brave, generous, and humane. While the American nation can boast such commanders, her eagle will never want a laurel wreath to her crest.

By the hon Wm. GRAY.—Our army and navy.—May peace be the harvest of their toils.

By T. LEAR, Esq.—The brilliant achievements of the American navy.—The pride of its nation and dread of its foes.

The following is an advertisement copied from a Philadelphia paper of the 3rd inst.—

"New loan of $7,500,000. The subscribers intend forwarding proposals for the new loan, and will receive the orders of their friends and others, desirous of being interested therein, until 6 o'clock, P. M. on the 21st inst. McEwen, Hale & Davidson."

A New-London paper says—"It is said the Torpedo from New-York was chased on Friday last nine miles by several British boats, but by frequent diving escaped. The prisoners who were landed on Sunday say, that guard boats were kept constantly rowing round the ships during the night.

Employment of the Indians. We are glad that something, of shame or fear, has at length induced the British government in Canada to shew a disposition to soften and restrain the barbarities of their allies. But the horrible enormities they have provoked their miserable tools to commit, cannot be obliterated. Faithful history shall record the savage fact, that the representatives of a people affecting to be civilized, did suspend, in the hall of legislation, near to the mace, a HUMAN SCALP.

But murders are still committed; and Malden is yet the market place for scalps.

BRITISH GENERAL ORDERS. Head Quarters, Kingston, July 20, 1813. The commander in chief of the forces has had under his consideration the report of a board of officers, of which brig. gen. Vincent was president, assembled by his excellency's orders, at the head quarters of the centre division of the army of St. Davids, on the 20th of July, 1813, for the purpose of considering the claims of the Indian warriors in regard to head money for prisoners of war brought in by them, and to the propriety of some provision being made for those who may be disabled on service. With a view to soften and restrain the Indian warriors in their conduct towards such Americans as may be made by them prisoners of war, his excellency is pleased to approve of the following arrangements, submitted by that board, and directs that the same may be acted upon, viz.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Russian mediation. The subject as noticed in our last (page 5) requires us to say, that the Boston editor who was to "move" the act of Mr. Daschkoff "unauthorised," gets over it by saying that his assertion is as good as that of the editor of the Intelligence!

The proceedings of a council with the several Indian warriors, assembled at the Forty Mile Creek, on the 27 ult. having been presented to the board, it is of opinion that upon the subject of head money upon prisoners of war brought in by Indians, allowance should be made to them for each prisoner brought in alive of five dollars.

The board is of opinion the following rates of pensions are sufficient:—

To a chief, for loss of eye, limb, or receiving a wound equal to loss of limb—100 dollars per annum, in money or presents.

To a warrior, for loss of eye, limb, or receiving a wound equal to loss of limb—70 dollars per annum, in money or presents.

To the widow or family of a chief killed in action, or dying of his wounds—a present of 200 dollars, in money or goods.

To the widow or family of a warrior, killed in action or dying of his wounds—a present of 140 dollars, in money or goods.

The board is of opinion the Indians ought to be entitled to prize money for the capture of Detroit in the following proportion—

Chiefs as subalterns—warriors as privates.

The head money for prisoners of war brought in by the Indian warriors, is to be immediately paid by the commissaries, upon the certificate of the general officer commanding the division with which they are acting at the time.

CASE OF JOSHUA PENNY.

Joshua Penny, of Long Island, was seized in his bed, by a party of British, from the Ramities, carried on board of that vessel, and put into irons. The following correspondence explains the grounds on which commodore Hardy justifies the procedure, &c. He seems mightily afraid of torpedoes. If the facts he states are true [we are not informed whether they are or not] what are we to think of the patriotism of some folks on Long-Island, seeing the most minute things are communicated to the enemy?

[COPY.]

Sir Thomas Hardy, commander of H. B. M. squadron off Gardner's island.

Sir—The inhabitants of the town of East-Hampton have requested of me a flag, which I now authorise, for the purpose of demanding Joshua Penny, a natural born citizen of the township of Southold on this island, and a resident of the town of East-Hampton.

He is demanded as a non-combatant, being attached to no vessel as a mariner or corps military whatever, but was taken by force by your men from his bed in his own house unarmed.

The bearer of this flag is lieutenant Hedges, an officer under my command, in government service. You will have the goodness to deliver Mr. Penny to lieutenant Hedges; as he cannot consistently be retained as a prisoner of war by any article in the cartel agreed on, ratified and confirmed by the agents of each of our governments for the exchange of prisoners.

Given under my hand, at the garrison of Sag-Harbor, this 23d of August, 1813.

BENJ. CASE, m.j. commanding the troops in the U. S. service at Sag-Harbor.

[COPY.]

His Britannic Majesty's ship Ramities, in Gardner's Bay, August 25d, 1813.

Sir—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this day's date, and as I do not wish to detain lieutenant Hedges, the bearer of your flag, I will do myself the honor of replying to your letter to-morrow by a flag of truce.

I have the honor to be, sir, your very humble servant,

THOMAS M. HARDY, Captain.

To major Case, commanding the troops, in the United States service, at Sag-Harbor.

[COPY.]

His Britannic Majesty's ship Ramities, Gardner's Bay, 24th Aug. 1813.

Sir—As it was late yesterday afternoon when I had the honor of receiving your letter of the 23d instant, requesting the release of Joshua Penny, I did not judge it proper to detain lieutenant Hedges for my reply.

I now beg leave to inform you, I had received certain information that this man conducted a detachment of boats, sent from the United States squadron, under the command of commodore Decatur, now lying in New-London, from that port to Gardner's-island, on the 26th July last, for the express purpose of surprising and capturing the captain of his Britannic majesty's frigate Orpheus and myself, and having failed in that undertaking, but making prisoners of some officers and men, belonging to the Orpheus, he went with the remaining boats to Three Mile Harbor. The next account I had of him, was his being employed in a boat contrived for the purpose, under the command of Thomas Welling, prepared with a torpedo, to destroy this ship, and that he was in her at Napeaug Beach, when this ship and the Orpheus were in Fort Pond Bay, last week. He has also had a certificate given him on the 18th of this month, by some of the respectable inhabitants of East-Hampton, recommending him to commodore Decatur, as a fit person to be employed on a particular service, by him, and that he has for some time been entered on the books of one of the frigates, at 40 dollars per month; add to which, this notorious character has been recognized by some of the officers and men of this ship, as having been on board here two or three times, with clams and fruit; of course, as a spy, to collect information of our movements. Having been made so well acquainted with the conduct of this man for the last six weeks, and the purpose for which he has been so actually employed in hostilities against his Britannic majesty, I cannot avoid expressing my surprise that the inhabitants of East-Hampton, should have attempted to enforce on you a statement so contrary to fact. I, therefore, cannot think of permitting such an avowed enemy to be out of my power, when I know so much of him as I do. He will, therefore, be detained as a prisoner of war, until the pleasure of the commander in chief is known.

Robert Gray, an inoffensive old man, who was taken with Penny, I have landed, as it does not appear that he is one of his accomplices in the transactions I have alluded to.

I think proper to enclose a copy of my letter to justice Terry, to warn the inhabitants of the coast against permitting the torpedo to remain any where near them. I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

THOMAS M. HARDY, Captain

of his B. M.'s ship Ramities.

Maj. Benj. Case, commanding the troops in the U. S. service, at Sag-Harbor.

[COPY.]

His Majesty's ship Ramities, off New-London, Aug. 23, 1813.

Sir—Having received positive information that a whale-boat, the property of Thomas Welling and others, prepared with a torpedo, for the avowed purpose of destroying this ship, a mode of warfare practised by individuals from mercenary motives and more novel than honorable, is kept in your neighborhood, and as from the very good information I obtain from various sources, there is no doubt these persons will soon be in my power, I beg you to warn the inhabitants of the towns along the coast of Long-Island, that wherever I hear this boat or any other of her description has been allowed to remain after this day, I will order every house near the shore to be destroyed.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
(Signed) THOMAS M. HARDY, Capt.

— Terry, esq. justice of the peace,
Southold, Long-Island.

MILITARY

Gathering on the borders. The forces at Burlington, Sackett's Harbor, Fort George, and at Fort Meigs, &c. were mentioned in our last. An extraordinary degree of military movement is apparent in every quarter. We have heard, during the present week of at least 3,000 regulars, in detachments, at Schenectady and Troy, N. Y. Portland, Maine, Wilmington, D. Elkton, Md. &c. proceeding to the north, where the force must be imposing in a few days. Georgia has 2,500 men in the Creek country, and the people of Tennessee have their rifles ready to co-operate on the other side. Detachments of regulars were also marching from that state and from Kentucky for the N. W. army, which it is probable Gov. Shelby has reached before this with from 3 to 4,000 volunteers. Ohio is also organizing another body of 2,000 men.

The Canadian papers say that the 103rd royal regiment, is ordered to the West-Indies in punishment for the frequent desertions of the men. The regiment lost 42 men, in this way, at Plattsburgh.

At a meeting of the militia in Laurens district (S. C.) on Saturday the 14th ult. for the purpose of dealing the militia of that state, never was there a greater specimen of patriotism, since the American Revolution, exhibited than on that occasion; Sir Parsons volunteered their services to defend their country, out of one captain's bear, to go to class No. 1.

Extract of a letter from Fort George, dated August 29.

"The attack of the 23d inst. was made by the whole of the enemy's force; with the intention, no doubt, should he fail in an attempt upon our entrenchments, to draw us into the woods. General Williams, with a part of his brigade advanced some distance into the plain; but it was considered inexpedient to allow him to pursue into the woods.

"The fleet is hourly expected, with gen. Wilkinson on board. The enemy's fleet has for some days been hovering off this coast."

Extract of a letter from an officer of the North-western army, dated at head-quarters, Seneca tower, August 29th, 1813.

"We shall embark before the 15th of September, with upwards of 5000 troops, regulars and militia."

NAVAL.

A cartel has arrived at Providence from Barbadoes, with 205 American prisoners. Among them are 45 seamen who had been impressed and discharged—twelve of them were in slavery five years. They refused to do duty, and after being lashed and slashed for their obstinacy until the enemy was tired of his own barbarism, they were thrown into prison. "Magnanimous English!" By some of these, a gentleman of Providence has heard of his brother, long since given up as being in the world of spirits, who was impressed eighteen years ago, and is yet retained!

The Liverpool Packet, capt. Nichols, from Lisbon for this port (says the Boston Gazette of Sept. 2.) captured some time since by the Salem privateer Castigator, and carried into that port, was yesterday, by the decision of judge Davis, restored, vessel and cargo to the owner, with costs and damages—We understand the captors appealed.

Extract of a letter from an officer in command on lake Ontario, to his friend in this city, dated, Sackett's Harbor, August 27, 1813.

"One of the pilots and some of the men from Mr Trant's vessel who was taken in our late rencontre with sir James Yeo, have arrived here; they made their escape from Kingston and brought off their guard with them. The pilot states that our fire in that instance proved very destructive and that the Wolf (sir James' flag ship) was very much cut to pieces. They could not ascertain the loss of men, because the prisoners were hurried below as soon as they came on board, and were not permitted to come on deck until all was clear the morning after the action. He says the British officers speak highly of our conduct on that occasion, and of the desperate valor of Trant and Deacon, although in their official account they have thought proper to give a different construction. He says that Mr. Trant did not surrender until within half pistol shot. The enemy then told him to strike or they would sink him. His answer was, "fire away, I am loading my two long Toms," which he did, and in that situation fired his guns double charged, with great effect. Lieutenant Deacon, with a perseverance not to be surpassed, tacked and run down their line, and would have escaped, had not the rear vessel unfortunately cut away his halyards and rigging in such a way as to leave him a mere unmanageable wreck. Eckford (the master builder) has built and launched a new schooner in 21 days. She is now ready to proceed with us on our cruise, and I trust in God, before we return, we shall have better luck than we have had. Sir James must look to it. The winds will not always favor him."

Commodore Chauncey did not sail on the 26th ult. but on the 28th. We have a letter from Sackett's Harbor of the latter date, which says, "the fleet is now getting under way." Nat. Int.

COMMODORE RODGERS.—Falmouth, (E.) June 23. Arrived this morning, the Duke of Montrose Packet, Bluett. She sailed from here on the 18th ultimo with mails for Halifax, and was captured on the 12th inst. in lat. 47, 40, N. long. W. 31, 30, by the United States frigate President, commodore Rodgers, which had also captured the ships Kitty, captain Love, and Maria, captain Ball, from Newfoundland, bound to the Mediterranean; the former on the 9th inst. the latter on the same day as the Packet.—Commodore R. having assembled the officers of the Packet and masters of the above vessels agreed to send the Duke of Montrose to England as a cartel, to which captain Bluett and others signed an instrument.

London, July 10.—We have news from commodore Rodgers, and we hope that the President will share the fate of the Chesapeake. Commodore Rodgers was upon the coast of Norway. He took in water at Bergen, and left that place with the intention to capture some vessels from Greenland. We are told an English ship of the line and a frigate are upon that station.

July 13.—Two frigates passed Yarmouth yesterday, it was supposed in pursuit of the American commodore Rodgers.

The Essex frigate.—A letter from Mr G. Miller, American vice-consul at Buenos Ayres, gives the following account of the Essex, which is the last certain intelligence we have of her, though since its date she may have arrived in the Rio del Platte, as has been reported—it is dated May 8:—"The United States frigate Essex, arrived at Valparaisa, on the 6th of March. The Essex, it is to be hoped, will place our trade in that quarter on a more respectable footing than it has hitherto been. Captain Porter, it is said, seized a Lima privateer and threw her guns overboard, and left her men and provisions to carry her to Lima, with a letter to the vice king, demanding the immediate restoration of all the ships that had been taken by the privateer under his orders, or that he would proceed to hostilities. Both English and Americans are pleased at this attempt to adjust a villainous system of piracy. Seven American vessels have been seized in Port Conception by the Lima privateer, and an American ship from this place, called the Boriskah, of Baltimore, has been carried into Lima and condemned.

Valparaisa is on the coast of Chili. From another source we learn that captain Porter had fitted out the brig Colt of New-York, and that she was cruising with him.

A letter from Rio Janeiro of the 27th June, informs that the frigate Phœbe, carrying 46 guns, the Che-rub, 28, and the Raccoon 26, were about to proceed on a voyage round Cape Horn in search of the Essex—and that they also designed to proceed to the Columbia river, and take possession of the settlement there.

The squadron blockading New-London are said to be fully supplied with all sorts of live stock.

A cartel schooner, despatched by our minister at the Brazilian coast, with 56 American prisoners, has arrived at New-York from Rio Janeiro.

Ransoming vessels—The British, dear lovers of commerce, are carrying on quite a brisk trade among the eastern coasters. Off Cape Ann, on the 38th ult. they captured three coasters and six fishing boats, and sent the masters on shore for money to ransom them at 200 dollars—so they go on. It has been fashionable for our privateers-men to despise—as too mean and pitiful, the West-India drogers, unless laden with good cargoes; but the "magnanimous" example of the enemy may open a market for them hereafter; or British like, lead them to destroy "every thing that swims."

Business on a large scale!—A fishing boat was captured by the Nymph frigate off the Eastern coast; the master detained as a hostage for the payment of fifty dollars, the sum required as the ransom of the vessel. This is the meanest of all the mean and pitiful things we have yet heard of. E. P. Eswoorn, is the name of the captain of the Nymph.

The United States brig Argus, with Mr. Crawford our minister to France, has arrived at L'Orient. This intelligence is brought by the very valuable schooner Sabine of Baltimore, arrived at Gloucester, (Ms.) from Nantz.

A gentleman who has been on board the Nymph frigate says she carries 54 guns, and is fitted out in the best possible manner, for the purpose of meeting the Constitution, as soon as she leaves the port.

Razees—As several razees are fitting out in England for the purpose of having something not called a ship of the line, that may beat our frigates, the following view of their comparative force may be interesting, as complimentary to the skill of our seamen:

The Majestic (razee) mentioned in our last, carries—

28 long 32 pounders	-	-	lbs. 896
28 42 lb. carronades	-	-	1232
2 brass 12 pounders	-	-	24

Whole weight of metal lbs. 2152

The President, Constitution and United States frigates carry:—

30 long 24 pounders (which, however, really discharge only 22lb. shot) but we count them as 24's	-	-	720
24 52 lb. carronades which carry balls weighing only 29lb. 7 oz. though estimated as 32's	-	-	768

Difference in favor of the razee lbs. 664
Or nearly one half of the whole force of our frigates.

In testimony of further respect to the memory of Lawrence, the sloop of war building at New-York is to be called the "Peacock."

SHANNON AND CHESAPEAKE.

The following letter, or challenge, from captain Broke to captain Lawrence, has been published in the Port Folio. The official account of the capture of the Chesapeake, is re-translated from a Paris paper of July 20.

Letter from capt. Broke to capt. Lawrence.
His Britannic Majesty's ship Shannon, off Boston, June, 1813.

Sir—As the Chesapeake appears now ready for sea, I request you will do me the favor to meet the Shannon with her, ship to ship, to try the fortune of our respective flags. To an officer of your character it requires some apology for proceeding to further particulars. Be assured, sir, that, it is not from any doubt I can entertain of your wishing to close with my proposal, but merely to provide an answer to any objection which might be made, and very reasonably, upon the chance of our receiving unfair support.

After the diligent attention to which we had paid to commodore Rodgers; the pains I took to detach all force but the Shannon and Tenedos to such a distance that they could not possibly join in any action fought in sight of the capes; and the various verbal messages which had been sent into Boston to that effect; we were much disappointed to find the commodore had eluded us by sailing on the first change after the prevailing easterly winds had obliged us to keep an offing from the coast. He perhaps wished for some stronger assurance of a fair meeting. I am therefore induced to address you more particularly, and to assure you that what I write I pledge my honor to perform to the utmost of my power.

The Shannon mounts twenty-four guns upon her broadside, and one light boat gun; eighteen pounders on her main deck and thirty two pound cannonades on her quarter deck and fore-castle; and is manned with a complement of 300 men and boys (a large proportion of the latter) besides thirty seamen, boys and passengers, who were taken out of recaptured vessels lately. I am this minute, because a report has prevailed in some of the Boston papers that we had one hundred and fifty men, additional, lent us from the La Hogue, which really never was the case. La Hogue is now gone to Halifax for provisions, and I will send all other ships beyond the power of interfering with us, and meet you wherever it is most agreeable to you, within the limits of the under-mentioned rendezvous, viz.

From six to ten leagues east of Cape Cod light house, from eight to ten leagues east of Cape Ann's light, on Cash's ledge in lat. 43 nor. at any bearing and distance you please to fix off the south breakers of Nantucket, or the shoal on St. George's bank.

If you will favor me with any plan of signals or telegraph, I will warn you (if sailing under this promise) should any of my friends be too high or any where in sight, until I can detach them out of my way; or, I would sail with you under a flag of truce to any place you think safest from our cruisers, hauling it down when fair to begin hostilities.

You must, sir, be aware that my proposals are highly advantageous to you, as you cannot proceed to sea singly in the Chesapeake without imminent risk of being crushed by the superior force of the numerous British squadrons which are now abroad, where all your efforts, in case of a rencontre, would, however gallant, be perfectly hopeless. I entreat you, sir, not to imagine that I am urged by mere personal vanity to the wish of meeting the Chesapeake; or that I depend only upon your personal ambition for your acceding to this invitation:—we have both nobler motives. You will feel it as a compliment if I say, that the result of our meeting may be the most grateful service I can render to my country; and I doubt not that you, equally confident of success, will feel convinced, that it is only the repeated triumphs in even combats, that your little navy can now hope to console your country for the loss of that trade it can no longer protect. Favor me with a speedy reply. We are short of provisions and water and cannot stay long here.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient humble servt. (Signed) P. B. V. BROKE,

Captain of H. B. M. ship Shannon.

N. B. For the general service of watching your coast, it is requisite for me to keep another ship in company, to support me with her guns and boats when employed near the land, and particularly to aid each other if either ship in chase should get on shore. You must be aware that I cannot, consistently with my duty, waive so great an advantage for this general service, by detaching my consort, without an assurance on your part of meeting me directly; and that you will neither seek nor admit aid from any other of your armed vessels, if I detach mine expressly for the sake of meeting you. Should any special order restrain you from thus answering a formal challenge, you may yet oblige me by keeping my proposal a secret, and appointing any place you like to meet us (within three hundred miles of Boston) in a given number of days after you sail; as unless you agree to an interview, I may be busied on other service, and perhaps be at a distance from Boston when you go to sea. Choose your terms—but let us meet.

To the commander of the U. S. ♀ frigate Chesapeake. ♀

Enclosure on the envelope.

We have thirteen American prisoners on board, which I will give you for as many British sailors, if you will send them out, otherwise, being privateersmen, they must be detained.

British official account of the capture of the Chesapeake
LONDON, July 12.

Despatch of capt. Broke, commanding the frigate Shannon.

Halifax, 6th June, 1813.—I have the honor to inform you that being on the first of this month near the light house of Boston, I had the pleasure to see that the United States' frigate Chesapeake, which we had been watching for a long time, was coming out from port to give battle to the Shannon. I placed myself between Cape Ann and Cape Cod, and made sail afterwards to facilitate her coming up with us. The enemy bore down upon us in a brilliant style, having three American flags flying; and in nearing us lowered his royals. I kept the Shannon close to the wind, hoping that the wind might lull. At half past five the enemy hugged the wind, and came within hail of our starboard side. The action then commenced, the two ships steering under their topsails. After having exchanged two or three broad-sides, the enemy fell on board of us; her mizen blocks entangled in our fore rigging. I went on the fore-castle to ascertain her situation; and seeing that the enemy had abandoned her guns, I gave orders to get ready for boarding. Our brave fellows chosen to execute this order, with their officers, precipitated themselves on the deck of the enemy; driving every thing before them with irresistible courage. The enemy fought desperately but in disorder.

The fire continued on the spar deck, and in the tops; but in the space of two minutes the enemy were driven sword in hand, from all their stations. The enemy's flag was struck.

I have to lament the loss of many brave men of my crew who died gloriously.

My brave first lieutenant, Mr. Watts, was killed at the moment he was hoisting the English flag. My Quarter-master Mr. Aldhan, who had volunteered to lead a detachment, was killed on the spar deck; and my old and faithful clerk, Mr. Duron, was killed by his side.

Having myself received a sabre wound at the beginning of the action, when charging a part of the enemy collected on the fore-castle, I could do no more than give orders until I was assured that victory was complete, I then directed my second lieutenant, Mr. Wallace, to take the command of the Shannon and secure the prisoners.

The enemy had about 70 killed and 100 wounded.

Our loss amounts to 24 killed, including officers, seamen, and marines.

[The Chesapeake had 48 killed and 98 wounded—the Shannon 26 killed and 58 wounded. RIG.]

BLOCKADE OF NEW-LONDON.

From a certain capt. John Fowler who was on board the Ramilies, we learn that Joshua Penny, mentioned above, was brought on board that ship "with his shirt torn from his back"—he was put in irons and confined in a dark place, with a small allowance of bread and water only. When persons with supplies came on board, which was very frequent, Mr. F. and other enemies were put below, lest they might recognize the persons engaged in the "trade."

Commodore Oliver, now commanding the squadron, having refused the request of Deccatur to permit the passage of the Henry to New-York with the bodies of Lawrence and Ludlow, they have been removed from Salem, to the navy-yard at Charleston, to be brought on by land, and are now on their way in covered carriages. "It is IMPOSSIBLE (says the Boston Centinel) that the warriors of Britain can be otherwise than MAGNANIMOUS and UNMANE!"

BLOCKADE OF THE CHESAPEAKE.

The enemy fleet, 30 sail, anchored in Lynhaven bay, Sept. 1. The whole force is reported to be five 74's, 11 frigates, 2 transports, 9 brigs and 10 schooners, in all 36 sail.

A brisk black trade is pursued by some of the enemy vessels in the bay. They have inveigled away many negroes, which they will smuggle into the West Indies and dispose of at enormous profits, as it becomes the humane supporters of "the shield of afflicted humanity." But on Sunday the 29th ult. it is stated that certain of the Princess Ann (Va.) militia, having blackened the faces of two of their companions sent them to the beach, while they (17 in number) concealed themselves behind the sand hills. The supposed blacks waved their handkerchiefs, and a boat with six men immediately put off from the Plantaganet, followed by two others full of men. "Just as the men from the first boat (says the Norfolk Herald) were preparing to land, one of those disguised in walking a few steps shewed his bare ankles which he omitted to blacken, when the enemy exclaimed—"White men in disguise by —! Let us push off," which they did, and at the same moment the militia ran out and fired upon them until they were out of gun-shot; they killed two out of the six. Had real negroes been made use of the deception would have been complete and effectual.

"The winds and seas are Britain's wide domain,
"And not a sail, but by permission spreads"
British Naval Register.

In estimating the actual bounty allowed to the Declar privateer (see page 16) we omitted the premium for the prisoners brought in, which is 25$ each. Of these—in her two prizes, there were about 70 persons, equal to $1750—making the whole bounty amount to $14,641.

The Saucy Jack has arrived at St. Mary's from her third cruise. Besides those noticed below, she captured the schooner Two Sisters, laden with flour and fish, ship Eliza of 10 guns, with flour, beef, &c. On the 17th inst. fell in with the ship Louisa and brig Three Brothers of 10 guns each, and captured them both, without loss, see below. The S. Jack also took and gave up some small vessels—she was the cause of the loss of the enemy sloop of war Persian, wrecked on the Silver Keys, June 29, in chasing the S. J.

529. Schooner Flying Fish, taken by the Saucy Jack and released after dispossessing her of goods to the value of $1000.

530. Sloop Catherine, laden with salt, taken by the Saucy Jack, and sent into Cape Henry, Hayti.

531. Schooner Kate, with salt fish, sent into ditto by ditto.

532. Ship Louisa, 10 guns, laden with coffee, taken by the Saucy Jack and burnt to prevent her falling into the hands of a British man of war in chase.

533. Brig Three Brothers, 10 guns, laden with 2,646 bags and 40 tierces of coffee, sent into St. Mary's by the Saucy Jack. (The bounty on the cargo with that for the prisoners brought in, will amount to more than $20,000.

Among the curious incidents that belong to privateering, we notice the fitting out of a three masted vessel, at Salem, called "TIMOTHY PICKERING," apparently for the chief purpose of seizing licensed vessels and other smugglers.

534. Brig Earl of Moira, from Liverpool for St. Andrews in ballast, sent into Machias by the industry of Marblehead.

535. Schooner ———, laden with a few hhds. of rum, sent into Eastport, by the privateer boat Terrible.

536, 537. Two enemy vessels, trading between the United States and the ports of Nova Scotia, sent into Machias by the privateer boats Folkar and Swiftsure, worth 5,000$. The "well inclined" captains made their escape, fearing the reward.

538. Schooner Louisa, of 203 tons, 1 gun and 26 men, from St. Vincents, for St. Johns, a first rate vessel, Baltimore built, sent into Newport, by the letter of marque schooner Expedition of Baltimore, being on board 100 hhds. rum and 50 bbls. sugar. (The bounty on this vessel and her crew is more than 4,000$.

539. Privateer King of Rome, captured and destroyed by the U. S. brig Argus, on her passage for France.

540. A ship laden with fish, sent into Bordeaux, by the United States frigate President, commodore Rodgers.

541. A schooner, sent into Bayonne by the same 542, 543, 544. Three vessels sent into France, by the True Blooded Yankee.

545, 546. Two vessels carried into France by the Leo, letter of marque.

547. A home-ward bound Indiaman captured by the Leo, worth £500,000—the Indiaman was retaken by a sloop of war, but the bullion she had on board, worth $60,000, was carried into France by the Leo.

548. Brig, captured by the Brutus letter of marque, on her passage to France and ransomed for $5,000. The Brutus also captured another vessel yet to hear of.

549. Schooner ———, captured by the General Armstrong on her passage to France and burnt.

Paupers.

In page 114, of the fourth volume, we inserted a table, compiled from acknowledged authorities, to shew the state of pauperism in England. By the facts then brought forward, it certainly appeared that one eighth of the whole population of England and Wales were regular paupers, in the year 1805; and reasons were given for the supposition that one fifth of the people was, in reality, sustained by exactions on the remainder.

To form something like an estimate of the number of paupers in the U. States, communications were requested; but as yet only one regular detail has come to hand. We are indebted for it to Joseph Engle, esq. of Delaware county, Pennsylvania; it is an abstract from the report of the Overseers of the poor, of that county, filed in his office, as follows—

"1812—1st Mo. 1. In the house this day	92
Admitted since	86
Born in the house this year	6
Namely, 132 whites and 52 colored people—total	184
Of which departed this life	22

Removed	10
Discharged	52
Eloped	10
<hr/>

"1813—1st Mo. 1. Remaining in the house this day

Average number of persons constantly maintained in the house this year	72
And the cost of boarding each per week, including all provisions used in the house, is	60 cts.
And clothing each	$ 3 p. ann.

The whole population of Delaware county, by the census of 1810, was 14,734 persons. Supposing the population to have remained stationary, though it has increased since then, it appears, that one person in every two hundred and five were paupers, the general average being 72. Comparing it with the English counties that have the smallest number of poor, the proportion of Delaware county should be 1029—if compared with those counties that have the greatest number, the ratio would stand at 3887—if with the average of all the counties of England and Wales, 1911. This is a comparison of regular paupers with regular paupers. Besides the poor houses, there are many asylums and hospitals for the poor, in England.

whose tenants, sustained by private institutions, do not appear in the fearful aggregate officially reported; and besides all these, the streets and roads are swarmed with beggars. In Delaware county there is no other asylum than the poor house, and mendicity is not permitted. There is not, we venture to say, one regular beggar, (i. e. a person that subsists by promiscuous charity) in the whole country; and the poor house contains only the "halt, the lame and the blind, the aged and the infirm," with a large proportion of children, as is evident from the statement.

It is by comparisons like these, that the American is taught to estimate the blessings he enjoys; and we could not let slip so good an opportunity to excite a spirit of patriotism, in all that will receive the truth.

I am of opinion that Delaware is surcharged with paupers—for in the adjoining county, New Castle, in the state of Delaware, which has a population of 24,429 souls, I think the average maintained does not exceed ninety. The poor house establishment of this county is among the noblest institutions of the kind in the world; where first and second child-hood receives the paternal care of a liberal administration. Such also, indeed, are all the institutions of enlightened Pennsylvania.

THE CHRONICLE.

We have cheering intelligence from South America. The particulars are not stated, but the following are given as facts—Montevideo was closely besieged by the patriot army May 20—the cause of liberty is well sustained in the provinces of Buenos Ayres—the patriotism of Chili is alert and active—Peru is decidedly opposed to royalty. In the provinces of Caracas, the flame of liberty burns with renewed vigor; the greater part of the country appears to be in the hands of the whigs—the capital city and port of Lagaira, we learn, have fallen before them.

There was a dreadful gale wind on the southern coast on the 27th of August, ult. It was felt with great violence at Charleston; damaging, staving to pieces, or driving "high and dry" many vessels—carrying away bridges, and destroying property to an extraordinary amount. Many persons were drowned in the vessels lost. But the West Indies in the latter end of July, say from the 25d to the 26, felt the hurricane!—At New Providence, upwards of 100 vessels, among them all the privateers, with 136 houses, were destroyed. At Barbadoes, many very valuable ships were dashed to pieces, among them some government vessels. It was believed that certain ships of war and a transport full of troops was lost at Martinico—21 sail of vessels and 50 lives were lost at St. Pierre's alone. At Guadaloupe the damage was terrible—15 sail were lost at St. Kitts. Domingo is said hardly to have a house standing; and many other islands suffered beyond calculation. The hurricane appears to have been exceedingly extensive and unusually violent.

It is stated that eight millions of dollars, and 7000 mile loads of the products of Mexico, have lately arrived at Havanna.

By a late arrival from France we learn that the armistice had been prolonged 30 days—the French emperor was then at Dresden, and the empress was about to leave Paris to join him at Mayence—these things have a pacific aspect. A letter from Nantz of the 23th July, says, the English have sent a minister to the congress—and that the general opinion there is in favor of a continental peace. But immense reinforcements are marching to the French army.

The French papers are filled with accounts of the marches of troops for the grand army. Hamburg is strengthened by very extensive works; many thousand persons are employed on the fortifications. The English have taken Passage, a sea-port of the north of Spain, near Bayonne. General Murray has raised the siege of Barragona, leaving his artillery [130 pieces] and ammunition behind him, being close pressed by Suchet. The duke of Dalmatia has gone into Spain, with a view to decide the present fate of that country by a general action. Bernadotte has not yet done any thing—but received his subsidy.

A Leipzig paper of June 8, announces that the emperors of France and Russia were to have had an interview on the 6th of that month at Giltzszm, in Boemia—where the emperor of Austria was also to be.

The Prussian paper currency has depreciated 70 per cent.

The Loan.

Treasury Department, August 26, 1813.

WHEREAS by an act of congress passed on the 2d day of August, 1813, the President of the United States is authorized to borrow, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding seven millions five hundred thousand dollars;

And whereas, the President of the United States did, by an act or commission under his hand dated the 7th day of August, 1813, authorize and empower the acting secretary of the treasury to borrow on behalf of the United States, the aforesaid sum of seven millions five hundred thousand dollars, pursuant to the act of congress above recited:

PUBLIC NOTICE IS THEREFORE HEREBY GIVEN, That proposals will be received by the acting secretary of the treasury, until the twenty-fifth day of September next, from any person or persons, body or bodies corporate, who may offer, for themselves or others, to loan to the United States, the whole or any part, not less than one hundred thousand dollars, of the aforesaid sum of seven millions five hundred thousand dollars.

The stock to be issued for the money loaned, will bear an interest of six per cent. per annum, payable quarter yearly, and the proposals must distinctly state the amount of money offered to be loaned, and the rate at which the aforesaid stock will be received for the same.

The amount loaned is to be paid into a bank or banks authorized by the treasury, in installments in the following manner, viz—

One eighth part or twelve dollars and fifty cents on each hundred dollars, on the 15th day of October next.

One eighth part on the 15th day of November next. One fourth part, or twenty-five dollars on each hundred dollars, on the 15th day of each of the ensuing months, of December, January and February next.

The proposals must specify the place where the money is to be paid.

If proposals differing in terms from one another should be accepted, the option will be allowed to any person whose proposals may be accepted, of taking the terms allowed to any other person whose proposals may be accepted.

No proposals will be received for a sum less than one hundred thousand dollars; but a commission of one eighth of one per cent. will be allowed to any person collecting subscriptions for the purpose of incorporating them in one proposal to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars or upwards, provided that such proposal shall be accepted.

A commission of one eighth of one per cent. will also be allowed to the cashiers of the banks where the payments shall be made; who will issue scrip certificates to the persons making the payments, and will endorse thereon, the payments of the several installments when made.

On failure of payment of any installment, the next preceding installment to be forfeited.

The scrip-certificates will be assignable by endorsement and delivery; and will be funded after the completion of the payments have been made.

The funded stock to be thus issued, will be irredeemable till the 31st day of December, 1825, will be transferable in the same manner as the other funded stock of the U. S. and will be charged for the regular and quarterly payment of its principal, upon the annual fund of eight millions of dollars appropriated for the payment of the principal and interest of the debt of the U. States, in the manner pointed out in the aforesaid act of the 2d of Aug. 1813.

WM. JONES,

Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

POSTSCRIPT.

All the enemy fleet went to sea from the Chesapeake, on the 6th inst. except one ship of the line, a frigate and five smaller vessels. It was thought the ship and frigate were also getting under way, in the evening.

Barbarities of the enemy.

The following is a part of the documents accompanying the report of the committee raised in the house of representatives of the United States, to report on that part of the president's message "that related to the spirit and manner in which the war has been waged on the part of the enemy." Since this was in type, and it is not now convenient to defer its insertion, we observe that the whole of these documents are publishing in a regular order, as they shall also appear in the REGISTER.

We invite the serious attention of our readers to these documents. If they do not feel a burst of indignation at the wonderful impudence of Mr. Croker, and the general bad treatment of our people, we know not of "what manner of stuff" they can be made.

J. W. CROKER TO MR. BEASLEY.

Admiralty Office, 5th August, 1812.

SIR,—Having communicated to my lords commissioners of the admiralty your letter of the 31st ultimo, transmitting a list of men, said to be Americans, who have been impressed and detained on board his majesty's ships, and requesting their discharge, I have by their lordship's commands to acquaint you, that under present circumstances, they will defer the consideration of this request.

I am, &c.

(Signed)

J. W. CROKER.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Beasley to the secretary of state, dated LONDON, October 23, 1812.

"I have informed you that I had addressed lord Castlereagh the subject of our citizens who have been impressed and are now held in the British naval service, and requested their release and compliance with the request which some had received or offered to give themselves up as prisoners, or refused to do so, when they heard of the war. In reply, I have received a direct note from Mr. Croker, one of the lords commissioners, stating, that he was instructed to give the names of the men who had returned the request complained of, and the vessels in which they were, which I immediately furnished, and urged in reply to the other part of my letter. In an interview I have since had with Mr. Croker, I took occasion to remind him of it, when he intimated that the government did not intend to answer me on that point; adding, that England was fighting the battles of the world; we had chosen to go to war and to aid the great enemy, and that England had so much right to recruit her army and navy, in every POSSIBLE MANNER, as France."

MR. BEASLEY TO LORD CASTLEREAGH.

Wimpole street, October 12th, 1812.

MY LORD,—In consequence of the war unhappily existing between the United States and Great-Britain, it has become my duty to call your lordship's attention to the situation of the great number of American seamen who have been impressed, and are now held in the ships of war of his Britannic majesty. In addition to the wrong which is done to the United States by this detention of their seamen, I regret to state, that some of these unfortunate persons, having heard of the war and offered to give themselves up as prisoners, have, for so doing, or for refusing to do service, been punished.

To put an end to a proceeding and a state of things so revolting to humanity, and so contrary to the law and usage of civilized nations, I persuade myself it is only necessary to present them to the view of the British government; and I therefore trust that effectual measures will be immediately taken to restore these injured men to liberty and to their country. I have the honor to be, &c.

R. G. BEASLEY.

E. COOKE TO R. G. BEASLEY.

Foreign Office, 19th October, 1812.

"In consequence of your letter to lord Castlereagh of the 12th inst. on, I am directed by his lordship to desire you will furnish me with the names of the American sailors who have been so punished, and of the ship they are on board."

MR. BEASLEY TO MR. COOKE.

Wimpole-street, 21st October, 1812.

SIR,—Agreeably to the request contained in your letter of the 19th instant, I now transmit to you a list of impressed seamen on board British ships of war, who, having heard of the war, offered to give themselves up as prisoners, and for so doing or for refusing to do service, have been punished.

I beg you to remind lord Castlereagh that the other part of my letter of the 12th instant, requesting the release of the American seamen detained in the British service, is still unanswered.

I am, sir, &c.

(Signed)

R. G. BEASLEY.

The list referred to in the preceding letter, states the cases of the following persons:

John Ballard, on board the Zenobia, offered himself a prisoner, refused, and was put in irons for one night.

John Davis, on board the Thistle, gave himself up as a prisoner and refused further service, for which he was flogged.

Ephraim Corvell, on board La Hogue, gave himself up as a prisoner and refused further service, in consequence of which he was kept seven days in irons.

John Hosman, on board La Mogue, gave himself up as a prisoner, still kept therein, and was threatened by the commander with further punishment.

Russell Brannard, on board La Hogue, gave himself up as a prisoner, was put in irons and still kept therein.

Thomas W. Marshall, Peter Lozette, Edward Whittle Banks and Levi Younger, on board the Royal William, gave themselves up as prisoners, and were in consequence thereof put into close confinement for eight days.

October 21, 1812.

Mr. Beasley requests lord Castlereagh to cause the necessary passports to be furnished for the American ship William and Eliza, captain Howland, to proceed to the United States with American citizens.

October 21, 1812.

Mr. Cooke acquaints Mr. Beasley that there will be no objection to granting a license to a cartel for carrying to the United States such American citizens, non-combatants, as may wish to return to their country. He requests Mr. Beasley to inform him of the situation of the ship William and Eliza.

MR. BEASLEY TO E. COOKE.

Whitehall-street, October 23, 1812.

SIR,—I have now the honor to repeat to you what I stated in conversation this morning, that the persons for whose return to the United States I requested the necessary passports, are, for the most part, American masters and mariners; that some of them, in consequence of the loss of their vessels abroad, have come here on their way to America; that others of them having been employed in British ships, are now desirous of returning home; that others, through the detention or condemnation of their vessels under British orders in council, and others, through all the casualties to which this class of men is always exposed, are left without the means of conveyance. None of these persons have been, in any way, engaged in hostilities against Great Britain. They are almost wholly destitute, and for some time have been chiefly supported at the expense of the United States. There are also, I believe, some American merchants and supercargoes who are anxious of availing themselves of the same opportunity of returning to their country.

You are, I presume, aware that the American government has afforded every facility to the departure of those British subjects in the United States, who were under similar circumstances with the persons included in my request.

With regard to the ship William and Eliza, in which those persons are to embark, I beg to observe, that I am well assured by those who have charge of her, that there is no impediment to her departure.

I am, &c. R. G. BEASLEY.

E. COOKE TO R. G. BEASLEY.

Foreign Office, October 28, 1812.

SIR,—Having laid before Lord Castlereagh your letter requesting that you may be allowed to send a cartel to America, with citizens of the United States who wish to return to their country, I am directed by his lordship to express his consent to this proposition, and am to desire you will confer with the commissioners for prisoners of war, with regard to the account you are to give for such parts of the crew as shall appear to be combatants, and on that principle must be exchanged. I am, &c.

(Signed)

E. COOKE.

October 29, 1812.

Mr. Beasley stated to J. W. Croker, of the admiralty office, that Lord Castlereagh had referred him to the commissioners for prisoners of war; that he had accordingly applied to them and learnt that the instructions which that board had received from the lords of the admiralty were not sufficiently explicit to enable them to proceed in the matter. Mr. Beasley requests their lordships would be pleased to give such further instructions to the transport board as may be found necessary.

October 30, 1812.

John Barrow, of the admiralty office, informs Mr. Beasley, that his letter of the 29th October had been laid before the lords commissioners of the admiralty, and the business had been referred to the transport board.

October 30, 1812.

Mr. Beasley informs Alexander M'Leay, of the transport office, that he had requested the lords of the admiralty would be pleased to give the further instructions necessary, and promising that those instructions would be immediately given, requests Mr. M'Leay to inform him at what time it will be convenient for the commissioners that he should confer with them on the subject.

October 30, 1812.

Alexander M'Leay informs Mr. Beasley that he is directed to desire that Mr. B. would transmit to the transport office a list of all the persons whom Mr. Beasley proposed to send to America, stating their several qualities, and when and how they respectively came into Great Britain.

November 3, 1812.

Mr. Beasley transmits to Alexander M'Leay, of the transport office, a list of American citizens whom it is proposed to send to the United States in the ship William and Eliza, stating their several qualities, and when and how they respectively came into Great Britain. This list contains one hundred and ten names. To these are added a list of six persons, being other passengers in the same vessel. Mr. Beasley remarks to Mr. M'Leay, "I am informed that many persons of the description and under the circumstances of these mentioned in the first of these lists (being seamen) who were awaiting the result of my late application to lord Castlereagh for a cartel for their conveyance to America have within a few days past, been seized by the impress officers and taken on board the tender of the tower; and I beg to know what are the intentions of the British government respecting them?"

November 6, 1812.

Alexander M'Leay informs Mr. Beasley that he has received and laid before the commissioners for the transport service the list of prisoners proposed to be sent to the United States in the William and Eliza cartel, and adds, "In return I am directed to request that you will inform the board whether you will engage that the above mentioned persons on their arrival in the United States shall be exchanged for an equivalent number of British subjects, who may have fallen into the hands of the Americans. I am at the same time to acquaint you, that the prisoners above alluded to must sign engagements not to serve against this country or its allies until regularly exchanged."

November 7, 1812.

MR. BEASLEY WRITES TO ALEXANDER M'LEAY.

"I have to inform the board that I am willing to engage that the American citizens whom I intend to send to the United States on board the William and Eliza, cartel, shall on their arrival there be exchanged for an equivalent number of British subjects of the same description, who may have fallen into the hands of the United States under similar circumstances; and that the men themselves shall sign engagements for the performance of any condition similar to those which may have been exacted of such British subjects in the United States; it being understood that if it be found that British subjects under any such circumstances, have been suffered freely to depart from the United States, then these engagements so far as regards the corresponding class of American citizens, shall be void. If, however, it be more satisfactory to the board, that the return or exchange of these men should be regulated by the principles recognized by the two governments in the cartel which I am informed, has lately been concluded at Washington, I am ready to enter into an engagement to that effect."

November 13, 1812.

ALEXANDER M'LEAY WRITES TO MR. BEASLEY.

"I am directed to acquaint you that the prisoners mentioned in the list transmitted by you will be released, upon your entering upon an unconditional engagement that they shall be exchanged for British prisoners now in America or who may be hereafter taken."

November 16, 1812.

MR. BEASLEY WRITES TO ALEXANDER M'LEAY.

"For those American citizens who composed the crews of the ships taken in war, I am at all times ready to enter into any engagement which the law and usage of nations require. But for those whom your laws have invited, or whom misfortune has thrown into your country; whom accident and not the fortune of war, has placed within your power, I must still urge my request, that they be allowed to depart the kingdom on the conditions proposed in my letter of the 7th instant. But "if the board will enter into an unconditional engagement, that all British subjects who have been permitted to leave the United States since the declaration of war, or who may be permitted to depart therefrom, shall be exchanged for American prisoners of war, I will, in like manner, engage for those American citizens agreeably to your letter." Mr. Beasley adds—"This arrangement however I would make with great reluctance; because it would not be in unison with that liberal spirit of warfare entertained by the government of the United States, and because it would bring within the influence of the war, those who might without detriment to either party, be exempt from its operations."

November 23, 1812.

MR. BEASLEY WRITES TO MR. HAMILTON OF THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

"I must beg leave to state, that that part of my note of the 12th ultimo, addressed to lord Castlereagh, relative to the American citizens who have been impressed and are now held in his majesty's naval service, remains unanswered. To the reasons already urged for the discharge of those men, may be added that of compelling them to fight against their country; and I need scarcely add, that as they were forcibly detained before the commencement of hostilities, it would be very unjust to discharge them merely to make them prisoners. Of the number of those unfortunate persons, many must be in vessels on foreign stations at a great distance. It is a subject of much public interest in the United States, and one which involves the domestic happiness of many families."

November 24, 1812.

ALEXANDER M'LEAY WRITES TO MR. BEASLEY, AND AFTER SOME PRELIMINARY REASONING SAYS,

"The commissioners (of the transport office) are instructed (by the lords commissioners of the admiralty) to continue to require from you an unconditional receipt, as prisoners of war, for all persons of this description previous to their being permitted to return to America."

December 23, 1812.

ALEXANDER M'LEAY WRITES TO MR. BEASLEY,

"I have received and laid before the commissioners for the transport service, &c. your letter of the 16th instant, and in return am directed to acquaint you, that at present they are only authorised to deliver up to you the Americans mentioned in the list transmitted by you on the 3d of November."

December 24, 1812.

MR. BEASLEY WRITES TO ALEXANDER M'LEAY.

"After so long a time spent in discussing the principles and conditions of an exchange of prisoners between the United States and Great Britain, I perceive with some surprise, by your letter of yesterday, that the only persons whom the board are authorised to deliver up to me, are those mentioned in the list transmitted to you on the 3d November, who, though so long known to the board as being at large in this city, have never been detained as prisoners; and who have, ever since their arrival, been maintained at the charge of the United States—

During this interval, those persons have been partially dispersed, some have been taken up as prisoners, some have been impressed, and some have otherwise disappeared. Others, however, under similar circumstances, have since been added, and there now remain about one hundred persons. Of these men, as I understand the tenor of our correspondence, those who belonged to vessels detained or taken in war, are to be suffered to proceed to the United States on my entering into the engagement which accompanied your letter of the 14th instant; but that for the others no engagement is required. In order to avoid any further misunderstanding, I beg to know whether this recapitulation is correct."

ALEXANDER M'LEAY TO R. G. BEASLEY.

Transport Office, 20th December, 1812.

SIR,—I have received and laid before the commissioners for the transport service, &c. your letter of the 22th instant, and in return, I am directed to acquaint you, that it is the intention of his majesty's government that such of the Americans, named in the list which accompanied your letter of the 3d of last month, as belonged to vessels detained or taken, and as are consequently prisoners of war, shall be suffered to proceed to the United States upon your entering into the engagement which accompanied my letter of the 14th instant; but that for Americans who were resident or travelling in this country, or resorting hither for commercial purposes, not as mariners, no such engagement will be required.

I am, &c.

(Signed) ALEXANDER M'LEAY

December 28, 1812.

MR. BEASLEY WRITES TO ALEXANDER M'LEAY.

"On referring to the list (which accompanied my letter of the 3d ultimo) you will perceive another class of persons, namely, mariners, who did not belong to vessels detained or taken, and as your omitting to notice these men in your letter might leave room for some doubt respecting them, I lose no time in requesting to be informed on what terms the board understand that they are to be suffered to return to the United States."

December 29, 1812.

ALEXANDER M'LEAY WRITES TO MR. BEASLEY.

"By a reference to my letter of the 26th instant, you will observe that mariners are expressly excepted from the description of persons who are to be released unconditionally, and consequently it is necessary you should give a receipt for all the mariners named in the list transmitted by you."

February 17, 1813.

MR. BEASLEY TO ALEXANDER M'LEAY.

"In reply to your letter of the 9th instant, communicating the result of inquiries made by order of the lords commissioners of the admiralty relative to the alleged ill treatment of certain seamen claiming to be Americans, in the British service, in consequence of their having requested to be considered as prisoners of war, as represented in my letter to lord Castlereagh of the 12th of October, I have to observe that although the statement of those persons, and that contained in your letter differ greatly as to the ill treatment, it does appear that some severity was exercised towards them on that occasion, and without any investigation of their American citizenship, which, if established, should have exempted them, not only from punishment, but from service. As it may be inferred, however, from your letter, that if proof be produced to support their claim, their request will yet be complied with, I have to inform you, that evidence to that effect was long since transmitted to the lords of the admiralty in behalf of several of these persons." [Here follows the names of persons and the recitation of the proof of citizenship, &c.] Mr. Beasley proceeds, "I cannot avoid expressing my disappointment and regret that no notice has been taken of the request made to lord Castlereagh in my letter of the 12th of October, for the general release of the American seamen detained in the British service."

ALEXANDER McLEAY TO R. G. BEASLEY.

Transport Office, 26th February, 1813.

SIR,—I have received and laid before the commissioners of the transport service, &c. your letter of the 17th of this month, with its enclosure, relative to the alleged ill treatment of certain seamen, claiming to be Americans in the British service, in consequence of their having requested to be considered as prisoners of war; and the same having been referred to the right honorable the lords commissioners of the admiralty, I am directed by the board to transmit to you the enclosed copy of a letter which they have received from their lordships' secretary in answer thereto. I am, &c.

(Signed) ALEXANDER McLEAY.

JOHN BARROW TO THE TRANSPORT BOARD.

Admiralty Office, 25th February, 1813.

GENTLEMEN,—Having laid before my lords commissioners of the admiralty your letter of the 18th instant, together with the documents therein referred to from Mr. Beasley, the American agent for prisoners of war in this country, on the subject of certain alleged citizens of the United States detained in his majesty's service, I have it in command to signify their lordships' directions to you to acquaint Mr. Beasley, that neither now in war, nor before, during peace, is, or was the British government desirous of having American seamen in its service, and that their lordships will now discharge as prisoners of war, as they formerly did as neutrals, those persons who can adduce any sufficient proof of their being Americans.

You will further inform Mr. Beasley, that all the cases stated by him have received, or are under accurate examination, and that such persons who may appear to be Americans will be immediately sent to prison, as many have been already. I am, &c.

(Signed) JOHN BARROW.

ALEXANDER McLEAY TO MR. BEASLEY.

Transport Office, 6th March, 1813.

SIR—I am directed by the commissioners for the transport service, &c. to inform you, that upon the receipt of the printed letters which were transmitted by you to this office, for the purpose of being forwarded to certain seamen on board of his majesty's ships of war, they considered it their duty to submit the same to the consideration of the right honorable the lords commissioners of the admiralty, and to request their lordships' directions on the subject; and the board having received a letter from their lordships' secretary, of which the enclosed is a copy, I have their directions to acquaint you accordingly, that the letters in question will not be forwarded, and that you cannot be permitted to maintain any correspondence with the seamen on board his majesty's fleet. I am, &c.

(Signed) ALEXANDER McLEAY.

JOHN BARROW TO THE TRANSPORT BOARD.

Admiralty Office, 5th March, 1813.

GENTLEMEN—In reply to your letter of the 16th of last month, enclosing a letter addressed by Mr. Beasley to a seaman on board his majesty's ship Porcupine, and requesting to be informed if letters of a similar description should be forwarded to the persons to whom they are addressed, I am commanded by my lords commissioners of the admiralty, to signify their direction to you not to forward any such letters, and to acquaint Mr. Beasley that he cannot be permitted to maintain any correspondence with the seamen on board of his majesty's fleet, observing to him, at the same time, that the printed letter in question contains a statement unfounded in fact, for that neither since the war with America, nor before, have their lordships declined to release American seamen, admitted or proved to be such, though they have and still do refuse to release persons assuming, without any proof or document, that character. I am, &c.

(Signed) JOHN BARROW.

Copy of the printed circular letter addressed to American seamen in British ships of war.

London, 1813.

In answer to your letter of the

I have to inform you, that the lords commissioners of the admiralty having, in consequence of the war between the United States and Great Britain, declined to release those American citizens who have been impressed and are held in the British service, there appears to be no other course for you to pursue than to give yourself up as a prisoner of war to the commander of the ship in which you are detained.

Agent of the United States for prisoners of war in Great Britain

Extract of a letter from Mr. Beasley to Alexander McLeay, dated 15th March, 1813.

"In the letter of their lordships' secretary of the 5th instant, the board are directed to observe to me that the printed letter which I addressed to certain American seamen detained in the British navy "contains a statement unfounded in fact, for that neither since the war with America, nor before, have their lordships declined to release American seamen admitted or proved to be such." It is not necessary to my present purpose to enter upon an examination of their lordships' conduct on this matter before the war; although my own official observation, in numerous cases, when I held the office of consul, would authorize me to dispute even that part of their secretary's assertion. But with reference to their lordships' conduct since the war, I beg to remind them of their letter of the 5th of August, soon after the commencement of the war, in answer to a request made on the 21st of July for the release of certain impressed American seamen, in which their lordships, going beyond the mere declining to release the men, stated, "that under the present circumstances, they will defer the consideration of the request for their release;" or, in other words, that they will not at present, war being commenced, even think on the subject of their release. If further proof be necessary of their lordships' having, as I stated in my printed letter, declared the release of such seamen in consequence of the war, I will refer to their recollection a letter written by their secretary, on the 25th of August, in answer to an application for the release of William Wilson, an impressed American detained on board the Cordelia, in which they state that this man being an alien enemy must continue to serve or go to prison. Should other corroboration be wanted, it may be found in the long and marked silence of the British government to my numerous applications, again and again repeated, for the release of these men; seeing that it was not until the 25th of February, nearly seven months after their lordships had informed me of their having deferred the consideration of the subject, and nearly five months after my formal demand made to lord Castlereagh, that they directed the board to inform me of their intention to treat them as prisoners of war. And even this was not done until eight days after my printed letter in question appears to have been on their table. Surely it was in utter forgetfulness of these circumstances that their lordships declare my statement unfounded in fact; for it appears impossible that they can, in the mind of any person, bear a different interpretation from that which I had given them. But how do these facts bear on their lordships' statement? How, I ask, does their determination, that Wilson, proved and admitted to be an American, must continue to serve on board to prison, support the assertions that their lordships have not declined to release American seamen admitted and proved to be such? But, perhaps in their lordships' view, to send them from service and detention in ships of war to confinement in prisons, is to release them. If so, it is unnecessary to pursue the subject farther, and I will content myself with having vindicated the correctness of my statement."

"I come now to the consideration of their lordships' purpose, as expressed in their secretary's letter of the 25th ult. to treat as prisoners of war the American seamen who have been impressed and are held in the British service. Taking into view the manner in which these unfortunate persons came into the power of the British government, that their own rights and denunciations, the rights of their country, the law of nations, and every principle of justice were violated in the very act by which each of these men was brought within its power, and that this wrong accumulated so long as any of them remain in its power, I do maintain that they are on every ground entitled to, and the British government is bound to grant, their immediate and complete release. It acquired them only as the spoils of unlawful violence; how then can it retain them as the fruits of lawful war? Its right of controul over them can only arise from the lawfulness of their detention; but that which was unlawfully taken cannot be rightfully held, and to acknowledge the pretension to such controul as their lordships' purpose implies, would be to legitimize the act by which they came into their power. The British government disclaims all right and all intention to take them, and this disavowal is an acknowledgment of its obligation to restore them to the same condition, and to the same freedom, from which they were taken. Upon what ground is it then that they are to be treated as prisoners of war? Not many years since all Europe resounded with the complaints of Great Britain against France for detaining as prisoners of war certain British subjects who, having entered the French territories in the time of peace, were found there in the breaking out of the war.—But, if that were regarded in England as an outrage, what will be thought of this detention, as prisoners of war, of American seamen who, having been wrongfully taken on the high seas and forcibly carried into the British service in time of peace, are found therein at the breaking out of a war doing her service and fighting her battles? The conduct of France was attempted to be justified by certain acts of England which were alleged to be equally contrary to the law of nations. But, what justification, what excuse can be set up for this conduct of Great Britain towards the impressed American seamen? What infraction upon the law of nations, what violence or injustice exercised towards British subjects, or what outrage is this cruel act to retaliate? It cannot be the free and spontaneous permission given by the United States at the commencement of the war for every British subject, of every class and description, found within their territories or in their power, to return to his country, that this imprisonment of American seamen is to require. And surely this cannot be the indemnification which Great Britain offers these unfortunate men for the wrongs she has inflicted on them, or the reward she offers them for the service she has received at their hands.

"To the unqualified prohibition of all correspondence between myself and the impressed American seamen in his Britannic majesty's fleet, so unreservedly stated in the letter of their lordships' secretary of the 6th instant, I must conform, whatever may be my sentiments and feelings respecting it. The situation in which these unfortunate men and myself stood towards each other, appeared not only to invite, but to authorize a communication between us. On their part, the object of this correspondence was to obtain information and counsel as to the proper manner of conducting themselves under circumstances the most difficult, and on an occasion the most important and solemn, namely, how to act while forcibly held to service in ships of war belonging to a state engaged in actual hostilities against their country; a situation which their own good sense and proper feelings taught them was alike incompatible with their rights and their duties. My part has been, after having waited five months in vain for a communication of their lordships' intentions, to recommend them, since there appeared no means of their release, to give themselves up as prisoners of war; an evil comparatively light to that which they suffer. In other instances their letters have related the rejection of their offer and the threats of punishment, and all contain complaints of the unexampled hardship of their situation."

Turreau's Letter.

Contrary to our usual course, it is necessary that the following letter should be preceded by a few explanatory remarks. We are the more willing to do this, because the communication of the ex-French minister does not appear to have been designed by him, and is not acknowledged, as an official article.

The letter first appeared in a newspaper called the "Federal Republican," printed at Georgetown in the district of Columbia. It seems, the copy from which it was published (as stated by the editors of that paper) was in the hand-writing of Mr. Graham, chief clerk in the department of state; as is probable from the statement made by Mr. Graham himself in his letter, thereafter addressed to them, and inserted below.

The matter of this letter has produced much discussion—some have contended that its insolence exceeded that conduct of the British minister Jackson, for which he was discharged—and that it goes to shew "the height, the length and the depth" of French influence in the councils of our country—whereas others aver that it has no analogy to the case of Mr. Jackson, admitting that its matter was equally offensive; for that Jackson persisted, after being cautioned two or three times, in his insolent conduct; whereas Turreau immediately withdrew his letter, as is distinctly stated by Mr. Graham; and they further say, that it rather proves a British than a French influence existing in the executive; as Mr. Turreau is evidently displeased with the manifested disposition of our government to be on the best terms with his master's enemy, and complains grievously of many supposed injuries done to France.

On these points some volumes of words have already been written; and the reader will judge for himself on what side the best of the argument lies.

BALTIMORE, June 14, 1809.

The minister of France to Mr. Robert Smith, secretary of state.

SIR—The federal government is going to settle all its differences with Great Britain, and to make treaty of amity, of commerce and of navigation with that power. You, as well as Mr. Gallatin, have manifested to me a desire also to make a new convention with France, to the take place of that which expires on the 30th September next.

I will for a moment call to your consideration (arrêter votre réflexion) this double object, which the federal government proposes to itself, and the difficulties of accomplishing it in a manner advantageous for all the contracting parties. My just deference for your government, sir, does not permit me to make any observation on the haste with which the executive has received the first overtures of the English ministry yet composed of the same men who very lately discovered a very manifest aversion to every species of conciliation, and who joined to a denial of justice to the Americans, every asperity of forms, of tone, and of style towards the agents of your government.

It has been supposed that this very haste was necessary to satisfy the wishes of the people, of whom foresight is not the first virtue, others may see in that political proceeding a precipitation, perhaps dangerous, and if it does not lessen (ne blesseait pas) the dignity of the executive, may at least produce consequences prejudicial to the true interests of the union. It is on these very interests, much more than on those of France, as its enlarged and liberal policy, its principles of universal justice, and the elements of which its power is composed, have placed it beyond all attacks (hors de toutes les atteintes)—it is only on the interest of your government and I fix my attention and invoke yours, under a cursum tunc so delicto.

My correspondence with your predecessor is enough to convince you, sir, that I have not left him ignorant of the dangers of the crisis of Europe, and its inevitable effects on the destiny of the states of the American union. Positive and multiplied information on the events of the other continent and their probable results, has enabled me sometimes to raise the veil which yet covers the designs of the first powers of the political world.

I have thought that it was not incompatible with my duty to submit to the wisdom of your government the new changes which the changes brought about in Europe offer to the commercial interests of the United States and the inconveniences which may result from their refusal to accede formally to the principles of the maritime confederation.

It does not belong to me to examine how far the preceding administration was mistaken in its conjectures; but the verbal proposition which you have made to me, sir, to conclude a new convention (a proposition which I have submitted to my court) necessarily leads me to some observations on the respective position of France and the United States.

Your government looks to nothing in its treaties, but to the interests of its foreign commerce. This is the principle object of its policy. France considers foreign commerce only as an addition (accessoire) to its system of general administration. Numerous canals of communication, which aid its rivers, and in multiplying their directions, procures for it all the opening necessary to keep up in the interior and with its allies that immense circulation of all the objects of their reciprocal wants. In France commerce is not a power (puissance) in the state: it shares with other national professions the protection of the government, which only honors them with its support and encouragement in proportion to the degree of their utility and importance. In short, foreign commerce is not considered in France as an indispensable thing, although it is so considered in the United States.

You will then readily see, sir, that France has not the same interest which the federal government has, to make a treaty of commerce and navigation with the United States, while it is evident, that whatever may be the dispositions, the result does not offer an equality of advantage to the two governments.

It is only, then, by means of political sacrifices, that one can re-establish the balance in a commercial treaty, and also render it of common utility to the two parties. Besides (and I have not suffered it to remain concealed from the administration which preceded that of Mr. Madison) can the federal government believe, and I appeal to your discernment to judge, if the United States have not given cause of serious and multiplied complaints to France during the terrible conflict which she has had to sustain against all the armed powers of Europe. Notwithstanding the popular infatuation, and the hurrying off of the public opinion, and the public favor towards a power systematically inimical as well to the United States as to France, I will appeal to the authority of all the sensible men of your own country, sir, to know, if for more than five years past the federal government has conducted itself towards the French government in a manner to merit the advantages which you expect from a new convention.

It would be useless and too tedious to examine here, what has already all the light of evidence, whether the preceding administration has not taken the worst course which it could have taken, to avoid collision with the two principal belligerent powers. The Americans have appealed to the rights of neutrality, and until now at least their government has endeavored by proceedings which I shall not permit myself to give a name to (de qualification) to draw near to Great Britain, who outrages or disowns the rights claimed; while it injures (offensait) France, whose measures have for their object the re-establishment and the guarantee of these rights.

Thus your preceding administration, (for it is of that, and that only, that I pretend to speak) placed itself by its political movement (marche) in manifest contradiction with its own principles. It has done more, and notwithstanding my representations, it persisted (obstinée) to consider the two powers as doing equal wrong to the government of the union, and to apply to them the effect of its negative measures, while the outrages of England seemed to require from their dignity the most energetic measures of repression against that power. But in short, (car enfin) sir, it is time to come to an explanation on the pretended wrongs of France towards the United States and at least oppose to them the injuries (les offenses) done by the federal government.

However severe the decree of Berlin might seem in its application to the United States, it was demonstrated that its consequences would be ultimately (en dernière analyse) favorable to their commercial pretensions, since its object was to reach (d'atteindre) a power who had proclaimed its contempt for the rights of nations: and without doubt the Americans were the people the most interested in the success of that political act. There are however American merchants who, by all the means of the most shameful deception, have endeavored to elude the measures of France, and to second the efforts of the common enemy to escape them, and have at length by their multiplied and proven frauds, provoked the more severe dispositions of the decree of Milan. Thus, not only were the measures of France justified as measures of retaliation, but they were indispensable to free the American commerce from the yoke which Great Britain had placed on it, to cause to be respected in future the flag of neutrals, and force that power to acknowledge the common right of nations and the dominion of the seas; and the confiscation, the sale, and the burning of some American merchant vessels, having false papers, and navigating in contempt of the prohibitions of their own government, to favor the enemies of France, have been legal measures, conformable to the rights of war, and which the force of circumstances and the interest of all imperiously required. But I appeal to you, sir, the council of Washington, of which you were then also a member—has it given all the necessary attention to the representations made on this subject by Mr. Champagny to Mr. Armstrong, as well as to those which I considered it my duty to address to the secretary of state? Has it been possible to make known through the United States all the advantages which the American people ought to find in the accomplishment of the designs of France—to discuss its projects in the calm of impartiality, to cause the voice of reason and of principles to be heard, when the declamations of error or of bad faith, (when the influence of prepossessions and the clamors of party spirit preserved their empire over the public opinion, or rather received a new force from the incertitude (incertitud) or the silence of the [former] ancient executive council? That disposition, almost general, to attribute (a supposor) wrongs in France, by way of weakening (pour atténuer) the outrages of England—was it foreign to the administration of which I speak? and that administration, has it always been willing to hear me, while I made it perceive the consequences of the conduct of the federal government in regard to the French government? Was this administration convinced that all governments are not disposed to forget or to suffer injuries (les offenses) with impunity?

In recollecting to your recollection, sir, the wrongs of the federal government towards France, I only mention notorious acts, which my former correspondence has est dishé. —observing to you at the same time that I understand according to their class (je comprends dans leur catégorie) the particular offenses of your citizens; for every government is bound (est solidaire) in regard to other powers for the acts of its subjects; otherwise it would not be a government, and could not offer either security or guarantee for the execution of its agreements.—Complaints were for a long time made to the United States of the delays which some American citizens had experienced in receiving the indemnities which were due to them, and of which the reimbursement was made from a part of the funds destined for the acquisition of Louisiana; but the affair of the heirs of Beaumarchais, who have in vain claimed for 26 years a debt made sacred by his motives, proven to the last degree of evidence, and on which the declared interest of the French government does not admit of a pro off—is it finished?

Capt. Mouessant, the bearer of a letter of marque, and commandant of an armed schooner, followed an English convoy, and was on the point of taking several merchant vessels, when two American armed brigs, and armed to protect the infamous commerce with St. Domingo, attacked him under the English flag, and not only added treachery to superiority of force to get possession of the vessel of Mouessant, but after having pillaged it, massacred a part of the crew an hour after they had struck—and this crime, which remains unpunished, is so much the less forgotten, as captain Mouessant never let go (quitte) his flag.

But it would be too tedious to relate to you all the particular acts in relation solely to French citizens; it will be sufficient for me to say to you that every where, where there are Frenchmen (I don't speak of the small number who have abjured their country) these Frenchmen will be every where assured (assurés) of obtaining indemnity for the damage done to their persons or to their property.

There are other grievances (griefs) yet more serious, and from which France has a right to believe that the United States has a project of giving her inquietude for her distant possessions, and for those of her allies. This has reference to the free commerce between the Americans and the revolted blacks of St. Domingo, the affair of Miranda, and to the meditated attack on Spanishs on the Sabine—an enterprise which would not have been given up (n'a eueue) but for the necessity under which your government found itself of causing its troops to fall back to guard New Orleans against an invasion by internal enemies.

I was far from thinking, sir, that the offence (outrage) of the commerce with the states in the revolted part of St. Domingo. The law of the embargo confirming the prohibitory law passed by congress in 1806—I could not presume that the embargo would be raised, and that the law against this commerce would not be continued. What, sir, the intercourse is prohibited between the United States and all the dependencies of the empire, under circumstances when the commercial regulations would be the most advantageous to the two states, and you tolerate them only with that one of our possessions, where we have the greatest interest to proscribe them! and it is to be remarked, that it is always [moreover] when France has to combat new coalitions on the other continent, that it would seem that efforts are made to form enterprises against its possessions, or those of its allies in this one. It is also proper to place among the number of grievances with which France has to charge the United States, the want of opposition, or rather, the useless opposition, which the federal government has made to the impressment of its sailors, seized in contempt of its flag, and with whom the English arm their vessels against us. I have often, sir, and often in vain, protested against this outrage of Great Britain towards your government, and which has become a serious injury (offence) on the part of your government towards France. You furnish personal aid (secours personnels) to our enemies. What could you do more if you were at war with us? Without doubt, it will not escape the present executive, that an amendment is absolutely necessary, to render uniform the treatment which our sailors and soldiers meet with in this country, and that which your sailors and soldiers meet with in France.

I have not suffered my court to be ignorant of the abuses, without number, and extremely prejudicial to its interests, daily resulting from a want of a police in the United States, in regard to this affair.—I am very far, sir, from charging your government with the means, the most shameful, of seduction, which are employed to induce our sailors and our soldiers to desert, but has it done all that it ought to have done to prevent it? and that extreme facility with which when they wish it (on besoin) men drawn off from their country and their sovereignty naturalized, does it accord with the incontestable right of governments to recover even without demanding them, their subjects whom artifice or force has drawn off from their service; and France, sir, has it not given on this subject, as on many others, an example of the reciprocal respect which governments owe to each other, and which they observe in Europe even in the midst of the horrors of war? and have I not already warned the executive council to put an end to these abuses? Have I not warned them that the indemnity due for the loss of the French ship the Impetuous, burnt by the enemy within a cable's length of your coast, ought to be decreed (statuee) and paid without delay—and the subtleties, (permit me to use the expression, I know no other to convey my idea) and the subtleties, I say, which have been employed to delay (a journey) that indemnity, have made of that act of violence on the part of our enemies, a direct offence of the United States against France. What more could you do, what more could you leave undone, sir, if you had a treaty of alliance with our enemies?

You will find it convenient, sir, that I abridge the enumeration of all the subjects of complaint, which the Federal government has given to France since my residence in the United States, and that I refer to my correspondence with the department of state.

I confine myself here to calling the attention, and the attention the most serious, of the executive council, to another grievance of the most serious kind—I know not what would more sensibly offend (offenser) the French empire.

Inconuenience, sir, by agreeing, that no government has a right to interfere with the particular or municipal laws of other countries, because it is supposed with reason that every government will so far respect itself, as to circumscribe the effect of these local institutions, and to stop the licentiousness which the feebleness of laws always gives birth to, and the digressions (les excès) of which may offend foreign powers. Can one suppose that it was easy to avoid the just reproaches of sovereigns for offences of this kind, where the weakness (la vice) of the institutions, and the want of action or of power in the depositaries of political authority, render useless a trial of the means of repression? You have foreseen, sir, that I am about to address you on the the indefinite liberty of saying every thing, of writing every thing, and of printing every thing.

I am very far from believing that the excesses of your press have occupied for an instant the thoughts of the emperor and king my master—but as it respects this subject (a cet egard) I am here as the organ of the whole French empire, and, if I do not see without pain, the ravage (ravages) which the delirium of the insolence of the greater part of your periodical writers occasions amongst yourselves, you will judge that I do not lie without indignation at that people permit themselves to say or to write against France, her institutions, and the sacred person of her august representative.

You will see, sir, that on this subject, as on all others, the redress of grievances is an indispensable pre-requisite to the formation of a new treaty between the two powers.

It was sufficiently painful to me to address you (entretenir) on the complaints of France against the United States, without laying them open to you, in the form of an official note. I have thought that a simple letter, the tone of which would approach nearer to that of our conferences, would produce the same effect with you, sir, whose liberal principles and loyal character are known to me. I have thought that you would be afflicted, as I am, at the obstacles (inrares) which the preceding administration has been able to place in the way of a hearty reconciliation (a un rapprochement plus intime) between our governments, and which their mutual interest renders more necessary than ever.

I have thought, also, that I could even on a subject so serious, (grave) and without deviating from, or with propriety (sans blemer les convenances) adopt a mode of communication more analogous to the conformity of our views and our efforts to maintain harmony between France and the United States; and have found here, too, the satisfaction of being able to offer to your sentiments a new tribute of respect.

Receive, sir, the homage of my high consideration.

(Signed)

TURREAU.

To the editors of the Federal Republican.

Your last paper has been shown to me, in which you state that you have in my hand writing the translation of the letter from general Turreau to Mr. Smith, published in your preceding number.—As I believe that some person has intended to practice a fraud upon the public by means of that letter, and, if I am silent after my name has been mentioned, that I may be considered a party to it, or otherwise be exposed to unjust imputations, I think it proper to say, that no such letter as you have published is in the department of state, or ever was there, to my knowledge, unless it is a letter withdrawn by general Turreau, of which I remember to have made a translation for Mr. Smith, as he did not read French himself. This letter was considered so exceptionable, that general Turreau was, as I understood from Mr. Smith, compelled to withdraw it, or to subject himself to consequences more unpleasant. The translation of this letter I gave to Mr. Smith: what he did with it I know not; but if the paper you have in your hand-writing, I do not hesitate to say, that it is the translation of the letter withdrawn; for I know that with the exception of that letter, I never have translated one from general Turreau to Mr. Smith bearing the slightest resemblance to the one you have published.

My only object in sending you this statement, is you should publish it, that those of your readers who have seen my name introduced into your columns to give authenticity to what you consider an official paper, should know the facts here stated.

JOHN GRAHAM.

Washington, 31st August, 1813.

Stamp Duties.

Treasury Office, Revenue Office, Aug. 20, 1813.
PUBLIC NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN.

In pursuance of an act of congress, passed on the second day of August, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, entitled "An act to regulate duties on notes of banks, bankers and certain companies, and on the bills of exchange of certain descriptions," that from and after the last day of December next, there will be levied, collected and paid throughout the United States, the several stamp duties following, viz:

For every skin or piece of vellum or parchment, or sheet or piece of paper, upon which shall be written or printed any or either of the instruments of writing following, viz:

On any promissory note or notes payable either to bearer or order, issued by any of the banks or companies who issue and discount notes, bonds or obligations, either incorporated or not incorporated, which now are or may hereafter be established in the United States, or of any bank or bankers (in case such a company, banker or bankers, shall not agree with the secretary of the treasury to an annual composition, in lieu of such duties, of one and an half per centum on the amount of their annual dividends) according to the following scale, viz:

- 1. Not exceeding one dollar, one cent.
- 2. Above one dollar, and not exceeding two dollars, two cents.
- 3. Above two and not exceeding three dollars, three cents.
- 4. Above three and not exceeding five dollars, five cents.
- 5. Above five and not exceeding ten dollars, ten cents.
- 6. Above ten and not exceeding twenty dollars, twenty cents.
- 7. Above twenty and not exceeding fifty dollars, fifty cents.
- 8. Above fifty and not exceeding one hundred dollars, one dollar.
- 9. Above one hundred and not exceeding five hundred dollars, five dollars.
- 10. Above five hundred and not exceeding one thousand dollars, ten dollars.
- 11. Above one thousand dollars, fifty dollars.

On any bond, obligation or promissory note or notes not issued by any bank, company or banker as aforesaid, discounted by any such bank, company or banker, and on any foreign or inland bills of exchange above fifty dollars, and having one or more endorsers, according to the following scale, viz:

- 1. Not exceeding one hundred dollars, five cents.
- 2. Above one hundred and not exceeding 500 dollars, ten cents.
- 3. Above two hundred and not exceeding 1,000 dollars, twenty cents.
- 4. Above five hundred and not exceeding 1,000 dollars, fifty cents.
- 5. Above one thousand and not exceeding 1,500 dollars, 75 cents.

Above fifteen hundred and not exceeding 2,000 dol. one dol.
 If above two thousand and not exceeding three thousand dol.
 one dollar and fifty cents.
 Above three thousand and not exceeding 4,000 dol. two dol.
 Above four thousand and not exceeding five thousand dollars, three dollars and fifty cents.
 Above five thousand and not exceeding seven thousand dollars, five dollars and fifty cents.
 Above seven thousand and not exceeding 8,000 dol. four dol.
 Above eight thousand dollars, five dollars.
 On which said stamps lay, on their respective duty as above specified, with the device of an eagle bearing a shield.
 Advertisers and tender notes, for the use or benefit of the United States in pursuance of any act of congress, or drafts or bills drawn by the treasury of the United States or checks payable at sight upon any bank, company or banker, are exempted from duty and are not required to be stamped; and no duty is charged on a second or other copy of a set of exchange.
 When any person shall deposit any vellum, parchment or paper, at the office of a collector, accompanying the same with a list specifying the number and denomination of the stamps which are to be thereon affixed, it will be the duty of the collector to transmit the same to the office of the commissioner of the revenue, where such paper, parchment and vellum will be properly marked or stamped, and forthwith sent back to the collector, who will deliver the same, pursuant to the order of the person from whom it was received.

 Stamps on paper will be transmitted from this office to the collectors, who will deliver the same, on the payment of the duty, to the person applying thereon. In case of stamps required on vellum or parchment, the vellum or parchment must invariably be transmitted, through a collector, to this office, whence it will be returned stamped to the collector, subject on the payment of the duty, to the order of the person from whom it was received.
 Any person other than an officer employed in collecting the revenue of the United States, who shall apply to a collector at his office for the purchase at one time of a quantity of stamped vellum, parchment or paper, the duties on which shall amount to ten dollars or upwards, shall receive from him such quantity of vellum, parchment or paper, on said person's paying down the amount of said duties, after deducting therefrom seven and one half per centum thereon.
 Given under my hand at Washington, the day and year above-mentioned
 SAMUEL H. SMITH,
 Commissioner of the Revenue.

Prices Current.

We have spared no pains to fill up the following table; but had not the power to render it more complete than it is. At Boston, New-York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, the "prices current" are regularly published. The other items were furnished from the private correspondence of several merchants.
 The present contrast of the value of commodities is curious; and the whole is interesting to the history of the United States.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The mortal remains of Lawrence and Ludlow arrived at New-York by land, on the 13th inst. without the "magnanimous" permission of the British officer off New-London, to bring them by water. They were delivered on board the U. S. sloop of war Alert, until the committee of the corporation of the city had arranged the ceremonies with which they should be finally interred. On the day of their arrival the flags of all the vessels in the harbor were at half-mast.

A Boston paper says, it has "the pleasure to state," that captain Oliver, finally acceded to the request of Decatur for the passage of the Henry to New-York, with the remains of Lawrence and Ludlow.

The Greek ship Jerusalem, of 7 or 800 tons, from Havana, for Boston, laden with sugar, has been captured by the British and sent to Hullifax. She is said to be detained in consequence of having some pig copper on board.

The London papers say that admiral Warren is expected, to be replaced by lord Keith—The causes assigned are the second escape of commodore Rodgers, and the permission given by him to the American negotiators to sail to Russia.

The London Star, of July 8, says—"The American envoys have arrived at Copenhagen, to excite new animosities against Great Britain and the cause of Europe.

We cannot flatter ourselves with any prospect of peace from them, since they have commenced their diplomatic tour by a visit to Copenhagen."

French decree of the 11th April, 1813.

The vessels captured by the American privateers will be admitted into the ports of France.

The administration of the prizes and the proceedings for condemnation are to be made by the consuls of the United States.*

Immediately on the arrival of the prizes, the cargoes will be lodged in the government warehouse (Entrepot Reel).

All the goods and merchandize of the same description with those admitted to an entry when captured by French privateers, will enjoy the same privilege.

Those prohibited must remain in the government store till re-exported to the United States.

The goods and merchandise on board the privateers, will not be admitted.

Circular letter of 26th April of the directors general of the customs, commenting on the above decision.

From the preceding dispositions, the prizes made by the American privateers are entitled to the same privileges as those made by our own, with respect to such goods as are admitted to an entry. Those prohibited, instead of being burnt or destroyed, will be kept in the government warehouse, to be re-exported to the United States.

That destination being exclusively assigned, bonds, or acquits a caution, must be given, and which can only be cancelled on producing the certificate of landing in the United States, signed by the French consul.

Colonial produce or other goods that may happen to be on board the American privateers (except the stores necessary for the crew,) being reputed the produce or manufacture of an enemy's country, will not be admitted. They must provisionally be sequestered and a report made forthwith to the director general, with particular remarks, as well as the motives set forth by the master in support of his answers on his examination; in order that the minister of commerce, to whom the whole will be referred, may ultimately pronounce.

MILITARY.

A Cincinnati paper of Sept 4, says, "during the present week about 4000 Kentucky volunteers passed through this town on their way to the N. W. army" They were in high spirits, and commanded by the venerable Shelby. Some companies have also passed through Chillicothe.

It will be recollected by most of our readers that the state of North Carolina, long since, directed a sword to be presented to "col. Isaac Shelby," (now governor of Kentucky,) for his gallant conduct at Kings mountain, in the revolutionary war. This sword, of exquisite and costly workmanship, was presented as the venerable warrior when preparing to set out for the N. W. frontier.—A happy time!—May glory light upon it!

Seven pieces of cannon, with 28 ammunition and baggage waggons, passed through Troy (N. Y.) on the 6th inst. for Burlington.

We have cheering accounts from that part of the forces of the U. S. committed to the charge of major Hampton, at Burlington. He has done much to prepare them for the time that is at hand. The English emissaries, to discourage enlistments and break down the spirit of the people, have done much, in the papers, to kill off his troops, by disease. Several officers have taken the trouble to tell these folks that they lied—it is an useless waste of breath to correct the knaves; for if driven from one theme they have only to fasten on another.

Two soldiers were lately shot at Charleston, S. C. One for desertion, the other for sleeping on his post. Three others sentenced to the same punishment were pardoned.

Northern army and Ontario fleet.—Commodore Chauncey sailed from Sackett's Harbor on the 28th ult. with all his squadron for a cruise, that it was thought would be decisive. Letters of the 7th inst. from fort George state the British fleet was then in sight, and that our commodore was weighing anchor to go and meet them. Gen. Wilkinson arrived at fort George on the 7th or 8th inst. Gen. Lewis has retired to his seat at Strasburg, "for the benefit of his health." The Mary, a private vessel, laden with 199 barrels of flour belonging to the United States, has been captured by the enemy. One account says that sir George Prevost has gone towards fort George with nearly his whole force, while another would make us believe that he was strengthening himself at Kingston, in expectation of an attack: we think the latter is the most probable. It is positively stated that Yeo has 32 guns more than Chauncey—yet our brave fellows are very sanguine of success. By what we learn from Burlington, an important movement may be immediately expected. Indeed the time seems big with events, and we are on the stretch for news from all quarters.

N. W. army.—We have so often, (perhaps imprudently) expressed an idea that Harrison was about to act offensively, and clear the N. W. frontier of the allied barbarians, that we shall say nothing more on the prospects of this portion of the national force. But this we believe, that Shelby will not permit it to be idle much longer.

It is intimated, that nearly all the Ohio militia have been ordered home by the commanding general. The patriotism and patience of this invaluable people have been severely tested, on several mortifying occasions; and we fear, if a reverse should take place, they may not be calculated upon hereafter, except under their own leaders, for the immediate defence of their state.

A letter from Sepeca of August 27, states, that the Queen Charlotte has been sometime at Malden, repairing very considerable damages she received by some shots from the battery of Erie. Another of the 30th, states, that Perry's flotilla, after having visited the enemy's fleet, lying under the guns of Malden, returned to Sandusky. When our vessels neared that place, the utmost alarm prevailed, and the women and children were seen running and screaming in every direction. The savages looked on with astonishment, and much desired their allies to go out and fight us; but they would not. Perry sailed again on the 31st prepared, from his previous observations, to attack the enemy.

Our last date from the army is of the 21 inst.—when it seemed as if great preparations were making for a speedy embarkation, and an attack on the allied forces in several ways.

We have much matter respecting the arrest of major (now lieutenant-colonel) Croghan, by general Harrison anterior to the affair at Sandusky, though his sword and the command were restored to him, before he had covered himself with glory. Lieut. Col. Croghan acquits and fully justifies his general—here, we think, the matter should have stopped; but the field officers of the N. W. army have also made a publication about it. When room is allowed, these things shall be inserted for record.

CHILICOTHE, August 13, 1812.

Sir—In consequence of the gallant defence which under the influence of Divine Providence, was effected by you, and the troops under your command, of Fort Stephenson, at Lower Sandusky, on the evening of the 2nd inst.—the ladies of the town of Chillicothe, whose names are undersigned, impressed with a high sense of your merits as a soldier and a gentleman, and with great confidence in your patriotism and valor, present you with a SWORD.

Major GEORGE CROGHAN.

Wheaton (Washington City) Richmah Irwin, Judith Delano, Margaret McLanburg, Margaret Miller, Elizabeth Martin, Nancy McArthur, Jane McCoy, Lavinia Fulton, Catharine Fullerton, Rebecca M. Orr, Susan Walker, Ann M. Dunn, Margaret Keys, Charlotte James, Estler Doolittle, Eleanor Buchanan, Margaret McFarland, Deborah Ferree, Jane M. Evans, Frances Brush, Mary Curtis, Mary P. Brown, Jane Heylin, Nancy Kerr, Catharine Hough, Eleanor Worthington, Martha Scott, Sally M'Leane.

CHILICOTHE, August 14, 1813.

Sir—As agents to carry into effect the pleasure of the ladies of Chillicothe, we herewith transmit you, by express, a SWORD which they beg you to receive from them, as a testimonial of the high sense they entertain of your military talents, as displayed in their defence against the enemies of our country, on the 2d inst. in the memorable defence of Fort Stephenson, and in the signal defeat of the combined British forces and their Indian allies before that place. They commit the surety of their respect to their youthful soldier, believing it will be more acceptable to him than any other they could present, and in full confidence that he will never use it unworthy the high character he has attained.

They request major Croghan, to present their entire approbation and thanks to the officers and soldiers of his heroic little band, for the gallant manner in which they second his views, and maintained the unequal conflict.

That Heaven may prosper you, sir, in your future military career, they earnestly pray.

We are, sir, in behalf of the ladies of Chillicothe, your most obedient humble servants,

SAMUEL FINLEY,
JOSEPH WHEATON, Capt.
A. D. Q. M. Gen.

Major George Croghan.

ANSWER.

Lower Sandusky, 25th August 1813.

LADIES OF CHILICOTHE.—I have received the SWORD which you have been pleased to present to me, as a testimonial of your approbation of my conduct on the 2d inst. A mark of distinction so flattering and so unexpected, has excited feelings which I cannot express.

Yet while I return you thanks for the numerous gift you have thus bestowed, I feel well aware, that my good fortune (which was bought by the activity of the brave officers and soldiers under my command) has raised in you expectations from my future efforts, which must, I fear, be sooner or later disappointed.

Still I pledge myself, (even though fortune should not be again propitious) that my exertions shall be such as never to cause you in the least to regret the honors you have been pleased to confer on your "youthful soldier."

G. CROGHAN.

Lower Sandusky, 25th, Aug. 1813.

MESSRS. FINLEY AND WHEATON:

GENTLEMEN—The sword which you have been pleased to forward me in behalf of the ladies of Chillicothe, has been delivered. The only return I can make to you and them, for so distinguished a mark of your favor, is a promise to use my best exertions to become worthy of it.

G. CROGHAN.

THE CREEKS, some weeks since, cut off the communication between St. Stephens and Georgia, and the mails for Louisiana, we believe, are now sent by the way of Fort Adams. A skirmish between a body of the "patriotic allies" and a party of the militia took place as the former were returning from Pensacola with a supply of military stores, with a view to seize them. The militia partially effected their object, yet were compelled to retreat with the loss of two killed. But, we apprehend, this unpleasant business will speedily be settled. Anxious to spare this deluded people, the government and its agents have stay'd the avenging arm until subservance was almost a crime; and the force that has been detached for the purpose will immediately command the "war party" to keep the peace. Indeed, it has been reported in Georgia, that alarmed at the preparations made, they were about to submit.

It is a curious political remark, as adapted to the parties of the United States, that the "peace party" of the Creeks are on the best terms with our administration. And, it must be admitted, that this race of aboriginals have been treated with the utmost gentleness and generosity. They have no possible cause of complaint, (nor do they allege any) against us. But the "ever wretched influence of Britain" is among them; and the lives of hundreds of deluded creatures must pay the forfeit of her crimes. Such is the spirit of the government of England—nor does it care if a whole people be exterminated, provided her purpose is effected. Wading to its arm-pits in blood, the poor Creeks will add but little to the crimson deluge that wastes the world. She counts the cost of lives by the entries on the books of her custom houses—the virtue of her government is in the pounds, shillings and pence of the pensions and revenues of those that administer it; and instead of the "shield" she has become the curse of humanity, prowling through all nations and crying "LET BLOOD!"

NAVAL.

There were about eighty American prisoners at Gibraltar, on the 1st of June. The greater part of them are impressed seamen; who, by a physical resurrection, were restored to their rights as Americans, being given up by the ships of war, or "floating hells," on that station. If this outrage on all that is honorable and just, in making prisoners of those that violently fell into the hands of the enemy in time of peace, is persevered in; and the British shall discharge all such in their navy, the "well inclined" may boast that the balance of prisoners will be in their favor. This procedure, all things considered, is one of the most barbarous of the barbarisms of the enemy. It has a character of meanness and of cruelty that words are incompetent to convey the idea of. It is the opposite of all that is noble, honest or humane. It is purely "British meanness!" a thing that the more dignified American would acknowledge as despotism, power giving the law.

Well do I recollect the howlings of the "British writer" on both sides of the Atlantic, when, after the breach of the peace of Amiens by the English, Benaparts detained as prisoners of war certain Englishmen that had voluntarily entered within his dominions. They screamed if they would have moved heaven and earth, and "the regions under the earth," in hostility to France for this perfidious deed. And what an outcry would those persons have made, if we had so detained the tens of thousands of the good subjects of "his majesty" that were (and yet are) sneaking through the United States, to do the business of voyalty and British commerce? Would they not have travelled to France, as the custom is, for the precedent, talking largely of "French influence?" But—where is the sympathy of these men for their own brethren so treated by the British? Is it locked up in the temple of Jai gernaut with "British religion," enlisted on the side of "British liberty" in Ireland or India, or packed up in the military chest at Malden, where "humanity" keeps its money for the purchase of scotchs? It must be somewhere, for those that were so sensitive a few years ago, on a foreign subject, should have some feeling when the case, vastly aggravated, lies at their own door.

This procedure must be corrected—"peaceably, if we can, violently if we must." We hope that congress will look to it. We have yet hostages enough for the just treatment of our invaluable seamen; and would detain as prisoners, for exchange, every Englishman of such description of persons as we may be assured yet considers the "fast anchored isle" as his home. All the world would applaud the justice and policy of this conduct; and a wretch, indeed, he must be (except he is of those who hold all wars as unlawful) that would deprecate the fair retaliation. With all our heart and soul, we say, let it be done—and the balance will soon be on the other side. Such was the line that guided Washington and taught the foe humanity in the former war.

The new sloop of war launched at Charlestown, (Mass.) on the 11th inst. is called the "Frabe" in compliment to Jones' victory;—and that building on the Merrimack is to be called the Wasp.

We have the particulars of the capture of the Matilda privateer off St. Salvador, by the Lion privateer of London. The Matilda attempted to carry the Lion by boarding, which was affected in the most gallant style—but the force of her opponent was too strong and the party was overpowered. The Matilda carried 11 guns, and had 104 men and boys—the Lion had 38 heavy guns and 120 men.

Yet the dispute was obstinate, and many were killed on each side. Several of the Matilda's people were killed and wounded after her colors were down; the captain of the Lion having ordered no quarters.

Some of the American privateers, we learn from London papers, are "very vexatious on the coast of Ireland." The Fox got a supply of provisions and water "from the country people." Many valuable ships have been prevented from sailing on her account! If the United States would fit out 50 or 60 of our fast sailing vessels, with 10 or 12 guns each and from 20 to 120 men, with orders to "sink, burn and destroy all that swim," after the manner of the Chesapeake heroes, we should have the real value of that boast that Britain owns the winds and sea. They are the very things to make the enemy feel the wrongs he has committed.

The True Breeded Yankee has at last been taken by the English—she had only 32 men on board at the time.

Our naval force on Champlain is increasing. So is the British. We look for a fierce rencontre on this lake, before long.

The cartel ship Moses Brown has arrived at New-York, from Chatham, (Eng.) with 272 American prisoners.

A small vessel was lately sent out from Fort Gates (New-York) in disguise, and succeeded in "surrounding" one of the British barges, after killing several of the crew—the rest were brought into New-York.

Lewis' squadron or flotilla of gun boats, for the defence of New-York, consists of 26 sail of vessels; well fitted for service, and manned with excellent crews, completely disciplined. They passed into the sound, and exchanged a few shots on the 9th inst. with the British frigate Acasta, and Atalanta sloop of war, off Hunter's island. It blew hard; com. Lewis could not force a general battle, the enemy retired to their former station off Gardiner's island. After which the flotilla returned and resumed their old post at Sandy Hook.

The gun boat that was taken by the British in the Delaware, has since drifted on shore, near Great Egg Harbor, without any person on board, but little injured, except in her upper works. But those who found her cut her to pieces to get out the iron that was in her!

The British have refused to acknowledge as a cartel the packet sent into England by commodore Rodgers [see last no. page 28.] The prisoners, therefore, we suppose as lost to exchange.

It is stated that one of our privateers off Lough-willy, Ireland, has captured "five linen ships" and sent them to Norway.

On Monday last the British frigate that has been cruising for some time off Sandy Hook, chased a smack close in with the light. Some guns were fired at her from the fort, two of which, from the apparent confusion on board, was supposed to have taken effect, on which she sheered off. She also fired towards the fort, but her shot fell greatly short. The smack escaped; and the frigate has been more manly since.

Our frigates.—We hear nothing of the President, Congress or Essex since our last.

At our latest accounts from the coast of North Carolina, the letter of marque schooner Globe, of Baltimore, was in chase of his majesty's schooner Paz; and we expect has caught her.

The citizens of Georgetown, Demerara, have erected a monumental tablet to the memory of the British captain Peacock, who fell in the action between the Hornet and Peacock, and have presented to Mrs. Peake, "a memorial of their gratitude, respect and admiration of her gallant and much honored husband." They have also raised a liberal sum of money, and placed it in the hands of captain Peake's father, to be distributed among the wives, children and near relations of the crew who perished in the engagement.

The frigate Constitution and brig Syren, both at Boston, are nearly ready for sea.

SPLENDID NAVAL VICTORY.—We have the high gratification to record an account of another naval victory, as splendid as any that preceded it. Again has the bloody cross descended in homage to the "striped bunting"—again is the naval column decked with a trophy most brilliant, and the fact made manifest that our tars (if fairly met) in defence of "free trade and sailors' rights," are invincible. Again has the haughty foe been taught a useful lesson of mortality—little does his high blown pride and great swelling words avail him, for the well-pointed cannon regards not his boastings. May he profit from these things—cease his barbarisms, and learn to reverence justice!

In addition to the particulars officially given below, we have the following from other sources. The Enterprise rates as 12 guns, but carries 16, viz. 14 18lb carronades and 2 long 9's—her officers and crew consisted of 102 persons, and her burthen is about 165 tons. The Boxer rates as a 14 gun brig, but carries 18, viz. 16 18lb carronades and 2 long 9's, her force at the time of the action was 104 men, and her burthen is about 300 tons. The first is an old light built vessel, the latter is new and very strong. The gallant Burrows received his mortal wound at the commencement of the action; but he refused to be carried below, until the conquered sword of the enemy was presented to him—he seized it in both his hands, and said, "I am satisfied—I die contented."—and soon expired. The Englishman's colors were nailed to the mast; but his tongue was not fastened and he called for quarters: the captain, however, had fallen.

The disparity in the damage sustained by the two vessels, is as usual. We had 14, in all, killed and wounded; the enemy lost at least 39—probably more; for the number of men in her books is not accounted for; many were thrown overboard before we had possession of her, with the same laudable view that lieutenant Chadds of the Java had, of diminishing or concealing her real force.

Soon after the arrival of the Enterprise and her prize at Portland, the bodies of the two commanding officers, lieutenant Burrows and captain Blythe, were brought on shore in ten oared barges, rowed at minute strokes by masters of ships, accompanied by most of the barges and boats in the harbor, while minute guns were fired from the two vessels. A grand procession was then formed, the corpse of Burrows preceding, and the interment took place with all the honors that the civil and military authorities at the place, and the great body of the people, could bestow. During the procession forts Preble and Scammel (names dear to their country) fired minute guns.

Lieutenant Burrows was an excellent young man. He was the son of colonel Burrows formerly of the marine corps. Of lieutenant McCall the people will judge by the termination of the fight and his modest account of it; which is, perhaps, the most splendid action, on our side, since the war. Captain Blakely, lately of the Enterprise, to whom certainly some part of the credit is due for the complete discipline of the men, had a short time before left that vessel to superintend the building and fitting out of a new sloop of war that he is to command. Lieut. Burrows was, we believe, a native of South-Carolina—a true born yankee. He lived in honor and died in glory. With Pike and Lawrence his name shall be inscribed on the lists of everlasting remembrance—sweet to the recollection of all who love their country.

It is worthy of record that the crew of the Boxer were permitted to march in the late procession at Portland, when their late captain was interred. Such was not the case with the crew of the Chesapeake.

Copy of a letter from captain Hull to the secretary of the navy.

PORTLAND, Sept. 7, 1815.

SIR—I had the honor last evening to forward you by express, through the hands of commodore Bainbridge, a letter received from Samuel Storer, esq. navy agent at this place, detailing an account of the capture of the British brig Boxer by the United States' brig Enterprise.

I now have to inform you that I left Portsmouth this morning and have this moment arrived, and, as the mail is closing, I have only time to enclose you the report of lieutenant McCall, of the Enterprise, and to assure you that a statement of the situation of the two vessels as to the damage they have received, &c. shall be forwarded as soon as surveys can be made. The Boxer has received much damage in her hull, masts and sails, indeed it was with difficulty she could be kept afloat to get her in. The Enterprise is only injured in her masts and sails.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ISAAC HULL.

The Hon. Wm. Jones, Secretary of the Navy.

United States' Brig Enterprise,

Portland, 7th September, 1815.

SIR—In consequence of the unfortunate death of lieutenant-commandant William Burrows, late commander of this vessel, it devolves on me to acquaint you with the result of the cruise. After sailing from Portsmouth on the 1st instant, we steered to the eastward; and on the morning of the 3d, off Wood Island, discovered a schooner, which we chased into this harbor, where we anchored. On the morning of the 4th, weighed anchor and swept out, and continued our course to the eastward. Having received information of several privateers being off Mahabau, we stood for that place; and on the following morning, in the bay near Penguin Point, discovered a brig getting under way, which appeared to be a vessel of war, and to which we immediately gave chase. She fired several guns and stood for us, having four ensigns hoisted. After reconnoitering and discovering her force, and the nation to which she belonged, we hailed upon a wind to stand out of the bay, and at 3 o'clock shortened sail, tacked to run down with an intention to bring her to close action. At twenty minutes after 3 P.M. when within half pistol shot, the firing commenced from both, and after being warmly kept up, and with some manœuvring, the enemy hailed and said they had surrendered, about 4 P.M.—their colors being nailed to the masts, could not be heaved down. She proved to be his B. M. brig Boxer, of 14 guns, Samuel Blythe, esq. commander, who fell in the early part of the engagement, having received a cannon shot through the body. And I am sorry to add that lieutenant Burrows, who had gallantly led us into action, fell also about the same time by a musket ball, which terminated his existence in eight hours.

The Enterprise suffered much in spars and rigging, and the Boxer in spars, rigging and hull, having many shots between wind and water.

It would be doing injustice to the merit of Mr. Tillinghast, second-lieutenant, were I not to mention the able assistance I received from him during the remainder of the engagement, by his strict attention to his own division and other departments.

And of the officers and crew generally, I am happy to add, their cool and determined conduct have my warmest approbation and applause.

As no muster roll that can be fully relied on has come into my possession, I cannot exactly state the number killed and wounded on board the Boxer, but from information received from the officers of that vessel, it appears there were between twenty and twenty-five killed, and fourteen wounded. Enclosed is a list of the killed and wounded on board the Enterprize. I have the honor to be, &c.

EDWARD R. MCCALL, Senior Officer.

Isaac Hull, esq. commanding naval officer on the east-rih station.

List of killed and wounded on board the United States' brig Enterprize, in the engagement with the British brig Boxer, the 5th Sept. 1812.

Killed.—Nathaniel Garen, ordinary seaman.

Wounded.—William Burrows, esq. commander, (since dead); Kervin Waters, midshipman, mortally; Elisha Blossom, carpenter's-mate, (since dead); David Norton, quarter-master; Russel Coats, quarter-master; Thomas Owings, quarter-master; Benjamin Cammon, boatswain's-mate; Sculler Prapley, seaman; James Snow, do.; Snow Jones, do.; Peter Barnard, ordinary seaman; William Thomas, 2d, seaman; John Fitzmaurice, marine.

EDWARD R. MCCALL, Senior officer.

Copy of a letter from Wm. H. Allen, commanding the United States' brig Argus, to the secretary of the navy, dated L'Orient, (France,) June 12, 1813.

Sir—I have the honor to inform you, that the United States' brig Argus, has arrived here in a passage of twenty-three days, all well. On our passage fell in with (in pursuing our course) the British schooner Salamanca (formerly the King of Rome, of New-York) of two hundred and sixty tons, pierced for eighteen guns, mounting six and manœuvred with sixteen men—she was from Oporto bound to Newfoundland; captured and burnt her.

I shall immediately proceed to put in execution your orders as to our ulterior destination.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. ALLEN.

Hon. Wm. Jones, secretary of the navy.

The U. S. brig Argus remained but three days at L'Orient, after landing Mr. Crawford. She is supposed to have sailed on a cruise.

BLOCKADE OF NEW-LONDON.

The blockading squadron consists of the Valiant, 74, Acasta 48, Orpheus 38 and Atalanta of 18 guns. The two latter made an excursion down the sound, and some of their barges were within 18 miles of New-York—they captured and destroyed many small vessels; but retired when Lewis's flotilla was ready to meet them. The militia of the neighboring shores assembled with the greatest alacrity; but the enemy did not attempt to land.

BLOCKADE OF THE CHESAPEAKE.

The enemy has been very quiet since our last. His remaining force still continues in Lynhaven bay. A deserter says they have given up the idea of attempting any other grand object until the next spring; when, it was said, a very powerful force would be sent to the Chesapeake. The squadron on the 9th, consisted of one 74, a brig and a sloop of war.

A gentleman from Maryland [says the Richmond Enquirer] says, that information had been obtained from the British squadron, stating that a regular account is kept of the slaves taken off, the names of their masters, and of the sales, on the coffee estates in the West Indies.—(For likely fellows $1000 had been obtained). Five of these slaves had been taken from col. J. T. Murray, of Maryland, and sold.

A. Admiral Warren, with all the speculative sagacity of a London merchant, assigns the reason of this extraordinary value, to wit:—that since the trade to Africa has been suspended, the coffee estates in the West Indies have become excessively thin of slaves.

551 Schooner ——— from the West Indies for Halifax, with a cargo of sugar and coffee, captured by the mate [an American] and some of the crew, and carried into Castine.

552 Schooner ——— laden with salt, captured by the privateer boat Terrible, and ransomed.

553 Brig ——— sent into Newbern, N. C. deeply laden with lrv goods, invoiced at £ 85,000 sterling, equal to $ 368,520, by the Snap Dragon.

Banking capital of Maryland.

The following is a list of the banks in the state of Maryland, the date of their institution, and the amount of their chartered capital.

	INSTITUTED.	CAPITAL.
Bank of Maryland	1790	$300,000
Baltimore	1795	1,200,000
Union Bank of Maryland	1804	3,000,000
Mechanics	1806	1,000,000
Commercial and Farmers'	1810	1,000,000
Farmers' and Merchants'	1810	500,000
Franklin	1810	600,000
Marine	1810	600,000
City Bank	1813	1,000,000
Farmers' Bank of Maryland	1804	1,200,000
Hagerstown	1810	250,000
Elkton	1811	300,000
Farmers Bank of Worcester and Somerset	1812	200,000
Cumberland	1812	200,000

Of which about seven millions are actually paid in, Sept. 1813. All the charters are now about to expire, but may be extended to the year 1835; on condition that the banks in the city of Baltimore, and the Hagerstown Bank, do subscribe for as many shares of stock in the great western road, joining the United States road at Cumberland and proceeding to Baltimore, as shall complete the said road, estimated to cost $355,000; and that all the banks pay the sum of $20,000 annually, (in proportion to their capitals) for the support of county schools during the said extension of their charters. The road when made, to be the property of the banks, as other turnpikes are held.

Naturalization of Citizens.

By the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization, as they now stand, except as they respect the subjects of the British government, there are two descriptions of aliens, viz. 1. Those who were in the United States at any time between the 18th June, 1798, and the 14th April, 1802; and, 2. Those who have arrived in the United States since the last mentioned period. The following are the conditions on which they can be naturalized, and not otherwise :

The 1st class. By proving that they were residing within, and under the jurisdiction of the United States before the 14th April, 1802, and that they have ever since continued to reside within the same.

The 2d class. 1. All who have arrived in the U. States since the 14th April, 1802, shall make report of him or herself to the clerk of any court of record; which report shall contain the name, place of birth, age, nation, and allegiance, with the country whence he or she migrated, and the place of his or her intended residence. This report the clerk records, and grants a certificate, under his hand and seal of office. If the alien be under 21 years of age, the report must be made by the parent, guardian, master or mistress of the alien. This certificate is to be exhibited to the court, as evidence of the time of arrival in the U. States.

2. After this report is made, the alien must reside 5 years at least in the United States, one of which must be in the state or territory where the court sits, to which application is made for naturalization. But he or she must, at least 3 years before that time, declare in open court, upon oath or affirmation, that it was bona fide his or her intention to become a citizen of the United States and renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state or sovereignty whereof such alien may, at that time, be a citizen or subject. Of this notice the clerk makes a record, and gives a certificate, under his hand and seal of office; which, along with the certificate of report and registry, must be exhibited to the court, when application is made for naturalization.

3. The court must be satisfied of the aforesaid residence, and that the alien, during the time, has behaved as a person of good moral character, and attached to the principles of the constitution of the United States, and well disposed towards the peace and good order of the same. Upon this proof being made, the oath of abjuration and allegiance is administered. The oath of the applicant cannot be admitted, in any case, to prove the residence. If the applicant belong to any of the orders of nobility, he must, under oath, forever renounce the title or titles.

As there was a provision in the several naturalization laws, that no subject of any country, state or sovereign, with whom the United States shall be at war, at the time of his application, shall be then admitted to be a citizen of the United States—Of course, since the declaration of war with Great Britain, the subjects of that government were altogether excluded from the benefits of the naturalization laws, until the passage of the following act :

[BY AUTHORITY.]

An act supplementary to the acts heretofore passed on the subject of an uniform rule of naturalization.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, That persons resident within the United States or the territories thereof, on the 18th day of June, in the year 1812, who had before that day made a declaration, according to law, of their intentions to become citizens of the United States, or who, by the existing laws of the United States, were on that day entitled to become citizens, without making such declaration, may be admitted to become citizens thereof, notwithstanding they shall be alien enemies at the times and in the manner prescribed by the laws heretofore passed on that subject. Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be taken or construed to interfere with or prevent the apprehension and removal, agreeably to law, of any alien enemy, at any time previous to the actual naturalization of such alien.

H. CLAY, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

E. GERRY, Vice president of the U. S. and president of the senate.

Martial-Law Case.

FROM THE BALTIMORE FEDERAL GAZETTE.
HIGHLY IMPORTANT DECISION.

Daniel Wells, by George Mackenzie, } and }
John Poeck, by Alexander Briscoe, } Habes Corpus.
vs. }
John Kennedy.

The petitioners were infants under the age of twenty-one, but above the age of 13 years, and were apprentices. Having on the tenth day of August, 1813, been arrested by a file of armed men acting under the orders of the said John Kennedy, and forcibly carried to a camp in the vicinity of this city, and there detained by him, a writ of Habes Corpus, was on application of the masters of the apprentices, issued to the said Kennedy by his honor Judge Bland, commanding him to produce the bodies of the petitioners, with the cause of their capture and detention, on Wednesday the 11th August, at 10 o'clock A. M. at the Court-House of Baltimore county. In obedience to the writ, the Defendant (Kennedy) appeared at the time and place appointed, with the petitioners in his custody.

In consequence of the want of certain papers, which necessarily formed a part of the return to the writ, and on account of the very great importance of the case, which required that the return should be complete, the case stood adjourned until the 12th August, at 10 o'clock, and the petitioners were removed until that hour to the custody of the Defendant (Kennedy). On Thursday, the 20th of August, the petitioners were brought up by the Defendant, who made the following return to the writ, which return was sworn to in the usual manner.

RETURN.

The return of John Kennedy, captain commanding a company in the 27th regiment of Maryland militia, to the writs of Habes Corpus to him directed by the hon. Theodorick Bland, associate judge of the sixth judicial district, commanding him to have the bodies of Daniel Wells and John Poeck, before him at 10 o'clock, on this day at the Court-House with the day and cause of their capture and detention.

The said John Kennedy in return to said writ saith, that the said Wells and Poeck reside in his district, and are of legal age et de militatibus. That in virtue of Division Orders from major general Samuel Smith, dated 6th August, 1813, which are hereto annexed (marked A.) and prayed to be taken as part of this return, and of Brigade Orders in pursuance thereof of 7th August, which are hereto annexed (marked B.) the said John Kennedy was ordered by Lieut. col. Kennedy Long, commanding officer of the 27th regiment, which orders are hereto annexed (marked C.) to call out his said Kennedy's militia men on a tour of duty for a week, in order to repel a threatened invasion of the state, to commence on Monday the 9th August. That in compliance with the said orders, he the said John Kennedy, did duly notify the said Wells and Poeck, so liable as militia men to do the tour of duty, as members of his militia company, and to attend at the usual place of meeting of said company, in order to perform said tour of duty. That the said Wells and Poeck did not attend according to said notice, whereupon the said John Kennedy, in virtue of orders from the commanding officer of the 27th regiment, on the 10th day of August, sent a guard, and did on the said day take the said Wells and Poeck into custody, in order to compel a performance on their part of the said tour of duty—which is the day and cause of the said capture and detention.

On the above return, the case was submitted after a few observations made by the counsel on behalf of the masters, some little discussion also took place on the question whether the legislature could ever have intended that the rights of masters should be infringed by compelling or permitting their apprentices to perform militia duty.

His honor Judge Bland observed, that the militia laws did not exempt persons above the age of sixteen years, even though they were apprentices, from militia duty. That time it was the master had a right to the services of his apprentice, which might be derived from the laws of the state; but that there was a period at which the state had also a right to his services, and that right was paramount to that of the master.

It is observed, that upon a minute investigation and a careful comparison of all the militia laws, the case was a plain one—it appeared to him to lie in the narrowest limits.

By the act, said his honor, of Miss. 137, chap. 19, sect. 1, there is a provision for calling out the militia by draft in the manner thereby prescribed, and by the 6th section of the same law, a penalty is prescribed for the non-compliance of these de facto. By the 5th section of the same law, there is a provision for calling out the militia en masse, or any part thereof, in the cases of emergency therein mentioned. Thus it is evident that there are two distinct modes of calling out the militia. By the act of November session, 1811, (chap. 162, sec. 3), the militia, when ordered out either en masse or in part; by draft, or in any manner that may be directed by the proper military officer in the cases of invasion, or threatened invasion, acc to all intents and purposes subject to the rules and regulations of the articles of war.

The judge interior observed, that it was not for him in his judicial capacity, or for a court of justice to say when such an emergency existed as would require the exercise of the powers vested by the 3d section of the act of 1813. The law had vested the military officer, with a discretionary power and subjected him to the control of the commander-in-chief. It was simply his duty as a judge to see whether the case before him was fairly within the provisions of that section.

The judge in conclusion observed, that at a crisis such as that contemplated by the law, when the state was actually invaded or threatened with invasion, it could not have been the intention of the legislature, that an officer was to be delayed until a substitute could be furnished, when, perhaps, the services of every man in the district might be instantly wanted to repel an invasion. At such a crisis, could any reasonable man suppose, that the legislature intended that judges and courts of justice should be employed in idly issuing writs of Habeas Corpus when the enemy might be at our doors?

The case before me (said the judge) is brought by the return not only within the spirit, but almost within the letter of the law. The prisoners are properly in the custody of Capt. Kennedy—he had a right to take them by force. Therefore, let them be remanded to his custody.

GENERAL ORDERS—3d Division. 6th August, 1813.

The appearance of the enemy near to the port of Baltimore, makes it my duty, as Major-General and commanding officer, to be prepared to meet any attack which may be attempted. Therefore, Ordered, That the 3rd Brigade be held in readiness, prepared for action; and that one regiment be drawn forth for one week's service, to be relieved weekly by another, to be encamped near the Magazine.

S. SMITH,

Major-General 3d Division.

To Brig. General John Stricker,
3d Brigade M. A.

BRIGADE ORDERS.—3d Brigade, M. A.

Baltimore, August 7th, 1813.

Ordered, that the 27th regiment, Lieut. Col. Long, encamp on the height near the Powder Magazine, on Monday morning, for a week's service—Trunks and Camp Kettles will be furnished by the State Quarter-Master and rations by the Contractor, Mr. Robinson.

Col. Long will avail himself of the present occasion, to drill his regiment, which must be commenced at the morning gun-fire, and repeated in the evening of each day.

He will make a morning report to the major general at headquarters. Muster rolls will be made out by the captains of their respective companies, to which their names will hereafter be required.

By order of Brigadier-General Stricker,

J. CALHOUN, Jun

Brigade-Maj. 3d Brigade.

[C.]—REGIMENTAL ORDERS.

In conformity to Brigade Orders of this date, you are hereby ordered to notify the men attached to your company to assemble on Monday the 9th inst. at 8 o'clock A. M. before the Theatre, each provided with a blanket and one day's provisions; to be encamped on a week's tour of duty between the Town and Fort.

Punctual attendance in officers and men is at this crisis to be expected, and will be enforced.

By order,

JAMES L. DONALDSON,

Adjutant 27th Regiment.

Captain Kennedy.

The following sections of the Act of November session, 1811, chap. 182, are those referred to by the Judges giving the power to enforce the attendance of the militia; the 17th section applying only to drafts of militia, and the 31st sect. to all cases when the militia are ordered into general service.

17. And be it enacted, That in all cases where a militia man may be drafted to perform a tour of duty and in this act, he shall be considered as a soldier, and liable to all the duties as such, unless he shall furnish a substitute; and the commanding officer of the regiment or extra battalion (as the case may be) to which he may belong, shall be the sole judge of the qualification of said substitute, and may receive or reject him at his discretion.—May, 1815, chap. 19, s. c. 4.

31. And be it enacted, That when the whole or any part of the militia of this state shall be ordered into actual service, they shall be subject to the rules and regulations of the articles of war, and be entitled to the same pay and rations as troops in the service of the United States are entitled to receive.

THE CHRONICLE.

The Batture.—The long contested claim to this valuable property, has, as we are informed by a letter from New Orleans, been at last settled, and the case probably laid at rest. By a decision of the U. States' court for the district of New Orleans, the act of the late merchant, D'O'Genois, in dispossessing Mr. E. Lewis, Lieutenant of the Batture, has been declared illegal, and he has been, by an order of the court, again put in possession by the present marshal.

By a mercantile gentleman, recently from Europe, we have been politely handed the following decree of the emperor. As we do not recollect to have seen it before, and presuming that it may be interesting to some of our commercial friends, we give it publicity.

“PARIS, 5th Feb. 1813.

“His imperial and royal majesty held on Tuesday last a council of finances, at which the duke of Gaete, minister of finance, and count Mollien, minister of the treasury, assisted. Amongst other measures prescribed by his majesty, it was decided that the claims for supplies delivered at St. Domingo, which have been liquidated in the sum of 7,100,000 francs, should be paid by the treasury in 5 per cent. stock; arising from property of this nature recovered by that department, as appears by their books. This payment will take place at the rate of 2,000,000 francs capital, or 100,000 francs interest per month, in March, April and May. The balance of 1,100,000 francs capital producing 33,000 francs interest, will be discharged in June.

Private letters from Paris state, that the above 7,100,000 francs are to be appropriated to the payment of claims originating under the administrations of governors Le Clerc to Rochambeau inclusively, and represent the sum 31 to 32,000,000 francs. All demands or claims of a prior date are null.

In the cartel ship arrived at New-York, Mr. De Kaulzora, his lady and two daughters were passengers. This gentleman is minister plenipotentiary from the court of Sweden near the United States.

George III. yet lives, though politically dead. The bulletin at Windsor, July 3, said, “his majesty has generally passed the last month in tranquillity and comfort.”

We have a great quantity of news from Europe, since our last, but nothing very important is mentioned. The general aspect of things is decidedly in favor of a continental peace. Soult entered Spain by the Pass of St. Jean Pied de Port, with 45,000 men and forced the allies to raise the sieges of Pampluna and St. Sebastian, with loss. Wellington had “fallen back on his resources.” England, Russia, and Prussia, without specie, have issued a large quantity of paper, the payment of which is guaranteed by the three powers to carry on the war on the continent. Bernadotte gets all the cash they can send to the north. The French have collected a mighty army in Italy and large bodies of troops are moving to the head-quarters of Napoleon, to counsel the allies to peace. The British represent the forces of Russia as feeble, and are horror-struck at the facility with which Bonaparte has created his armies.

It is stated, by letters from France that the council of prizes are restoring many American vessels—the decrees of condemnation of the emperor himself in some cases being reversed.

By an arrival at New-York from Lisbon, it appears probable that the English general Hill has been killed, the whole of the division of the army under his command being destroyed or taken. Another account says, he only lost two regiments, and that the rest were retreating. Soult has arrived in Spain; and the allies with great precipitation were collecting their forces to withstand him. Will lord Wellington make as good a retreat as sir John Moore?

From Mexico we have a continuation of delightful views. The “whiggy” of the country prospers exceedingly. The patriots gather strength daily; and we trust, that God and the goodness of their cause, will give them, and all who seek liberty, the complete success they deserve.

Anglo-Swedish Treaty.

TREATY OF CONSORT AND SUBSIDIES, BETWEEN HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY AND THE KING OF SWEDEN, SIGNED AT STOCKHOLM ON THE SECOND OF MARCH, 1813.—In the name of the most holy and indivisible trinity:

His majesty the king of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and his majesty the king of Sweden, equally animated with a desire of drawing closer the ties of friendship and good understanding which so happily subsists between them, and penetrated with the urgent necessity of establishing, the one with the other, a concerted intimacy, so as to insure the independence of the north; and in fine, to accelerate the so much desired epoch of a general peace, have agreed to accomplish this double object by the present treaty. To this effect, they have chosen for their plenipotentiaries, to wit: His royal highness the prince regent, in the name of, and for his majesty the king of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the hon. Alexander Hope, major general of the armies of his majesty; and Edward Thormeton, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary near his majesty the king of Sweden. And the king of Sweden: Lawrens, count d'Engestrom, one of the lords of the kingdom of Sweden, minister of state and of foreign affairs, chancellor of the university of land, commandant of the orders of the king, knight of the royal order of Charles XIII, grand eagle of the legion of France; and Gustave, baron of Wettersted, chancellor of the court, commander of the order of the polar star, &c. all of whom, after having duly exchanged their respective full powers, have agreed to the following articles—to wit:

ARTICLE I. His majesty the king of Sweden pledges himself to employ a corps d'armee to consist of at least 30,000 men, to act exclusively upon the continent against the common enemy of the two high contracting parties. This army will act in concert with the Russian troops placed under the command of his highness the prince royal of Sweden, in conformity to stipulations to that effect, already existing between the courts of Stockholm and St. Peterburgh.

II. The said courts having communicated to his Britannic majesty the engagements subsisting between them, and having formally requested that his majesty accede to them, his majesty the king of Sweden having by the stipulations contained in the preceding article, given proof of the desire with which he is animated to contribute also to the success of the common cause; his Britannic majesty being desirous in return to give an immediate and unequivocal proof of his resolution to unite his interests with those of Sweden and Russia, pledges himself by the present treaty, to accede to those conventions, already existing between those two powers; so much so, that his Britannic majesty will, not only refrain from placing obstacles to the annexation and perpetual re-union of the kingdom of Norway, as an integral part of the kingdom of Sweden, but will facilitate in that respect, the views of his majesty the king of Sweden, either by good offices, or by employing, if it should be necessary, a naval co-operation, to act in concert with the Swedish or Russian troops. It being understood, nevertheless, that compulsive measures shall not be used to effect said re-union of Norway to Sweden, unless his majesty the king of Denmark should have previously refused to join the alliance of the north agreeably to the conditions stipulated in the existing engagements between the courts of Stockholm and St. Petersburg; and his majesty the king of Sweden pledges himself to take special care that in forming this re-union, all possible attention and consideration shall be used to promote the happiness and liberty of the people of Norway.

III. In order to give greater effect to the engagements contracted by his majesty the king of Sweden in the first article of the present treaty, which have for their object immediate operations against the common enemy of the two powers, and in order to place his majesty the king of Sweden in a state to commence said operations without loss of time, and as soon as the season will permit, his Britannic majesty pledges himself to furnish to his majesty the king of Sweden (independently of other succours which incidental circumstances may place at his disposal) for the service of the campaign of the present year, as well as for the equipment, the transportation, and the maintenance of his troops, the sum of one million sterling, payable monthly, in London, to the agent who may be authorised by his majesty to receive the same, in such a manner that the payment of each month shall not exceed the sum of £200,000 sterling until the payment of the total.

IV. It is agreed between the two contracting parties, that an advance, the amount of which shall be determined at the time of payment by the contracting parties, and which shall be deducted out of the million above stipulated, shall be made to his majesty the king of Sweden, to enable him to put his troops in motion at the opening of the campaign. The residue of the abovementioned subsidies shall commence running from the day of the debarkation of the Swedish army, as stipulated in the first article of the present treaty.

V. The two contracting powers mutually desiring a solid and durable guarantee to their relations, both political and commercial, his Britannic majesty, animated with a desire to give to his ally evident proofs of his sincere friendship, consents to cede to his majesty the king of Sweden and to his successors to the crown of Sweden, agreeably to the order of succession established by his majesty and the council of his kingdom, under date of the 26th September, 1810, the possession of Guadaloupe, in the West Indies, and to transfer to his Swedish majesty, all the rights of his Britannic majesty to that Island. That colony shall be delivered to the commissioners of his Swedish majesty in the course of the month of August, in the present year, or three months after the debarkation of the Swedish troops upon the continent. The whole to take place in conformity to conditions agreed to between the two high contracting parties in the separate article annexed to the present treaty.

VI. As a reciprocal act to what is stipulated in the preceding article, his majesty the king of Sweden pledges himself to grant for the space of twenty years, from the date of the ratification of the present treaty, to the subjects of his Britannic majesty, the right of entrepot in the ports of Gottenburg, Carlshamn, and Stralsund, when this latter port shall have fallen under the Swedish dominion, for all kinds of produce and merchandise, either of Great Britain or her colonies, laden on board of English or Swedish ships. The said articles, whether they be of a nature to be introduced into Sweden by paying the duties, or that their introduction be prohibited, shall pay without distinction, as entrepot duty, one per cent of the value at their entry, and the same at the time they are carried away. Upon all other objects to which this article relates, they will be subjected to the general regulations of Sweden, which will treat the subjects of his Britannic majesty as those of the most favored nations.

VII. From the date of the signature of the present treaty, his majesty the king of the united kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, and his majesty the king of Sweden, engage reciprocally not to separate their mutual interests, and particularly those of Sweden, in any negotiation whatever, with their common enemy.

VIII. The ratification of the present treaty shall be exchanged at Stockholm, in the space of four weeks or sooner if possible.

In faith of which, we the undersigned, in virtue of our full powers, have signed the present treaty, and have thereunto affixed the seal of our arms.

Done at Stockholm the 3d of March, in the year of our Lord 1813.

(Signed.)

ALEXANDER HOPE,
EDWARD THORNTON,
Le Comte D'ENGSTRAM,
G. Baron WETTERSTED.

Separate Articles.

In consequence of the cession made by his Britannic majesty in article 5th of the treaty signed this day, of the Island of Guadaloupe, his Swedish majesty engages :

1st. To fulfil faithfully and observe the stipulations of the capitulation of the said island, which bears date the 5th of February, 1810, in such a manner, that all the privileges, rights, benefits, and prerogatives, confirmed by the said act, to the inhabitants of that colony, may be preserved and maintained.

2d. To make to that effect, previous to the above mentioned cession, with his Britannic majesty, all engagements which may be judged necessary, and to execute all the acts caused by said capitulation.

3d. To afford to the inhabitants of Guadaloupe the same protection and the same advantages which are enjoyed by the other subjects of his Swedish majesty, in conformity to the laws actually in existence in Sweden.

4th. To prevent and prohibit from the period of the cession, the introduction of African slaves in the said island, as well as into other possessions of his Swedish majesty in the West Indies, and to forbid Swedish subjects carrying on the slave trade; an engagement which his Swedish majesty is the more disposed to contract, as such acts never were authorized.

5th. To exclude, during the continuation of the present war, all armed vessels and privateers belonging to states at war with Great Britain, from the ports and harbours of Guadaloupe; and to forbid, in any future war in which Great Britain may be engaged, and Sweden remain neutral, the entrance into the ports of said colony, of privateers of any belligerent states.

6th. Not to alienate the said island without the consent of his Britannic majesty.

7th. To afford protection and safety to the subjects of his Britannic majesty and their property, whether they wish to quit the colony or remain in it.

This article will be of the same force and effect, as if it had been inserted word for word in the treaty signed this day, and shall be ratified at the same time.

Done at Stockholm, the 3d March, 1813.

REMARKS BY CORBETT.

Of this treaty, the Whigs disapprove, because as they say, it makes great sacrifices without gaining any thing in return.—To be sure, it is not easy to discover what our government has gained by the treaty; for, it does not seem likely that his royal highness the crown prince will be able, if he be willing, to do much in the fighting way against his old friend and patron; but we, the people of this country, and of every country in the world, have gained greatly by this treaty, which acknowledges the legitimacy of the right of Bernadotte to the crown and dominions of Sweden, to the exclusion of the king, who was, some time ago, driven out of his throne.—A principle is here proclaimed by our government of the utmost importance to the welfare of Europe and the world. We here see it settled that a people may discard their king and choose another in his place, though that other be a foreigner; and that they may settle a succession in the family of that foreigner, to the exclusion of the heirs of the king discarded.

When Dr. Price preached a sermon, in which he stated "that at the revolution in England the point was settled that the people had a right to discard their kings for misconduct," Burke blurted forth against him all the curses in the anti-jacobin list.—He denied the fact. He said that though, indeed, the order of succession was changed from one branch of the old king's family to another; that in fact, the order of succession was preserved as closely as possible, and that it was confined to the protestant part of the old royal family; that there was no right or acknowledged claim of choosing a king, or of descending a king or of making any change in the nature of the government. Something of the same sort is said by Blackstone who labors very hard to make it appear that the thing was right in practice, but wrong in principle; or in other words, to make his readers believe, that it was very right to effect such a change as would put the present family upon the throne; but that would be very wrong to effect such a change as would put them off from the throne.

Whatever might be the motives of these writers, and however they might be able to raise disputes, no doubt can be raised upon this point in the case of Sweden. For her, it is not one branch of the old family excluded in favor of another branch; here there was no dispute about religion; there was no question about Protestantism or Catholicism. The nation put away the late king and his heirs, and gave the crown to Mr. Bernadotte and his heirs in due succession, after the death of the late king's uncle. And observe our government does, in the name of the most holy and undivided trinity, recognize the full and complete right to the crown and his dominions of Sweden to be in the same Mr. Bernadotte and his heirs. Nothing can be more complete than this case. It is perfect in all its parts. Here is a king cashered; here is an old reigning family set aside in the order of succession; here is a settlement of the crown in another family; and to complete the whole thing, the person at the head of that family is a foreigner; nay, and a Frenchman too! What comfort this treaty must pour into the souls of the Bourbon and the other cashiered princes of Europe! With the anti-Jacobins now to tell us what they think. Will they say the treaty was necessary in order to make war with success against Bonaparte? If they do, let them show us what Mr. Bernadotte has done or what he is likely to be able to do. If he should, from whatever cause, do nothing, I shall call upon them for their openly expressed opinion of this treaty, of which I highly approve, because it fully recognizes the right of the crown prince to the throne and dominions of Sweden.

Washington, May 24th, 1813.
 Sir,—I have received your favor of the 2d instant, and hasten to reply to the questions therein, respecting the case of captain John Upton, late commander of the privateer brig Hunter, of Salem. Captain Upton was taken in the month of November last, off the Western Islands, by the British frigate Phoenix, captain Hilliard. In chase, captain Upton, as is usual in such cases, threw his guns overboard to ease his vessel, in hopes by that means to facilitate his escape from the enemy; but this not availing, he was, as above stated, taken and carried into Plymouth, in England, where, on his arrival, he was immediately, with his first lieutenant, Mr. Wynne, put into Mill Prison and refused his parole on the plea that he had not on board, when captured, fourteen mounted carriage guns above the calibre of four pounders. After having been thus closely confined for three or four months in a filthy jail, they were in the month of March taken out and sent on board the prison ship at Chatham, where, when I left England in April last, they still were, in a worse situation, if possible, than in Mill Prison. The allowance, sir, to American prisoners in England, you are acquainted with; it is, therefore, not necessary for me to mention it here. It is but justice to state, that the exertion of the British government the transport board and us every exertion in his power to obtain the paroles of captain Upton and Mr. Wynne, but all would not do; they were deaf to his petition, lost as they are to every sentiment of honor, and every principle of humanity.

Except captain Upton and his first lieutenant, all the rest of his officers and crew were sent on board the prison-ship on their first arrival at Plymouth; among them was the doctor of the Hunter, Mr. Carter, who came home in the cartel Robinson Potter. What I have stated respecting the treatment of captain Upton and Mr. Wynne, I know to be facts, as I had the honor of spending twenty-four hours in Mill Prison with them, and heard those facts related by themselves. Very respectfully, &c.

ALEXANDER COFFIN, Jr.

J. Mason, esq. commissary general of prisoners.

Navy Yard, Charleston, June 3d, 1813.

Sir,—I have the honor to enclose you a deposition respecting inhuman treatment, which Mr. Nichols, late commander of the private armed ship Decatur, belonging to Newburyport, has received from the British government at Barbadoes. I have been credibly informed that captain Nichols is a very respectable and correct man, therefore a fair presumption, that he has not committed himself in such a manner as ought to deprive him of the established rights of a prisoner of war. Any measure which the government of our country may see proper to adopt in consequence of this communication, I shall readily attend to.

WM. BAINBRIDGE.

Hon. Wm. Jones, secretary of the navy, city of Washington.

I, James Foot, of Newburyport, in the county of Essex, and commonwealth of Massachusetts, mariner, testify and depose, that I was a prize-master on board the private armed brigantine Decatur, of Newburyport, in her last cruise, William Nichols, commander: That on the 13th day of January, now last past, the said brigantine was captured by his Britannic majesty's frigate Spruce, commanded by captain Cochran, and carried into Barbadoes. After our arrival in Barbadoes, capt. Nichols, with the other officers of the Decatur, were paroled. About two months after our arrival his Britannic majesty's frigate Vesta arrived in Barbadoes, and through the influence of the commander of the Vesta, captain Nichols, without any known or pretended cause, was arrested and held in close confinement, without liberty to speak to any of his officers or any other American. The place where captain Nichols was confined was about four feet in width and seven feet in length, on board a prison-ship, where he remained for thirty-four days, as nearly as I can recollect, and was then taken on board his majesty's ship Tritone and carried to England. What the cause of the unwarrantable and unjustifiable conduct of the enemy towards capt. Nichols, was, I am unable to state: there were several reports in circulation; one was, that he was to be carried to England and held a prisoner until the release of certain men in France, from whom captain Nichols recaptured his vessel, which had been taken by the British before the commencement of the present war between the two countries; another report was, that he was to be held until the close of the war on account of his having been active against the enemy since the commencement of hostilities, and having been fortunate in a former cruise. JAMES FOOT.

Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Essex, &c.

On this thirty first day of May, in the year of our Lord 1817, personally appeared James Foot, the subscriber to the foregoing deposition and made solemn oath that the same is true.

In witness whereof, JACOB GERRISH, Justice of the peace.

Extract of a letter from the commissary general of prisoners, to Alexander Stewart, esq. United States' agent for prisoners, at Jamaica, dated May 24, 1813.

"I enclose you a copy of an advertisement, said to have been taken from a Jamaica newspaper, apparently put forth by the British agent for prisoners, proposing to hire out American prisoners; you will enquire into this matter, and if it be, as has been stated, you will remonstrate strongly against such a practice; and inform me of the practice, and the result."

[Referred to in the preceding extract.

Port Royal, 25th November, 1812.

Masters of vessels about to proceed to England with convoy, are informed that they may be supplied with a limited number of American seamen (prisoners of war) to assist in navigating their vessels, on the usual terms, by applying to

GEORGE MAUDE, agent.

Extract from a memorial addressed to the secretary of state by James Oron, Joseph B. Cook, Thomas Humphreys and others, masters of American vessels, who were prisoners of war in England, and returned to the United States in the cartel ship Robinson Potter.

"We shall now proceed to give as correct a statement as we can of the treatment of our countrymen (prisoners of war) by the British in England. On the arrival at Plymouth of the masters, first mates, supercargoes and passengers, they are sent to Mill Prison for one day and night; they have no room but to sleep on, with a small mattress which might easily be put into a cart-may's wallet, and a small coarse blanket. The allowance for twenty-four hours are three small salt herrings or about the same weight of salted codfish, or half a pound of beef, one and a half pounds of black bread, a little salt, &c. The second day they are paroled and sent to Ashburton, twenty-four miles from Plymouth; they must pay their own expenses to get there. While they are there, they are allowed 1s. 3d. per diem, or 8s. 9d. sterling per week. Beef is 10d. per pound, bread in proportion, and every other necessary equally dear. The mates, who have nothing but their pay to live upon, join together, eight or ten in a room, hire a room and do their own cooking, washing, &c. and in this way make out to keep from starving. Masters, ship surgeons and passengers generally leave their resources, through their correspondents at Barbadoes, and make out to live, by great economy, at from 30 to 50s. sterling per week, the second mates and other officers are sent on board the different prison-ships. On board some of them they are treated by the commanding officer as well as the nature of the situation will admit; on board of some others they are badly treated. This, it will naturally occur to you, sir, is owing to the different characters of the different commands. Their allowance is 10 1-2 lb. brown bread, 2 1-2 lb. beef, 2 lb. but 5d. 2 lb. potatoes, and 10 ounces barley per week for each man, and 5 ounces of salt per week for ten men. The prison ships are kept very filthy, and the prisoners are confined below at 4 P. M. and are kept in that situation until 7 or 8 A. M. At Portsmouth particularly, they are very sickly, and we are informed the very last, so one days from 8 to 10; in fact, they are very sickly on board all of them; several of this description came home with us in the Robinson Potter cart 1, and had, when they came on board, the appearance of having made their escape from a churchyard. It is not, perhaps, amiss that we should state what we firmly believe to be the fact, that the policy of the British government to select the sickly to be first sent in cart 1, and keep the hale and hearty sent last until they become sickly, thus making the whole of those gallant sons of Neptune who escape death when they return to their homes, at least for some time, slip readily away from them, never and quite so to their country from their debilitated state; and, in fact, the probability is, that many of them will end in their graves the sadible stamp upon their constitutions of the treatment which they received on board British prison-ships; for that nation seems to have lost its boasted humanity, and if we did not find the word in their vocabulary we should suppose it had never found a place there. Many of the seamen, prisoners on board these prison-ships, are impressed if Americans who have given themselves up, or losing to fight against their country. Four hundred on board the Decatur in the Mediterranean, a short time before we left England, surrendered the vessel and were sent to Gibraltar and England; several of them were most cruelly flogged for refusing to do their duty, were put in irons, and most of them, to their immortal credit, submitted to the severest punishment in preference to assist the enemies of their country. Some of us, whose proceedings are unassailable, were witness to the cruel fact. A tablet of gold is not rich enough to satisfy the avarice of such men; it is, and when a country can boast of such services, she has nothing to fear from the enemy on the ocean or on any equal footing. Capt. Jeduthan Jonathan master of the private armed brig Hunter, of Salem, of 14 guns, because he threw the crew and in this was not allowed his parole, but kept in close confinement for a long time in Mill Prison, and lately has been sent on board a prison-ship at Chatham. We mention these facts in hopes that government will retaliate exactly in the same way. Captain Samuel Turner, late master of the private armed ship of New York, was taken on his passage to France in October, 1811, prior to the war, and in returning his vessel, the prize-master, a British abolitionist, was killed; he arrived safely in France, and on his return to America was again taken, in June, 1812, and sent to Barbadoes, where he was paroled; he was on his way to England, and so on board the St. Salvador, an armed cartel flag ship, at Plymouth, where he was again a close prisoner until about January of the present year, when he was sent on board the prison ship at Chatham, where we fear he will remain until death releases him; he has been very 21 treated, much abused, put in irons, and afterwards threatened to be hanged. These facts, some of us who saw this, we witness to be true. We pray, in the name of justice, that government will take, without delay, the case of captain Turner into their serious consideration; in a case which we think demands it, and the only way to be sure that nation from committing further outrages so degrading to human nature. We find in Roman history, that an injury or insult offered to a Roman citizen by a foreign power was considered as an insult offered to the whole Roman nation, and hope this will also be the American creed, because we believe it will be the surest way of putting a stop to those indignities which Americans have so often been obliged to suffer. We are, however, no advocates for cruelty, but on the contrary, for lenity; yet we will still believe, that in certain cases retaliation is not only necessary but becomes a duty to prevent further cruelties on the part of an enemy."

Dear Brother,—I embrace this, the earliest opportunity of communicating to you, that on the 9th instant, fifteen days out, we fell in with and captured the fine copper-bottomed ship Venus, vessel and cargo worth at least twenty-five thousand dollars. On the 12th, pistoning our course and within five days run of your place, we were captured by his majesty's sloop Moselle, George Moubrey, commander, and brought into this place. We remained on board the sloop two or three days, and on the 19th were transferred from thence to the prison-ship where we are now imprisoned, under an allowance of six ounces of bread, three gills of rice, eight ounces of the worst of beef, including bone, which is as much as meat, with as much brackish water as we can use; guarded day and night by ten or fifteen savage Africans, who are total strangers to humanity, and confined every evening at sundown, not to be released until next morning at sunrise, abused to the lowest degree by the guard, and compelled to find fuel for and cook our own victuals with green mangoes. None of us are ever permitted, under any condition whatever, to visit the shores, with many other barbarous acts, which are too numerous to describe. This will be conveyed by the cartel sloop, captain Cooper, being the second cartel which has sailed since our arrival here. A schooner from Baltimore was only allowed eighteen in return, while we, sixteen-four prisoners, are only allowed eighteen in return, while we, eighteen in number, are detained in this miserable place; for which we cannot assign any reason, except to punish us as privateersmen, or as hostages for those twelve lately detained in Charleston; this last is the general belief, and as such, I deem a communication of the circumstance essential to commodore Dent, commander of the southern station, that he may look to it and enquire the cause why Americans are to be detained here two or three months, while more prisoners have been received here, by a great many, than what have been sent to the United States. Men who have arrived here since we, have been sent off; they proceed with no degree of regularity in the exchange of prisoners, and act in open contradiction to every thing right, and really believe, that except you make known the circumstance and use some favorable exertions, that some of us will be intentionally detained until the end of our present contest with Great Britain. As I wish your exertions for our exchange, I have submitted a list of those who are thus miserably treated, that we may be demanded in a proper way. The Rapid's crew have been imprisoned here near three months, and have now no prospect of getting away, while the crews of two other privateers have been released.

Crew of the Lady Lark.—Lieut. Antine Lambert, Wm. L. Roberts, William Thomas, John Craudel, David Ashton, John Ganebach, John Hynes, Darius Swain, John McKeezie.

Other prisoners.—Simon West, Mathew Budge.

I wrote Mr. Peck and requested him to forward me a letter of introduction to some one here and also a protection shewing that I am an American. As it is possible that he may not get my letters, you will notice my request and pay that attention which it deserves. I mentioned in my letter to Mr. Peck, that any funds which I received here would be returned on application, as my expenditure will, through an economical provision, be as small as possible. I indulge the hope that you will conform to my wishes in this particular, and also inform Mr. Kelly of our imprisonment here, and request his influence in facilitating our exchange, with any other services.

We have no chance of gaining information here. Every person uses every exertion to keep us in ignorance; however, we are enabled to say, that the English prisoners have generally complained in speaking of the treatment they received in the U. States.

WM. L. ROBESON.

Capt. Thomas J. Robeson.

S. B. The Moselle, Rhodian and Variable, three men of war, have just convoyed five or six vessels over the bar bound to some part of England; it is supposed that they will return to cruise off Charleston. In case you address or send any thing for me to this place, you will direct to the care of M^{rs}. Sain, Dunsmo & Co. merchants here. I am yours, &c.

Harford, May 9, 1813.

Sir.—Annexed is captain Samuel Chew's deposition, taken before judge Edwards at New-Haven. We expected it in season to have forwarded it by Mr. Dodd; but received it too late, so that Mr. Huntington, the United States' attorney for Connecticut district, and now forward it to you per mail. Yours respectfully, LUTHER SAUSAGE & Co.

Hon. James Monroe,
Connecticut District, &c.

On this day, the 7th of May, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and thirteen, personally came before me, Pierpont Edwards, judge of the district court of the United States, for the district aforesaid, Samuel Chew, of the city of New-Haven, in the said district, and being duly sworn, deposed, that he was at Bridgetown, in the harbor of Barbadoes, in the West Indies, in the month of February now last past, that on board a British prison-ship at Barbadoes, there were confined about 525 American prisoners of the crews of private armed vessels of the United States and mercantile, captured since the war. At the time the deponent was at Barbadoes the American prisoners were supplied with bread, and some meat; as to vegetables, the deponent was not informed. The regulations on board the said prison-ship compelled the prisoners to go below decks, where they were confined at even day and until morning; as many as could were suspended in hammocks, and still there was not sufficient room below them for all to lie down. In this respect the situation of the prisoners was not only extremely uncomfortable, but hazardous, and more especially, should there be, as was apprehended, a scarcity of provisions during the approaching hot months. The deponent was not permitted to go on board said prison-ship, but deposed that his communication from masters of vessels, prisoners at said island, who were allowed occasionally to go on board said prison-ship, with whom the deponent is personally acquainted, and in whose representations he has the most perfect confidence, and entreats no doubt of the facts by them stated; and this statement is given at the request of the friends of some of the prisoners at Barbadoes, particularly of the crew of the privateer Bonadventure, of Hartford.

PIERPONT EDWARDS,

District judge of Connecticut district.

I, Pierpont Edwards, judge of the district court of the United States for the Connecticut district, do hereby certify and make known to all whom it may concern, that captain Samuel Chew, the within named deponent, is a gentleman to me well known, having known him for many years; he is the son of captain Samuel Chew, late of the city of New-Haven, of the said island, and who fell by a cannon ball on board an American vessel during the revolutionary war; that the said deponent is a man of strict integrity, and attached to the constitution and government of the United States, and the most perfect confidence is due to his said representations so as aforesaid sworn to.

PIERPONT EDWARDS,

District judge of Connecticut district.

Milville Prison, August 30, 1812.

SIR,—We the subscribers, for ourselves and our countrymen, now confined as prisoners of war in Milville Prison, Halifax, Nova-Scotia, beg leave to represent to the American government,—That most of us have for years past, made enormous exertions to complete our arms and accoutrements, in which, for seven years or more, we have often been warily obliged to the English, of what we had acquired by industry and danger, and while they strip us of our property, they often treated us with the greatest indignity, and even barbarity.

We have seen and known that they have often violated the sacred privilege of individual liberty and the law of nations; we are conscious of the long forbearance of our government, and their repeated calls upon the honor and justice of the British nation which, instead of redress, added other injuries; and when the hope of amicable remuneration had failed, and for retaliation our government was forced to the last resort, an appeal to arms, we felt the justice of our cause and hoped for the blessing of heaven for success. To serve our country and to make up the losses we had sustained, we undertook commissions from the president of the United States, either on board of private armed vessels, and have unfortunately been captured by the British. We would state, that in many instances after we had struck our colors, we were fired upon by cannon and muskets, bombarded by shells, and some of our men killed, and after our capture, had some of our board some of us were warily obliged to the English, of what we had acquired by industry and danger, and while they strip us of our property, they often treated us with the greatest indignity, and even barbarity.

DETENTION OF AMERICAN PRISONERS AS BRITISH SUBJECTS.

Office of Commissary General of Prisoners,
Washington, June 10, 1813.

SIR,—I have the honor to transmit the copy of a letter from captain Stewart, commanding the United States' naval forces at Norfolk, dated the 24th of May, to admiral Warren, and that of a letter from rear-admiral Cockburn, dated 21st May, in reply, relative to a most unjustifiable act of Commodore Berrisford, as to part of the officers and crew of the late United States' brig Vixen at the mouth of the Delaware, leaving the general question of the irregular removal of Commodore Berrisford with these prisoners of war returning on a parole, and the execution made by him in consequence of the irregular power thus assumed, on the ground on which captain Stewart has very properly pleaded it, I will remark, that captain Stewart was certainly misapprehended by admiral Cockburn, in attributing to him the intention of executing a threat, as to the final detention of two of the American prisoners; on the contrary, the expression used by captain Stewart communicates in a very plain manner the decision of this government, then already made, that two of his Britannic majesty's subjects should be immediately selected and held in duress, subject to the same treatment in all respects, &c.

And I have now to inform you, sir, that in virtue of this decision, and by an order from this office, the marshal of Massachusetts has designated and placed in close confinement William Barr carpenter, and Thomas Belding, boatswain, of the late British privateer Swallow; and John Squirell and James Russel, seamen of the Dragon, seventy-one subjects of his Britannic majesty, to be held responsible for the safety of John Stevens, carpenter, and Thomas King, seaman, part of the crew of the United States' brig Vixen.

I flatter myself, sir, that this subject will command your early attention, and that you will cause the officer and seamen of the Vixen to be immediately released and returned to this country, according to their destination when taken from the cartel.

Very respectfully, &c.
(Signed) J. MASON,
Colonel Thomas Barclay, &c. &c.

H. M. S. Poictiers, May 8, 1813.

SIR,—I am sorry I am under the necessity of detaining J. Stevens and T. King, late of the Vixen, in consequence of their being British subjects. I am, sir, &c.

J. P. BERRISFORD.

To lieut. Drayton.

"The original is in the possession of the commissary general of prisoners."
W. JOHNS.

Navy Department, May 17, 1813.

SIR—You are hereby authorized and instructed to address a letter to admiral sir John Boscawen Warren, representing the following facts and determination, viz. That a part of the officers and crew of the late United States' brig Vixen were returning from Jamaica on parole, as prisoners of war, and entering the Delaware, when Commodore Berrisford caused them to be brought on board the Poictiers and detained until a part of the crew of that ship, whom he demanded in exchange, were sent down from Philadelphia; that ultimately he detained John Stephens, carpenter, and Thomas King, seaman, two of the aforesaid crew of the Vixen, on the plea of their being British subjects, as appears by a letter from Commodore Berrisford to lieut. Drayton, late 1st of the said brig Vixen; and that you are commanded explicitly to declare, that in retaliation for the violent and unjust detention of the said John Stephens and Thomas King, the government of the United States will immediately cause five British subjects to be selected and held in duress, subject to the same treatment in all respects that the said John Stevens and Thomas King may receive during their detention.

On the receipt of the admiral's answer, you will communicate the same to me without delay. I am respectfully, &c.

Charles Stewart, esp. commanding naval officer, Norfolk, Va.
(Signed) W. JOHNS.

United States' frigate Constitution,
Off New-York, May 20, 1813.

SIR,—I have the honor to represent to your excellency that a part of the officers and crew of the late United States' brig Vixen, returning from Jamaica on parole as prisoners of war, were, on entering the Delaware, taken out of the flag of truce by Commodore Berrisford, commanding on that station, and detained until a part of the crew of the Poictiers, then prisoners at Philadelphia, were demanded by him and sent down in exchange; that ultimately he detained on board the Poictiers, John Stephens, carpenter, and Thomas King, seaman, late of the United States' brig Vixen, on plea of their being subjects of his Britannic majesty.

This violation of the rights of prisoners on parole, is so contrary to the usage of all civilized nations, that I trust your excellency will give such instructions upon that head as will prevent a similar violation in future.

I have it in command from my government to state to your excellency, that in retaliation for so violent and unjust a procedure on the part of Commodore Berrisford in detaining the above Mr. John Stevens and Thomas King, that four subjects of his Britannic majesty will be immediately selected and held in duress, subject to the aforesaid two persons during their detention. I hope your excellency will give this subject your earliest attention and direct the release of Mr. Stevens and Thomas King who have been so improperly detained on board the Poictiers.

I have the honor to be, &c.
(Signed) CHARLES STEWART,
Commanding officer of the United States' naval force at New-York.

To his excellency the right hon. sir John B. Warren, admiral of the blue, and commander in chief of his Britannic majesty's naval forces on the American station.
His Britannic majesty's ship Marlborough,
In Longharrow Bay, 21st May, 1813.

SIR,—In the absence of sir John B. Warren I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter and the date of the 20th current, complaining of the conduct of Commodore Berrisford towards the American prisoners of war returning to Philadelphia on parole, and of his having detained on board the Poictiers, Mr. John Stevens and Thomas King.

No report of these circumstances has yet reached sir John Warren or myself from Commodore Berrisford, but I have no hesitation in assuring you, sir, that every inquiry would have been made into them, and every satisfaction and explanation thereon, which the case might have required, would have been offered to your government and yourself with the least possible delay, had it not been for the threat with which your representation on this subject is accompanied, the tenor of which being likely to produce an entire change in the aspect of our communications, and particularly in what relates to the individuals which the late act of war has placed within the power of our respective nations; it totally precludes the possibility of my now entering further into the subject than to assure you, your letter shall be transmitted to the right honorable the commander in chief by the earliest opportunity, and when ever his answer arrives it shall be forwarded to you without delay.

I have the honor to be, sir, with high consideration, your most obedient humble servant,
G. COCKBURN, rear-admiral.
Captain Stewart, commanding the naval force of the United States, at Norfolk.

Shark, Port-Royal, (Jamaica) March 29, 1813.

SIR,—Captain Moubray, of his majesty's sloop Moselle, has just sent to me the copy of a letter from you to him, and another to Mr. Cook, of his majesty's late sloop Rhodan, dated the 25th ultimo, respecting six men,* mentioned in the margin, who were sent here from the Bahamas as having been taken in the American privateer Sarah Ann, and supposed to be subjects of his majesty; but as no proof to what country they belong has been adduced, it has never been my intention to bring them to trial, and they are at present on board of the prisoners waiting an exchange of prisoners. I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant,
(Signed) CHARLES STIRLING, vice admiral,
Charles R. Simpson, esp.

Harlem, June 1, 1813.

SIR,—I beg leave to refer you to a communication which took place some time in the autumn or winter preceding, between Mr. Baker, his majesty's late agent for prisoners of war, and Mr. Monroe, secretary of state, respecting six of the crew of the late American privateer Sarah Ann, Richard Moore, master, captured by his majesty's sloop Rhodan, John George Ross, esp. command'r, whose names are inserted in the margin, and who it appears were sent to Jamaica, to which station the Rhodan belonged, on suspicion of their being subjects of his majesty; and I further request your attention to a letter from major-general Pinckney to the secretary at war, dated head-quarters, Charleston, 4th of November, 1792, from which it appears that twelve of his majesty's subjects, then prisoners of war at Charleston, were held in prison to answer in their persons for the fate of the six men, of the Sarah Ann, privateer, sent to Jamaica.

I have the honor to enclose you the copy of a letter from vice-admiral Stirling, commanding his majesty's ships of war on the Jamaica station, to Mr. Simpson, late superintendent for prisoners of war at Charleston, from which you will perceive, that the six men of the Sarah Ann are considered by the admiral as American persons generally, and are now on board a prison-ship, in company with other American prisoners.

Having given you this information with respect to the six men of the Sarah Ann privateer, I have to request you will take the necessary measures to have the continuing responsibility which it was thought proper to attach to the persons of twelve British seamen, now in prison in Charleston, taken off; and that they may be informed thereof.

I understand that John Gault, one of the six men, was paroled and arrived at Georgetown, South-Carolina, in the brig Cyprus, and that he has reported himself to the marshal, who informed Mr. Simpson that he had sent on to the department of state his parole. I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) THOMAS BARCLAY,
General Mason. Office of Commissary General of Prisoners,
Washington, June 9, 1813.

SIR,—I learn with pleasure by the letter you did me the honor to address me on the 1st instant, and the letter from admiral Sir Boscawen you have enclosed, that the six men belonging to the American privateer Sarah Ann, detained in October last and sent to Jamaica to be tried as British subjects, have been restored to the ordinary state of prisoners of war to wait an exchange; and that there is now no intention to bring them to trial.

I very cheerfully comply with your request, since I have this day directed the marshal of South-Carolina to return in the same manner to the ordinary state of prisoners of war, the twelve British seamen confined under the orders of this government by him, and to inform them, that the responsibility attached to their persons for the safety of the men of the Sarah Ann has been taken off.

Very respectfully, &c.

Col. Thomas Barclay.

Sir,—I feel it my duty to lay before you the case of William McDowell Scott, late of D. trait, an unfortunate fellow-citizen, who has been seized and apprehended by the British commanding officer at D. trait and sent to Quebec, where he is now confined under pretence of being a British subject, and one found in arms in behalf of the United States against that government.

William McDowell Scott is a native of Ireland, and emigrated to the United States about eighteen years since. He resided for some years in the state of New-York, and in the summer of 1809, he came to D. trait, established himself as a physician, and has ever since resided there. He has been naturalized agreeably to the laws of the United States, and this fact is well known to the British government; and both in the territory of Indiana, before that territory was divided, and subsequently in the territory of Michigan, he has held and filled, with respect and fidelity, some of the first offices in those two territories.

Such, for example, as a justice of the peace and a judge of the common pleas in the Indiana territory; and subsequently marshal of the territory of Michigan.

In all these offices, and in every other situation in which Dr. Scott's public and private character has been or can be viewed, he has uniformly manifested an unflinching attachment to the principles of our constitution, and the administration of this government.

His support in the present case, during the time that general Hull lay at Saratoga and D. trait, was not ostensible by any person whatever. In fact, it was his unwearied exertions that have provoked and spirited up the British to that line of conduct and persecution they are now pursuing towards him.

Proctor, who sent him from D. trait, and sir George Prevost, who received him at Fort George, a few forward him to Quebec, threaten to treat him with all the severity authorized by the laws of nations, and the usages of war, in cases of an actual bona fide British subject found in arms against that government.

I do not for myself, however, entertain a belief that they will dare to put their threats in execution to their full extent. But, sir, without the interference of the government they will detain him during the war, and they will take his life so wretched and miserable that death would be a welcome messenger.

I hope, sir, the occasion will be a sufficient apology for obscuring this communication upon you. I am among the number of those who have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with you. But general Taylor, who I look to as the bearer of it, is a gentleman to whom I am personally known, and who has likewise a pretty correct knowledge of the character of Dr. Scott.

I have the honor to be, &c. E. BRUSH.

The honorable James Monroe, esq.
Extract of a letter from John Mitchell, esq. agent for American prisoners of war at Halifax, to the secretary of state, dated May 28th, 1813.

"I have just been informed by the agent for prisoners, that Major John Light of the Julian Smith, a privateer commanded by captain Leamy Cooper, will be detained here in consequence of his having, previous to the war, taken the oath of all giances in this province (Nova Scotia) and commanded a vessel out of this place (Halifax). Mr. Light was lieutenant of the privateer when captured by the Nymphe, the 14th May, 1813."

C. W. SCOTT TO THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

Washington, January 30, 1813.

Sir,—I think it my duty to lay before the department, that on the arrival at Quebec of the American prisoners of war surrendered at the capture of the city, they were mustered and examined by British officers (as reported) till within duty, and every native born of the united Kingdom or Great Britain and Ireland questioned and sent on board a ship to war with that honor. The vessel in a few days returned to the harbor with those persons on board.

Persons of the age and twenty persons were thus taken from us, principally natives of England, several of whom were known by their former officers to be naturalized citizens of the United States, and others to have been long residents within the same. One in particular, whose name has escaped me, besides having complied with all the conditions of our naturalization laws, was represented by his officers to have left a wife and five children, all of them born within the state of New-York.

I distinctly understood, as well from the officer who came on board the prison-ship for the above purpose as from others, with whom I conversed on this subject, that it was the determination of the British government, as expressed through sir George Prevost, to punish every man whom it might suit it to its power, found in arms against the British King, contrary to his native allegiance. I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) W. SCOTT, Lieut. Col. U. S. 2d Artillery.

MR. BEASLEY TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

London, March 1, 1813.

Sir,—Accused you a copy of a letter from Henry Kelly, in behalf of himself and twenty-two persons. He states, that they are all citizens of the United States and have wives and families (besides that they were taken in October in Upper Canada, and that they were sent to this country in consequence of their birth within the British dominions. I am very respectfully, &c.

(Signed) H. M. S. Namur, flying at the North, Feb. 6, 1813.

Sir,—This is to inform you that we returned twenty-three American soldiers, belonging to the 13th, 6th and 1st regiments of the United States armies. We were taken on the 15th of October in Upper Canada. The reason of their sending us twenty-three here is, we were born in the British dominions, though we are all citizens of the United States, and have our wives and children there. We are in a very miserable situation for clothing, having drawn no winter clothes before, we were taken. We therefore hope you will send us some to let us shiver us from the inclemency of the weather. Sir, I remain your obedient servant.

(Signed) HENRY KELLY.

Extract of a letter from admiral sir John Borslase Warren to the secretary of state, dated Bermuda, March 8, 1813.

"I must refer you to my letter of the 30th of September, 1812, in which I stated the circumstance of twelve men belonging to the Onondago, taken out of a cartel by commodore Rodgers, and illeg-ally detained, upon the pretext of six others, who were supposed to be British subjects, having been sent to the united Kingdom for examination; since that event, five of the six people named in the enclosed list, have been received at Halifax with orders for their discharge. I therefore request you will communicate these particulars to the president, in order that further objections may be given respecting the Guerriere's men, so long confined at Boston, and to obviate the other inconveniences which must inevitably arise from such practices."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE TO ADMIRAL WARREN.

London, dated April 16, 1813.

"It appears by your letter (of the 8th of March, from Bermuda) that five only of the seamen that were taken on board the Nautilus and sent to England, in confinement, have been permitted. None of the six given of the sixth. Orders have been issued for the release of ten of the twelve men, who, on a principle of retaliation, were confined by commodore Rodgers at Boston. You will be sensible that it will be impossible, on that principle, to discharge the other two men until the sixth American seaman is returned, or such an explanation given of the cause of his detention, as, according to the circumstances of the case, regarding the conduct of the British government towards American seamen under similar circumstances, ought to be satisfactory."

Extract of a letter from lieutenant F. H. Babbitt to master commandant W. M. Crane, of the U. S. S. Onondago, dated Boston, (Mass.) 13th Sept. 1812.

Employed I send you a description of the proportion of our little crew, who have been so abused and traitorous as to enter the service of our enemy. Also a list of those gallant fellows, whose glory it would have been to have lost their lives in the service of their country, and whose injustice it has been to cross the Atlantic on suspicion of their being British subjects; four of them native born Americans, and two naturalized citizens. On their parting with me, and removal from the Africa, of 64 guns to the Thetis frigate (the latter with a convoy from England, then in 43, 30, N. and 46, 50, W.) their last request and desire was, that I would particularly acquaint you with their situation, with their determination never to prove traitors to that country whose flag they were proud to serve under, and whose welfare and prosperity they equally hoped and anticipated to realize.

(Signed) F. H. BABBITT.

A list of men said to have entered on board his B. M. frigate Shannon, commodore Brooke. Their description as far as known. Jesse Bats, seaman, about 5 feet 9 inches high, dark hair and complexion, dark snapping eyes, has an impudent in his speech, and at times affects lunacy; has a wife and family in Boston, Mass.

Samuel Lane, marine, born in Kentucky, 5 feet 8 inches high, or theabouts, and is supposed to be enlisted with captain Hall of the U. S. S. Onondago, N. Y. York.

John Young, marine, 5 feet 5 inches high, large mouth, enlisted with captain Hall, navy-yard, New-York; when addressed or is addressing an officer, casts down his eyes. For his particular description as well as that of John Rose, naming, about 5 feet 3 inches high, brown hair, full face, thick set, and a scowl on his countenance, refer to captain John Hall.

John O'Neal, seaman, about 24 years of age, 5 feet 5 inches high, dark hair, sharp face, dark eyes, thick set, and was shipped at Norfolk, Va. previous to your taking the command of the Nautilus.

William Jones, old seaman, about 5 feet 8 inches high, light hair, 24 years of age, full face, thick set, down cast look, and is a very able man; captured at New-York April last.

SIR JOHN BORSLASE WARREN TO MR. MONROE.

Halifax, 30th September, 1812.

Sir,—Having received information that a most unauthorised act has been committed by commodore Rodgers, in illegally seizing twelve British American prisoners of war, late belonging to the Guerriere, and taken out of the English cart-lair Endicott, on her passage down the harbor of Boston, after they had been regularly embarked on board of her for an exchange, agreeably to the arrangements settled between the two countries, and that the said British seamen, so seized, are now detained on board the United States frigate President, as hostages; I feel myself called upon to request, sir, your most serious attention to a measure so fraught with mischief and inconvenience, destructive of the good faith of a flag of truce and the sacred protection of a cartel. I should be extremely sorry that the impudent act of an officer should involve consequences so particularly severe as the present instance must naturally produce; repeated; and although it is very much my wish, during the continuance of the differences existing between the two countries, to adopt every measure that might render the effect of war less rigorous, yet, in another point of view, the conviction of the duty I owe my country would, in the event of such grievances as I have already stated being continued, not admit of any hesitation in retaliatory decisions; but as I am persuaded of the high liberality of your sentiments, and that the act complained of has originated entirely with the officer who committed it, and that it will be as censurable in your consideration as it deserves, I rely upon your taking such steps as will prevent a recurrence of conduct so extremely reprehensible in every shape.

I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed)

JOHN BORLASE WARREN,
Admiral of the Blue, and
Commander in Chief, &c.

His Excellency James Munroe, Esq.,
Secretary of State.

MR. MUNROE TO SIR JOHN BORLASE WARREN.

Department of State, October 23, 1812.

SIR—I have had the honor to receive your communication of the 20th September, complaining that Commodore Rodge is in command of a squadron of the United States' navy at the port of Boston, had taken two British seamen, lately belonging to His Britannic Majesty's ship the Guerriere, from a vessel in the harbor of Boston, and that he detained them on board the President, a frigate of the United States, as hostages.

I am instructed to inform you that enquiry shall be made into the circumstances attending and the cause which produced the act of which you complain, and that such measures will be taken, on a knowledge of them, as may comport with the rights of both nations, and may be proper in the case to which they relate.

I beg you, sir, to be assured that it is the sincere desire of the president to see (and to promote so far as depends upon the United States) that the war which exists between our countries be conducted with the utmost regard to humanity.

I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed)

JAMES MONROE.

Sir John Boscawen Warren, Admiral of the Blue,
Commander in Chief, &c.

Washington, December 17, 1812.

SIR—I have the honor to annex a list of twelve of the crew of the late United States' sloop of war Wasp, obtained by Captain John Boscawen, of the British ship Porpoise, under the pretence of their being British subjects. I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE S. WISE, purser.

The hon. Paul Hamilton, Secretary of the Navy.

List referred to in the preceding note.

John McCloud, boatswain, has been in the service since 1804. Married in Norfolk in 1804 or 5, and has a wife and 5 or 6 children there.

John Stephens, boatswain's mate, has been in the service 5 or 6 years.

George M. Read, quarter-master, has a protection, and has sailed out of New-York and Philadelphia, for several years.

William Mitchell, seaman, James S. Goffard, do, John Wright, do.

Thomas Phillips, do, Peter Barron, do, John Connor, ord. seaman.

John Ross, do, George Brooks, do, Dennis Dougherty, ord. seaman, the greater number, if not all, had professed to be of the same name, rank and being taken. Two others were detained—John Wade and James Huthcuis; but were given up, the former on captain Jones' asserting captain Boscawen had sworn him to be a native citizen; the latter on a like assurance from Dr. R. Rogers.

William Mitchell was in the service during 1805 and 6, in the Mediterranean.

GEORGE S. WISE, purser.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Fill high the cup;

"And fit the kettle to the trumpet speak;

"The trumpet to the cannoner without,

"The cannoner to the heavens—the heaven to earth,"

American wine-drinks to Perry!

In consequence of the most signal victory on lake Erie, a full account of which is inserted in the succeeding columns, the Baltimore regiment of artillery turned out, and at high twelve let the wide mouth'd cannon to "the heavens speak" the glorious tidings. A grand federal salute was also fired from the fort; and the "First Marine artillery of the Union," after a superb display of their corps, nearly 200 strong, escorting their 18lb. field pieces, reiterated "Free trade and Sailors rights" from the hill near the Observatory, about sun-set, making the welkin ring.—In the evening, the bells rang a merry peal, and without concert or previous arrangement, the city was suddenly, but splendidly illuminated. All was granditude to the Supreme Disposer of events for a victory that humanity may rejoice at, as relieving a wide and much exposed frontier from the scalping knife, and leading directly to peace, at least in that quarter.

We can hardly attribute too great importance to this victory. By an unaccountable predilection, the common attention had been drawn almost exclusively to Ontario, where, indeed, a mighty interest is at stake. Yet, perhaps, all things considered (and we have often made the remark) the mastery of Erie is hardly of secondary importance to the sway of the lower lake. But we have not room for the observations that strike us at present, nor is time allowed for the collection of the facts to elucidate them—we may pursue the matter next week.

Harrison's whole force was in motion two days after the battle on the lake. We trust that Proctor will not escape him.

Lieut. Burrows and admiral Nelson—The following contrast is presented by the editor of the Democratic Press. "Lord Nelson, in a struggle between the delight of victory and the dread of dying, is writhing about on his bed below, and in anguish calling to his captain, "Kiss me Hardy." The imitable Burrows is lying on deck, calm and excomplay in the agonies of dissolution, uttering not a groan nor a sound except to refuse to be carried from his station, and when the vanquished sword was brought to him, after forty minutes of inconceivable fortitude and heroism, he exercises the last remaining powers of speech only to say that he is satisfied, and dies contented."

The Baltimore Volunteers—Some of the officers and privates of this late elegant and efficient corps have returned to their homes, from the lines, and the rest are on the road. They have served out their time to the entire approbation of their country, and received a most honorable discharge from Gen. Boyd, commanding at Fort George—each individual has also a testimony which, "as a rich legacy," he may bequeath to his children. The "General Order," &c. shall be inserted hereafter.

A letter to the editor of the Register, from a private gentleman residing in the neighborhood of the places where the "Baltimore Blues" have been upon duty, speaking of their discharge, has the following elegant remarks—"No company on this frontier has done more laborious and active duty than they; and none have discharged that duty with more advantage to their country and honor to themselves. They have been a practical comment on this eternal truth, that the citizen and the soldier are compatible characters."

"Our friends in America."—This phrase has been frequently used in parliament. The British ministers calculate as fully upon them as on subsidized Sweden. A Montreal paper of the 23th ult. wishes that the ministers may be impeached for their neglect of Canada, and says—"The apology that we have friends in America will not answer." This valuable appendage of the British crown is neglected; and a renegade crown prince of Sweden is subsidized with a million, and afterwards with a pension of 60,000*£* sterling! Good God! what are we come to?"

One of "his majesty's" deserters at Hampton has returned to his father's house, near Saratoga, New York, after an absence of more than seven years, and long since given up as dead, all opportunity of making known his calamitous situation being denied. The European Algerines had made a slave of him.

John Gwininger, Esq., the only representative in congress from Pennsylvania, that voted against the tax bills, or failed to give energy to the war, has resigned; being appointed an associate judge of Lebanon county. It is confidently said that his place will be filled by a gentleman who will give to that great state an unanims vote on all questions for the defence of our rights against the aggressions of the barbarian enemy.

The following, says the Boston Chronicle, is from an authentic source, communicated in a letter from Melville, dated the 4th inst.

"For some time past the horizon has been thickening here, until the storm has at length burst—59 out of 500 troops that have been sent here from Quebec, have been selected and sent to England, reported as having given themselves up as British subjects, though not one of them has done so.

"One hundred of our seamen have been selected from Melville Island, embarked, and sail to day for England.

"Sixteen men, ten of the Chesapeake's crew, in which is the carpenter and gunner, and six officers of different privateers, are sent to the common goal here, and confined in three cells; six in one, and five in each of the others, and not allowed to see any one. From their conduct I think it fair to presume all exchange is at an end. The officers confined are, John Light, lieutenant of the Juban-Smith; capt. J. R. Morgan, of the Eaterprize; Wm. Lane, capt. David Perry and Thomas Swaine, lieutenants of the Wiley Reynard; Jas. Trask, sailing-master of the Revenge. I have written fully to Mr. Miller; the fact is, he has no power.

"Except your smugglers, no Americans are permitted to reside in Halifax, nor I believe visit it"

A report prevailed at Milledgeville, Geo. on the 26th ult. that the Spaniards had demanded the re-possession of Mobile, and the territory west of the Perdida. And certain accounts had been received that the Creeks had obtained arms and ammunition from Pensacola. It was understood they were fortifying themselves on the Alabama.

A London paper of June 26, says—"A great sensation continues to prevail in the commercial world, in consequence of the repeated advices of the audacity of the American privateers on the Irish coast."

MILITARY.

We are on tip-toe for news from all the armies. We look for a flood of glad tidings. Every thing seems well.

We notice the arrival of several bodies of troops at Burlington since our last.

Col. Barstler's regiment, taken at the Beaver dams, have arrived at Halifax.

It is stated that martial-law is established at Sackett's Harbor, and that every person who visits that place, is compelled to submit to the obligation of a solemn oath not to divulge any thing that may come under his observation relative to military affairs.

THE CREEK INDIANS.

Extract of a letter, dated Creek Agency, 27th July, 1813.—"The civil war among the Creeks has raged with great fury. The fanatics have destroyed Tricksabechee, the chiefs and the inhabitants having previously left it, under an escort of warriors from Cusseta and Cowetaw, and moved down to Cowetaw. Since then they have destroyed Kialijee and several of its inhabitants, and more than thirty have been killed on both sides. Antecoochee behaved with consummate bravery. A party under a prophet killed four of their chiefs—the warriors killed him and his party, and hearing that Oackfuskaachee sided with the prophets, they turned on them and cut the whole off.

"It is now reduced to a certainty from the concurrent testimony of a number of respectable Indians, that this civil war originated with the British in Canada, and as soon as the chiefs friendly to the plan of civilization and their adherents are murdered or put to flight, the fanatics will attack our frontier settlements without delay. The friendly Indians of the Upper towns are flying to Chattahoochee, where they will meet the aid of a military force. Some regular troops have arrived at Fort Hawkins, and the requisite military supplies are coming on.

"The governor of Georgia having received 'authentic information of a meditated attack,' has authority to call the state's quota of the detachment of militia in the service of the United States, and has the requisite power to co-operate with the friendly chiefs without delay and with effect.

"The citizens in the forks of Alabama, and their neighbors the half breeds, must put themselves into the best situation they can to resist an attack from Alabama."

NAVAL.

CAPT. LAWRENCE.—The Bristol (England) Mirror says—"We understand from very good authority, that the late captain LAWRENCE, of the American frigate Chesapeake, was a native of Bristol, and educated at Colston charity school in this city. He had a younger brother, and both were for some time in the navy; but being disappointed in their hopes of promotion, they went to America, where they shortly after obtained the command of gun-boats, from which captain LAWRENCE was transferred to the Hornet, and afterwards to the Chesapeake."

Com. Rodgers, the Englishmen have it, is the son of an Scotch baker!—Poor stupid John Bull.

A late Halifax paper says—"An American brig from Antigua, with 147 puncheons molasses, has arrived at Yamouth, prize to the privateer Fly."—What business had an American brig at Antigua—how did she enter and clear at that port?

The London papers continue to state that com. Rodgers has been on the coast of Norway.

"Yankee trick."—A schr. belonging to Penobscot river, from Salem, lately captured by the English privateer schr. Dart, off Mount Desert, and who had all her hands taken out, except one young man 18 years of age, after having two others from the privateer put on board, was ordered for Halifax.—The young man had the piloting of the vessel, and put into Machias harbor in a fog, where she was taken possession of by the revenue boat.

It is stated that an American privateer was fitting out at Naples, about the middle of April.

It is the "Young True Blooded Yankee" that was taken by the British—The Old True Blooded Yankee is going on in the old way.

An American privateer ship, of 22 guns, was fitting out at Mersilles in July.

Capt. Graham late of the Lauristinus has been appointed to the command of the Chesapeake.

THE ESSEX FRIGATE.—London, July 14.—The following is an extract of a letter from Buenos Ayres, dated April 8:—

"The American frigate Essex is in Valpariso, where she arrived the 18th of March last, after a passage of 35 days from the island of Sebastians, near Tio Janeiro. She is armed with 45 guns, and 420 picked men, and in other respects she is exceedingly well found. It is certain that POYNSERT, the American consul there, wrote to his government for a vessel of this description. There were illuminations and balls on account of her arrival."

The bodies of Lawrence and Ludlow were interreships were captured at New York on the 15th inst. and sent to the United States; and the number of the captured vessels was 20,000. Bishop Hobson, of New York, has written a due account of the capture of the Shannon.

It is not surprising that the officers of those sailors who were taken on board by land, the "magnanimous" and "generous" caused a passage for them to be made. You are assured, from a source entitled to credit, that the whole essence of the capture of the Shannon, on which we have been told so much, is the result of the enemy, was directed by the captain, Mr. Mitchell, and charged to the officers of the United States.

From the 15th inst. of Sept. several naval officers and about 200 men arrived at Burlington.

The prize schooner General Horseford, has been purchased at Savannah, by the United States, for 6,950*l.* She is a excellent vessel.

CAPT. BROKE'S CHALLENGE.—The following is from the ESSEX REGISTER. We believe it may be depended upon as minutely correct:

"The letter from capt. Broke [see WEEKLY REGISTER, page 29] to capt. LAWRENCE, inviting him to meet the Shannon, is given below. Notwithstanding the apparently liberal terms on which capt. B. proposed in this letter to meet the Chesapeake, and the praise which have consequently been bestowed on him, we consider it nothing more than a gross deception. Capt. Stoen, of this town, who was the bearer of this challenge from the Shannon on the day of the action, (having been a prisoner on board her) states, that capt. Broke himself told him, at 9 o'clock on the morning of that day, that the Chesapeake had fired a gun and loosed her sails, and was coming out. At 12 o'clock, capt. Broke told capt. Stoen, that he might go on shore, and requested him to take a letter to the commander of the Chesapeake. It was nearly 1 o'clock when he left the ship, and the Chesapeake was in sight under full sail standing out to meet the Shannon! Instead of sending capt. Stoen as a flag of truce as he might have done directly to capt. LAWRENCE, he directed the boat to put him ashore at Warblehead, from which place Broke knew that the challenge could not get to Boston in time to be seen by capt. LAWRENCE.

THE CHESAPEAKE AND SHANNON.—The capture of the Chesapeake has excited the most extravagant joy in Great Britain. Some of the cities have been illuminated—the tower guns fired—the freedom of the city of London, with a sword of the value of 100 guineas, was voted to captain Broke—many large speeches were made in parliament about it, and the splendor of this deed, (the capture of an American frigate by a British vessel of the same force, and under very peculiar advantages!) seems to have obliterated the glory of the battles of the Nile or Trafalgar. As usual, John Bull is gulled by the most outrageous falsehoods—but the late Boxing match with the Enterprise will give him a little insight into the real merits of the matter.

Mr. Croker, principal secretary to the lords of the admiralty, in his place in the house of commons, among other remarks, said—"The action with the Chesapeake, was, in every respect, unexampled.—It was not,—and he knew it was a bold assertion which he made,—to be equalled by any engagement which graced the naval annals of G. Britain. The enemy's ship was superior in size, superior in weight of metal, superior in numbers. She entered into the contest with a confidence of victory resulting from that conviction. He was warranted in saying that the victory was accomplished in less than 15 minutes, of which only three minutes were occupied in boarding, when 310 British seamen had to contend with 440 of the enemy."

This is somewhat different for the talk of that gentleman and his friends some little time ago, about our "fir-built frigates, manned by bastards and outlaws."

The British official account of the action inserted in page 30, was a translation from a French paper—the following is from the London Gazette. What a pity is it, that with so much vaporing and swaggering, and a disregard to truth, in some essential particulars, capt. Broke has sullied his claims to glory for having captured the first, and yet only American frigate. He has neither told the truth, nor the whole truth, though he has said much that is not the truth:

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, July 10.

Copy of a letter from the hon. captain Capel, of H. M. ship Ja Hogue, to John Wilson Croker, Esq. dated Halifax, June 11, 1813.

SIR—It is with the greatest pleasure I transmit you a letter I have just received from capt. Broke, of his majesty's ship Shannon, detailing a most brilliant achievement in the capture of the U. States' frigate Chesapeake, in 15 minutes. Captain Broke relates so fully the particulars of this gallant affair, that I feel it unnecessary to add much to his narrative; but I cannot forbear expressing the pleasure I feel in bearing testimony to the indefatigable exertions and persevering zeal of capt. Broke during the time he has been under my orders; placing a firm reliance on the valor of his officers and crew, and a just confidence in his system of discipline, he sought every opportunity of meeting the enemy on fair terms; and I have to rejoice with his country and his friends, at the glorious result of this contest: he gallantly led his boarders in the assault, and carried all before him. His wounds are severe, but I trust his country will not long be deprived of his services. I have the honor to be, &c.

THOMAS BLADEN CAPEL,

Capt. and senior officer at Halifax.

SHANNON, HALIFAX, June 6, 1813.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you, that being close in with Boston light house in his majesty's ship under my command, on the 1st inst. I had the pleasure of seeing that the United States frigate Chesapeake (whom we had been long watching) was coming out of the harbor to engage the Shannon; I took a position between Cape Ann and Cape Cod, and then hove to for him to join us; the enemy came down in a very handsome manner, having three American ensigns flying; when closing with us he sent down his royal yards, I kept the Shannon's up, expecting the breeze would die away. At half past 5 P. M. the enemy hauled up within hail of us on the starboard side, and the battle began, both ships steering under the topsails; after exchanging between two and three broadsides, the enemy's ship fell on board of us, her mizen channels locking in with our fore rigging. I went forward to ascertain her position, and observing that the enemy were flinching from their guns, I gave orders to prepare for boarding. Our gallant band, appointed to that service, immediately rushed in, under their respective officers, upon the enemy's decks, driving every thing before them with irresistible fury. The enemy made a desperate but disorderly resistance. The firing continued at all the gang ways and between the tops, but in two minutes time the enemy were driven sword in hand from every post. The American flag was hauled down, and the proud old British union floated triumphant over it. In another minute they ceased firing from below, and called for quarter. The whole of this service was achieved in fifteen minutes from the commencement of the action.

I have to lament the loss of many of my gallant shipmates, but they fell exulting in their conquest.

My brave first lieutenant, Mr. Watt, was slain in the moment of victory, in the act of hoisting the British colors; his death is a severe loss to the service. Mr. Aldham, the purser, who had spiritedly volunteered the charge of a party of small arm men, was killed at his post on the gangway. My faithful old clerk, Mr. Dunn, was shot by his side. Mr. Aldham has left a widow to lament his loss. I request the commander in chief will recommend her to the protection of my lords commissioners of the admiralty. My veteran boatswain, Mr. Stephens, has lost an arm. He fought under lord Rodney on the 12th of April. I trust his age and services will be duly rewarded.

I am happy to say that Mr. Samwell, a midshipman of much merit, is the only other officer wounded besides myself and he not dangerously. Of my gallant seamen and marines we had twenty-three slain and fifty-six wounded. I subjoin the names of the former. No expressions I can make use of can do justice to the merits of my officers and crew; the calm courage they displayed during the cannonade, and the tremendous precision of their fire, was only equalled by the ardor with which they rushed to the assault. I recommend them all warily to the commander in chief. Having received a sabre wound at the first onset, whilst charging a part of the enemy who had rallied upon their fore-castle, I was only capable of giving command till assured our victory was complete. I then directed my second lieutenant, Mr. Wallis to take command of the Shannon and secure the prisoners. I left the third lieutenant, Mr. Fulkner (who had headed the main deck boarders) in charge of the prize. I beg to recommend these officers most strongly to the commander in chief's patronage, for the gallantry they displayed during the action, and the skill and judgment they evinced in the anxious duties which afterwards devolved upon them.

To Mr. Etouch the acting master, I am much indebted, for the steadiness in which he could throw the ship into action. The lieutenants Johns and Law, of the marines bravely boarded at the head of their respective divisions. It is impossible to particularize every brilliant deed performed by my officers and men; but I must mention, when the ships' yards were locked together, that Mr. Gosnham, who commanded in our main top, finding himself screened from the enemy by the foot of their topsail, laid out at the main yard arm to fire upon them, and shot three men in that situation. Mr. Smith, who commanded in our fore top, stormed the enemy's fore top from the fore yard arm, and destroyed all the Americans remaining in it. I particularly beg leave to recommend Mr. Etouch, the acting master, and Messrs. Smith, Leake, Clowering, Raymond and Littlejohn, midshipmen. The latter officer is the son of capt. Littlejohn, who was slain in the Berwick.—The loss of the enemy was about 70 killed, and 100 wounded. Among the former were the four lieutenants, a lieutenant of marines, the master, and many other officers. Captain Lawrence is since dead of his wounds.

The enemy came into action with a complement of four hundred and forty men; the Shannon having picked up some recaptured seamen, had three hundred and thirty. The Chesapeake is a fine frigate, and mounts forty-nine guns, eighteens on her main deck, two and thirties on her quarter deck and fore-castle. Both ships come out of action in the most beautiful order, their rigging appearing as perfect as if they had only been exchanging a salute.

I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed)

P. B. V. BROKE.

To captain the hon. T. Bladen Capel, &c. Halifax.

List of killed on board of his majesty's ship Shannon
G. T. L. Watt, first lieutenant, G. Aldham, purser; John Dunn, captain's clerk.

Seamen.—G. Gilbert, William Berilles, Noil Gilchrist, Thomas Seiby, James Long, John Young, James Wallace, Joseph Brown, Thomas Barr, Michael Murphy, Thomas Jones, John O'Connell and Thomas Barry, (first class) boy.

Marines.—Samuel Millard, corporal; Jas. Jays, Dominique Sader and William Young, privates.

Supernumeraries.—William Morrisay, John Moriarty and Thomas Gerrian.

THE ENTERPRIZE AND BOXER.—A public dinner has been given by the people of Portland, to lieutenant McCall and the officers of the Enterprize, for their gallant conduct in beating the Boxer. A Boston paper says, that capt. Gordon, of the Rattler, had sent a flag of truce into Portland requesting an exchange of the officers and crew of the Boxer; and if that were refused to obtain an official account of the action. The first request could not be complied with; but capt. G. might be indulged with the last.

A CARD.—Capt. HULL, with the officers and crew of the U. S. brig Enterprize, are deeply impressed with the readiness and alacrity with which the inhabitants of Portland, in their civil and military departments, assembled to do honor to the memory of the brave lieutenant WILLIAM BREROWS, late commander of the Enterprize, who fell in the gallant action with H. B. M. brig Boxer, which she captured and brought into this port; and beg they will receive their grateful acknowledgments for their very handsome tribute of respect exhibited in their attendance on the funeral of that brave officer, as well as that of his gallant competitor, captain SAMUEL BLYNN, late commander of the Boxer, who fell in the same action, and to whom equal honors were paid in every respect, in their funeral obsequies, exhibiting to the world an evidence of that character which the Americans are proud to possess, of shewing every tribute of respect to a brave enemy who has fallen in combat, and of extending to those in their power every mark of liberality and comfort consistent with their situation as prisoners.

Capt. HULL, with the officers and crew of the Enterprize, embrace the present occasion to express the sense which they entertain of the prompt attention and of the active and humane exertions of Sam'l Storer, Esq. the U. S. navy agent at Portland, in having every accommodation provided for the wounded on board the U. S. brig Enterprize, as well as those on board the Boxer, between whom no distinction was made. And they likewise beg the Physicians of Portland who have been so kind as to afford the most prompt and ample exercise of their professions towards the wounded of both vessels, to accept their best thanks.

Extract of a letter from com. Hull to com. Bainbridge, dated the 10th inst.

"I yesterday visited the two brigs and was astonished to see the difference of injury sustained in the action. The Enterprize has but one 18 pound shot in her hull, one in her mainmast, and one in her foremast; her sails are much cut with grape shot and there are a great number of grape lodged in her sides, but no injury done by them. The Boxer has eighteen or twenty 18 pound shot in her hull, most of them at the water's edge—several stands of 18 pound grape stick in her side, and such a quantity of small grape that I did not undertake to count them. Her masts, sails and spars are literally cut to pieces, several of her guns dismounted and unfit for service; her top gallant fore-castle nearly taken off by the shot, her boats cut to pieces, and her quarters injured in proportion. To give you an idea of the quantity of shot about her, I inform you that I counted in her mainmast alone three 18 pound shot holes, 13 large grape shot holes, 16 musket ball holes, and a large number of smaller shot holes, without counting above the cat hoppers.

"We find it impossible to get at the number killed; no papers are found by which we can ascertain it—I, however, counted upwards of 90 hammocks which were in her netting with beds in them, besides several beds without hammocks; and she has excellent accommodations for all her officers below in staterooms, so that I have no doubt that she had one hundred men on board. We know that she has several of the Rattler's men on board, and a quantity of wads was taken out of the Rattler, loaded with four large grape shot with a small hole in the centre to put in a cartridge that the inside of the wad may take fire when it leaves the gun. In short, she is in every respect completely fitted and her accommodations exceed any thing I have seen in a vessel of her class."

Remarks.—There have been various opinions respecting the relative force of the vessels, and some ungenerous attempts have been made to diminish the splendor of the victory. The foregoing extracts, we conceive irrefragably settle the question of force and of skill. It appears that in number of men the enemy were equal; in number of guns it was well known the enemy were superior; and the vast difference of execution confirms (if confirmation were wanted) the fact of the high degree of superiority of our seamen in the art of gunnery. And, above all other considerations, it proves that American tars are determined to support their government, in a just war waged in defence of

"FREE TRADE AND SAILORS' RIGHTS."

From what has been said in the "well inclined" papers at Boston, the following may appear—"There was only half a man killed on board his majesty's brig Boxer, and three-quarters of two men wounded. Her whole crew consisted of seven men; two had been sent off in three prizes and two were on shore, so that the whole number in the action was four persons. The tonnage of the Boxer is 5 tons and one quarter. All this is from a gentleman of great respectability, and will be confirmed by the [British] official account."

Capt. Gordon of the Rattler, was exceedingly anxious to get back the men that he had sent for the boxing match; but Burravos had impressed them.—They will however be "given up" speedily.

FROM THE PORTLAND ARGUS, OF SEPTEMBER 16.

On Monday last, the British sloop of war Rattler, with two other armed vessels, of smaller size, appeared off our port, and the Rattler stood in near to the land, with a white flag at her fore-top gallant-mast head. Soon after, a boat from her, bearing a white flag, with a lieutenant proceeded to Fort Scammel, and presented the following note from captain Gordon to col. Learned. This, with the colonel's reply and the letter of the marshal, we have solicited for publication, that the public may judge of the motive.

H. B. M. ship Rattler, off Portland,

13th September, 1813.

SIR—Having during the time that I have been on this station, released and sent into Portland, many American subjects, made prisoners by his majesty's ship under my command; and I having released on parole the captain, officers and crew of the armed ship Alexander, taken on your coast in May last, I have been induced to send in a flag of truce, in the hope that the surviving officers and crew of his majesty's late gun brig Boxer, may be sent out to me, either in exchange for the captain and crew of the Alexander, whose parole I have sent in by the officer in charge of this letter, or in exchange for the same number of officers and men of the late U. S. frigate Chesapeake, which shall be regularly ratified by the proper authorities, on the admiral at Halifax receiving the intelligence. Should this request not be complied with, motives of humanity to the friends of the survivors, will, I trust, induce you to suffer the bearer to have communication with the late officers of the Boxer, in order to ascertain the names of those who have fallen in this unequal conflict.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient humble servant,
ALEXANDER GORDON, Capt.
The commandant of the garrison at Portland.

Fort Scammel, 13th Sept. 1812.

SIR—I have received your communication by the officer bearing your flag. In answer, I can only observe, that I have no authority vested in me to treat upon an exchange of prisoners, the sole power of which is vested in the commissary general of prisoners of war at Washington. The men taken in his majesty's brig Boxer, have been sent to Boston, except the wounded, who are attended by their own physician, under the direction of their own officers, and you may rest assured that every thing will be furnished them that can contribute to their comfort. The politeness and humanity with which capt. Gordon has treated those, whom the fortune of war has thrown into his power, I trust will be remembered

* It is impossible that the British, at once, should get down from the pinnacle of pride they had erected for themselves, by their deeds on the ocean. Their high renown has been obtained by combating Frenchmen and Spaniards; who, whatever may be their worth on the land, want a certain indescribable something, with a great deal of experience in the management of ships, to qualify them to contend with the Leviathan of the sea, on the element he claims as his own. In every contact with any thing like an equality of force, whether in public or private armed vessels, we have beat the Englishmen, the "affair of the Chesapeake" only excepted, which we attribute to a chain of untoward events, that valor could not foresee or guard against!—Perry's glorious victory, (God bless him and all that were with him!) vastly strengthens the idea here entertained. We regret that captain Gordon, of the Rattler, has as mean views as the "well inclined" printers at Boston, to underrate this splendid achievement; for he appears, in many respects, to be a worthy man. It is distinctly stated by a gentleman who was on board the Nymph frigate, that he understood from captain Epsworth, of that ship, that the Boxer was fitted out at Hatfield, for the express purpose of meeting the Enterprise, to settle the affair "as to superiority." This was sometime before the battle. The pitiful conduct of the lieutenant of the Java, has been recorded in its proper colours, for attempting to reduce the quantity of the force of that ship, (see Weekly Register, vol. IV, page 273.)—and in the present case, the British would have us believe they had only sixty-six men, though sixty-four have been brought in as prisoners, and six thrown overboard, dead, by our own people, after they had possession of the prize. See captain Hull's letter, inserted above. The vessels speak for themselves—the timber and guns will not lie; and the statement made in our List is amply confirmed. ED. REG.

with respect for his character, even by those whom war has made his enemies; and I regret that my duty will totally forbid a compliance with his request for an interview with the officers of the Boxer.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant.
J. D. LEARNED, Col. Com'dt.

Alexander Gordon, Esq.
Capt. H. B. M. ship Rattler.

Fort Scammel, Sept. 13, 1813.

SIR—Col Learned having communicated your letter of this day to me, I have the honor to state to you that no power is vested in me to exchange prisoners of war, or to parole them without the country.—The officers of the Boxer who survived the action, are paroled, and treated as gentlemen and brave men, who contended with courage in a very equal contest for victory and glory.—The wounded are in the same hospital with the wounded of the Enterprize, and as well treated. Captain Blyth's body was buried with the same honors as the body of captain Burrows, and the remains of the two brave men lay near each other. Your prisoners are treated with humanity, and my personal attention to them will be given to make them comfortable. I witnessed the handsome treatment of captain Gordon to the officers of the Alexander. I am proud to say his reputation stands high as a humane officer, and regret that those officers whom the fate of war has made prisoners, cannot be permitted to communicate with the flag this evening.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant.
T. G. THORNTON, Marshal of Maine.

U. S. Navy Yard, Portsmouth,
14th September, 1813.

SIR—I have the honor to forward you, by the mail, the flags of the late British brig Boxer, which were nailed to her mast-heads at the time she engaged, and was captured by the United States brig Enterprize.

Great as the pleasure is that I derive from performing this part of my duty, I need not tell you how different my feelings would have been, could the gallant Burrows have had this honor!

He went into action most gallantly, and the difference of injury done the two vessels proves how nobly he fought.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,
ISAAC HULL.

United States' Sloop President, near Plattsburg, Sept. 9, 1813.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you that I arrived here yesterday from near the lines, having sailed from Burlington on the 6th inst. with an intention to fall in with the enemy, who were then near this place; having proceeded to within a short distance of the lines, I received information that they were at anchor there: soon after, they weighed and stood to the northward out of the lake—thus, if not acknowledging our ascendancy on the lake, evincing an unwillingness (although they had the advantage of situation, owing to the narrowness of the channel in which their galleys could work, when we should want room) to determine it.

I have the honor to be, &c.
THOMAS MACDONOUGH.

Hon. W. Jones, Sec'y of the Navy.

Extract of a letter from lieut. Deacon, late commander of the schv. Growler.

“On the night of the 10th of August, both fleets were in sight of each other; the order of battle was formed and my station was ahead of the General Pike to windward.

“At 10 o'clock the British fleet bore down, and a general action was expected. At 11 o'clock our schooners commenced a fire with their long guns.—At this time the enemy's fleet had a fresh breeze, which enabled them to come down very rapidly; they being to windward, it appeared to be sir James Yoe's intention to run down to engage our commodore, but on our fleet keeping away he hauled his wind and cut us off. In this situation I had the whole of the enemy's fleet to contend with, and only the assistance of the Julia, a schooner of about the size of the Growler. We held out for some time, doing all we could to make our escape, but our fleet still keeping away, and no assistance at hand, we being then close under the guns of two of the enemy's largest ships, we were under the unpleasant necessity of surrendering to so superior a force.—My loss was one man killed, the Growler was much cut in her rigging and spars—Should any thing be said in public, prejudicial to my character or conduct as an officer, you may contradict it without fear, as it will soon be in my power to clear up that point, to the satisfaction of every body.

“The moment I am exchanged, which will perhaps be soon, I will send you a detailed account of all our proceedings, since I have been on the lakes. My health is tolerably good, except the fatigue occasioned by a long journey, being now on my way from York to Quebec (a distance of 600 miles) where all American prisoners are sent.

“As this letter will come open, you will not find it very interesting. You will not forget to recollect, when you write to me, that all letters are opened before I can receive them.”

FROM LAKE ERIE

We have most glorious news. Thanks be to God for this splendid victory that has relieved a very exposed and extensive frontier from the allied bayonet and scalping-knife, and of those who, in the language of the London paper, [see page 16] swelled “the British shout of victory with the yell of the Indian war whoop.” It is a victory of its own kind, unrivalled—unimagined, and leading to consequences of the highest importance. But Commodore PERRY holds an able pen!—Who will not feel for the brave spirits of the Lawrence? But the departed hero had said, “Don't give up the ship!” and the LAWRENCE was held beyond all that could have been expected of heroes.

U. S. brig Niagara, off the Western Sister,
Head of Lake Erie, September 10, 1813, 4 P. M.

SIR—It has pleased the Almighty to give to the arms of the United States a signal victory over their enemies on this lake. The British squadron consisting of two ships, two brigs, one schooner and one sloop, have this moment surrendered to the force under my command, after a sharp conflict.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
O. H. PERRY.

The hon. Wm. Jones,
Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. brig Niagara, off the Western Sister,
Head of Lake Erie, September 10th, 1813, 4 P. M.

DEAR GENERAL—We have met the enemy; and they are ours. Two ships, two brigs, one schooner and one sloop. Yours with great respect and esteem,
O. H. PERRY.

September 11th, 1812.

DEAR SIR—We have a great number of prisoners, which I wish to land: will you be so good as to order a guard to receive them; and inform me the place? Considerable numbers have been killed and wounded on both sides. From the best information, we have more prisoners than we have men on board our vessels. In great haste, yours very truly,

O. H. PERRY.

General Harrison.

Copy of a letter from commodore Perry to the Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. schooner Ariel,

Put-in-Bay, 13th September, 1813.

SIR—In my last I informed you that we had captured the enemy's fleet on this lake. I have now the honor to give you the most important particulars of the action. On the morning of the 10th inst. at sunrise, they were discovered from Put-in-Bay, when I lay at anchor with the squadron under my command. We got under weigh, the wind light at S. W. and stood for him. At 10 A. M. the wind hauled to S. E. and brought us to windward: formed the line and bore up. At 15 minutes before 12, the enemy commenced firing; at 5 minutes before 12 the action commenced on our part. Finding their fire very destructive, owing to their long guns, and its being mostly directed at the Lawrence, I made sail and directed the other vessels to follow for the purpose of closing with the enemy. Every brace and bow line being soon shot away she became unmanageable, notwithstanding the great exertions of the sailing master. In this situation she sustained the action upwards of two hours within cannon distance, until every gun was rendered useless, and the greater part of her crew either killed or wounded. Finding she could no longer annoy the enemy, I left her in charge of lieutenant Yarnall, who, I was convinced from the bravery already displayed by him, would do what would comport with the honor of the flag. At past two, the wind springing up, captain Elliot was enabled to bring his vessel, the Niagara, gallantly into close action; I immediately went on board of her, when he anticipated my wish by volunteering to bring the schooners which had been kept astern by the lightness of the wind, into close action. It was with unspeakable pain that I saw, soon after I got on board the Niagara, the flag of the Lawrence come down, although I was perfectly sensible that she had been defended to the last, and that to have continued to make a shew of resistance would have been a wanton sacrifice of the remains of her brave crew. But the enemy was not able to take possession of her, and circumstances soon permitted her flag again to be hoisted. At 45 minutes past two the signal was made for "close action."—The Niagara being very little injured, I determined to pass through the enemy's line, bore up and passed ahead of their two ships and a brig, giving a raking fire to them from the starboard guns, and to a large schooner and sloop, from the larboard side at half pistol shot distance. The smaller vessels at this time having got within grape and cannister distance, under the direction of captain Elliot, and keeping up a well directed fire, the two ships, a brig, and a schooner surrendered, a schooner and a sloop making a vain attempt to escape.

Those officers and men who were immediately under my observation evinced the greatest gallantry, and I have no doubt that all the others conducted themselves as became American officers and seamen. Lieut. Yarnall, first of the Lawrence, although several times wounded, refused to quit the deck.—Midshipman Forrest (doing duty as lieut.) and sailing master Taylor, were of great assistance to me, I have great pain in stating to you the death of lieut. Brook of the marines, and midshipman Laub, both of the Lawrence, and midshipman John Clarke of the Scorpion: they were valuable and promising officers. Mr. Hambleton, purser, who volunteered his services on deck, was severely wounded late in the action. Midshipman Claxton and Swartwout of the Lawrence, were severely wounded. On board of the Niagara, lieut. Smith and Edwards, and midshipman Webster (doing duty as sailing master) behaved in a very handsome manner. Captain Brevoort of the army, who acted as a volunteer in the capacity of a marine officer, on board that vessel, is an excellent and brave officer, and with his musketry did great execution. Lieut. Turner, commanding the Caledonia, brought that vessel into action in the most able manner, and is an officer that in all situations may be relied on. The Ariel, lieut. Packlet, and Scorpion, sailing master Champlin, were enabled to get early into action, and were of great service. Capt. Elliott speaks in the highest terms of Magrath, purser, who had been dispatched in a boat on service previous to my getting on board the Niagara; and, being a seaman, since the action has rendered essential service in taking charge of one of the prizes. Of capt. Elliott, already so well known to the government, it would be almost superfluous to speak. In this action he evinced his characteristic bravery and judgment, and, since the close of the action, has given me the most able and essential assistance.

I have the honor to enclose you a list of the killed and wounded, together with a statement of the relative force of the squadrons. The captain and first lieutenant of the Queen Charlotte, and first lieut. of Detroit, were killed.—Capt. Barclay, senior officer, and the commander of the Lady Prevost, severely wounded. Their loss in killed and wounded I have not yet been able to ascertain, it must however, have been very great.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, sir,
your obedient servant,
O. H. PERRY.
The hon. William Jones,
Secretary of the navy.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM COM. PERRY.

U. S. schr. Ariel, Put-in-bay, 13th Sept. 1813.

SIR—I have caused the prisoners taken on the 10th inst. to be landed at Sandusky, and have requested gen. Harrison to have them marched to Chillicothe, and there wait until your pleasure shall be known respecting them.

The Lawrence has been so entirely cut up, it is absolutely necessary she should go into safe harbor. I have therefore directed lieut. Yarnall to proceed to Erie in her, with the wounded of the fleet, and dismantle and get her over the bar as soon as possible.

The two ships in a heavy sea this day at anchor lost their masts, being much injured in the action. I shall haul them into the inner bay at this place and moor them for the present. The Detroit is a remarkably fine ship, sails well, and is very strongly built. The Queen Charlotte is a much superior vessel to what has been represented. The Lady Prevost is a large fine schooner.

I also beg your instructions respecting the wounded. I am satisfied, sir, that whatever steps I might take governed by humanity would meet your approbation. Under this impression, I have taken upon myself to promise capt. Barclay, who is very dangerously wounded, that he shall be landed as near lake Ontario as possible, and I had no doubt you would allow me to parole him. He is under the impression that nothing but leaving this part of the country will save his life. There is also a number of Canadians among the prisoners, many who have families.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. H. PERRY.

S. HAMBLETON, Purser,
O. H. PERRY, Captain and Senior officer,

☞ From lake Ontario we have also triumphant news. Of sir James Foe, the Democratic Press most excellently observes, that "when he swept the lake he did it in so slovenly a manner that Chancey had to go over it all after him!"—The commodore's letter gives us a distinct account of his proceedings. Sir James, having proposed to teach Chancey the first rudiments of seamanship," has fairly entered on his lesson by running away. Well—it often happens, that "one pair of heels is worth two pair of hands."

CHAUNCEY'S CRUIZE.

Extract of a letter from commodore Isaac Chancey to the Secretary of the Navy, dated Sept. 13, 1813.

On board the U. S. ship Gen. Pike, Off Duck Island.

SIR—On the 7th at day-light, the enemy's fleet was discovered close in with Niagara river, wind from the southward. Made the signal, and weighed with the fleet (prepared for action) and stood out of the river after him; he immediately made all sail to the northward. We made sail in chase with our heavy sch'rs. in tow and have continued the chase all round the lake night and day until yesterday morning, when he succeeded in getting into Amherst bay, which is so little known to our pilots and said to be full of shoals that they are not willing to take me in there. I shall however (unless driven from my station by a gale of wind) endeavor to watch him so close as to prevent his getting out upon the lake.

During our long chase we frequently got within from one to two miles of the enemy, but our heavy sailing sch'rs. prevented our closing with him, until the 11th off Genessee river, we carried a breeze with us while he lay becalmed to within about 3-4 of a mile of him when he took the breeze and we had a running fight of 3 and a half hours, but by his superior sailing he escaped me and run into Amherst bay yesterday morning. In the course of our chase on the 11th, I got several broadsides from this ship upon the enemy, which must have done him considerable injury as many of the shot were seen to strike him, and people were observed over the side plugging shot holes. A few shot struck our hull and a little rigging was cut but nothing of importance—not a man was hurt.

I was much disappointed that sir J. mes refused to fight me, as he was so much superior in point of force both in guns and men—having upwards of 20 guns more than we have and heaves a greater weight of shot.

This ship, the Madison and the Sylph have each a schooner constantly in tow, yet the others cannot sail as fast as the enemy's squadron, which gives him decidedly the advantage, and puts it in his power to engage me when and how he chuses.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ISAAC CHAUNCEY.

Hon. Wm. Jones, Sec'y of the Navy.

BLOCKADE OF NEW LONDON.

Gallant exploit.—From a New York paper of Sept. 76—"A gentleman from Rockaway informs, that on Thursday, as he and another person were going to bathe on the beach at that place, they discovered four barges, supposed to belong to the Statira frigate, in pursuit of a schooner which was endeavoring to gain the shore.—While the gentlemen were considering whether it would be safe to bathe in that situation, a cannon ball from one of the barges passed within four feet of one of them—they then thought it time to make off, and had not proceeded but a short distance before another ball struck and lodged in the ground within a foot of the other gentleman. This ball they brought to Rockaway, and found it weighed 12 1-4 lbs."

BLOCKADE OF THE CHESAPEAKE.

Norfolk, September 14.—On Saturday last about fifteen men volunteered from a militia company stationed near the inlet, to go and attack a party of the British who were said to be on shore near the Cape. When they came to the Cape, and were mounting one of the sand hills, they found themselves in full view, and within musket shot of a large body of marines who were exercising. A cluster of officers were standing some distance off between their main body and our militia—the latter had not a moment to spare—they took deliberate aim at the officers, and fired—four of them fell! The militia then made the best of their way back to camp, while the enemy's shot whistled over their heads in all directions, but without effect.

The British Loan.

The following is from a London paper of June 3. "The parties who intend bidding for the loan, waited by appointment upon the earl of Liverpool and the chancellor of the exchequer this morning, when they were informed that the amount of the loan would be 27 millions. For every 100l advanced it was proposed to give 110 reduced and 60 consols."

If we understand these phrases rightly, and comprehend the nature of the stocks to be created, in consequence of this loan (and we have taken some trouble to come at the truth of the matter) the following curious facts appear:

The amount of stock raised to procure 27 millions, amounts to £45,900,000—to wit:

£ 29,700,000 at 3 per cent.

Producing together an interest of £ 1,529,000— or rather less than 6 per cent. on the monies nominally raised. We say "nominally;" for the bonus, premiums and discounts allowed, will reduce the sum accounted for at the exchequer, below 25 millions and a half, and the interest on it will be more than six per cent.

In the whole transaction, no money appears—"paper does the business." The payment is made by the transfer of other stocks to the commissioners of the sinking fund—by exchequer bills, or bank notes—the last is the best circulating medium; but now very much like our old continental money, for it is impossible that the bank should ever redeem it with specie.

The paper of the bank of England has excessively multiplied as the specie disappeared. Its bills in circulation in 1807, was about 12,000,000; in 1810, 23,000,000; but now upwards of 43,000,000. The value of its notes, have of course depreciated; for though in law a one pound note is 20s. sterling, it will not purchase as much of any commodity as three dollars, which used to be valued at 4s. 6d. each. The dollars is now 6s. 9d. or at an advance of exactly 50 per cent. and one ounce of Portuguese gold, worth in the United States $17 60, produces in England, five pounds five shillings, equal to $23 31; having an advance of nearly 33 per cent.—40 per cent. ADVANCE is, therefore, the medium value of gold and silver compared with the bank of England's notes. On these indisputable facts we shall pursue the matter a little further for amusement and instruction.

The stock created for the loan of 27 millions, which produced at the exchequer 25 1-2 millions, was £45,900,000. This 25 1-2 millions, supposing it to be of bank paper, might have been paid with eighteen millions of the same quality of money as the loans of the United States are composed of, and the interest is really and truly nearly 9 per cent. per annum.

These plain and simple facts give us much insight into the condition of the boasted finances of Great Britain; where the actual interest for money had seldom, if ever, exceeded, 5 per cent. before the rupture of the peace by them in 1803.

Meteor.

New-Haven, (Con.) April 25.—A short account of a Meteor which was seen in this city by several gentlemen, on the evening of Saturday, the 20th ult.

The time of its appearance was about 15 minutes before 10 o'clock. It continued visible from 6 to 8 seconds. The direction in which it moved was from W. by N. to E. by S. The writer saw the light which it yielded, from the first; although he did not see the body itself until it had been in sight from 2 to 3 seconds. It was then about N. 20 d. E. 35 d. above the horizon; and consisted of a body and a tail. The body was an ellipse, with the ends of the transverse somewhat pointed. The transverse was as long as the apparent diameter of the moon when on the meridian; and the conjugate about two thirds as long. The length of the tail was not far from five times the apparent diameter of the sun, or about 2 d. 30 m. in the heavens. For two-fifths of its length it was acute decreasing cone; the remainder was an uniform stripe of light.—The color of the body was yellower than that of the moon; and its brilliancy obviously greater than that of the tail. The illumination was so strong that standing objects cast very distinct shadows.

Soon after the writer first saw it, numerous sparks of fire apparently snapped from it, and went out almost immediately. A short time before the meteor disappeared, three much larger pieces separated from it. These moved, for an instant, in lines nearly parallel with its orbit; but their course became constantly more and more perpendicular.—The largest of the three continued visible till within about 20 degrees of the horizon. The path of each fragment was for a time obviously curvilinear. The meteor was itself visible a second or more after their separation from it. It disappeared all at once, at an altitude of about 30 degrees above the horizon, and in the direction of N. E. It seemed suddenly to have left the atmosphere, and to have gone in an instant behind some substance absolutely opaque. A short time after its disappearance, a bright flash was seen in that part of the sky where the meteor was first discovered—this perhaps lasted a second.

About eight minutes after the meteor was gone a very loud report was heard in the direction of that part of the sky where it vanished. This was accompanied by a very sensible jar, but had little or no roar or echo. The sound was not like thunder, nor like the report of a cannon. It was sharper and quicker than either.

The sky that evening was nearly overcast, but the covering was every where thin. Particularly in the north. In that direction various stars were visible. There had been during the evening an appearance of thunder and lightning, and none was discovered afterwards.

The illumination was seen by a considerable number of persons, and the report was extensively heard. The writer knows of but two persons in town who saw the meteor besides himself. Unfortunately for philosophy, in this instance, the "steady habits" of the people (as it was Saturday night) had collected almost all of them in their respective houses.

It is suspected that the meteor was seen farther north, by a greater number of persons; and it is hoped that the preceding statement will call forth the observations of others.

Scandalous curiosity.

The following letter appeared in the "New Hampshire Patriot," a paper printed at Concord, N. H.

of September 14, 1813.—It is given as "verbatim and literal." Some of the persons who have signed this instrument are reported as men of pretty high standing in society. The letter was shewn to a lieutenant French, by a certain deputy sheriff of Coos county. French felt it his duty to retain it—the deputy and three or four others assaulted him with a view to recover it; but French beat the whole of them off, after severely bruising some of the assailants and held on to his prize. The "Esqr. Sawyer" named is understood to mean Josiah Sawyer, Esq. of Exton, Lower Canada.

"ESQR. SAWYER.

SIR,

"Information is here obtained that one Curtis Coe, an Inhabitant of Barnstead (N. H.) is approached and committed to one of your prisons at Three Rivers as a Spy. We beg leave to represent to you and solicit your attention to an investigation of the cause of his confinement. We are very confident from our acquaintance with Mr. Coe, and his character, Politics, &c. that his object is far from being unfriendly to the motives which induced your Government in repelling the attacks made on our Executive. His Politics have uniformly been what we Style, Staunch Federalism; and I think we believe to be no other, than travelling among the citizens in defiance of some of our laws. For this we do not commend him; but we cannot possibly conceive your Government should so unmercifully chastise him. If his feelings are so manifestly and essentially hostile to you, we think it would be by no means improper, if it were in your power, to command him to depart. He has not acted with us in a friendly manner, and the balance of economy to him, is a disadvantage to your usage in repelling the attacks on our Executive have to be made. We therefore, after you have examined the subject, and you unite in your opinion, that he is deserving of his confinement, and sufficient grounds are shown to your friends in this State. Our only objection has been something like two thirds of the time with his Character and Politics. We do not wish sir by interfering and using your influence, not only as you can consistently with the present situation in restoring him to his friends, but also confer a special favor of your friends and the State serves

THE CHRONICLE.

A late London paper, the Times, says—"The Gottenburg mail confirms our opinion, that the person of disinction, lately indisposed at Dresden, was Berthier. That celebrated assistant and follower of Bonaparte throughout his military career, died last month in the 69th year of his age."

Berthier was present at the siege of York-town, in 1781—he was one of the most accomplished men of the age; and Bonaparte has yet lost no friend on whom he so confidently depended.

Vermont election.—We have not the returns, but it appears certain that Mr. Gabusha, the "republican," is re-elected governor; the "federalists" have gained some in the assembly, and the character of that body is doubtful

Lakes Erie, Huron and Michigan

The splendid victory over the British force on lake Erie, by Commodore Perry, and the expected movements of the northern arm army, under the general Harrison, now consisting of at least 7,000 choice troops, eminently calculated for the services required, very naturally produce much enquiry for the geography of that portion of North-America lying on the Upper Lakes, with an account of the lakes themselves, that the effect of a powerful naval and military force acting against the allies, may be anticipated. To aid this enquiry, and collect into a focus all that we know of these things, the following sketches were prepared. We are not willing to say that every item is correct—it is almost impossible that they should be—but we have compared what we esteem the best authorities with each other, and arranged many of the particulars from the notes of our common place book, collected within the two last years for this very purpose; and the whole may be accepted as of general credit.

The position of the great lakes is so well known to the people of the United States from the common use of the map, that we shall waste no time in describing it; but proceed immediately to the main objects of enquiry.

Lake ERIE is of an elliptical form, three hundred miles long from east to west, and ninety broad at its widest part, from north to south. The depth is rated at twenty fathoms; but there are many shoals. The bottom is generally of a light yellowish sand; which being disturbed by storms, tinges the waters of the lake, at other times clear and of a greenish color. The northern shore is rude and rocky, but has several harbors for small vessels, and at fort Erie and Malden, or (as the British call it) Amherstburg, large ships may ride safely. Long Point, running from the north shore, is a narrow peninsula of sand, piled with mighty rocks, towards the north; but on the other sides presents a fine beach,—“very convenient to haul the boats out of the surf upon it, when the lake is too rough for sailing and rowing.” The south side of Erie is generally a sand beach, and the harbors are all incommoded with bars at their entrance. But in some places, at Cayuga particularly, there are immense ranges of rocks, rising perpendicularly out of the waters of the lake, forty or fifty feet high, and several miles in length. The danger of passing these is so great in the time of a storm, that the indians always offer a sacrifice of tobacco to the water, as they approach them. The harbors on this side of the lake, best known to us are, Black Rock opposite fort Erie; Erie, where is the United States' navy yard; &c. here the water on the bar is not more than seven or eight feet, though there is depth enough within it; Cleveland, with six or seven feet water; Sandusky and Put-in-Bay, where our squadron was on the 13th ultimo, which last is spoken of as one of the “finest harbors in America.” This bay is not laid down in the maps, nor is it mentioned in any of the books of papers we have; but we apprehend it is near the head of the lake, about forty miles above Sandusky, and from 20 to 30 from Malden. Passing Malden, where the Detroit river is about three miles wide, (though the channel is within the range of a musket shot from the fort, which is, therefore, the key of the higher lakes) with a fine navigation of eighteen miles, you arrive at the town of Detroit, famous for Hull's capitulation, and the river here is only half a mile wide. Detroit was a handsome and lively place, and contained about twelve hundred inhabitants at the time of its surrender, who had a considerable commerce on the lakes and with the neighboring indians. Passing Detroit, the river again expands, and receives the waters of Lake St. Clair by a mouth a mile and a half wide. This lake is about ninety miles in circumference. Some say it has a bar across the middle, running east and west, to pass which vessels proceeding to or from lake Huron must be unladen; we do not credit this assertion, but believe it may be navigated by any of the vessels we have on lake Erie, with safety. The river St. Clair, which unites the lake of that name with lake Huron, presents an easy entrance for vessels into the latter; and is about eighteen miles long.

Lake HURON is of a triangular shape, about one thousand miles in circumference, and navigable for large ships, though some say it is not safe for vessels drawing more than nine or ten feet, on account of the shoals; perhaps chiefly because they are yet little known. The shores of this lake are represented as generally sterile, being composed of sand and small stones; but at some distance back the soil is pretty good. On the northern parts are many valuable establishments for carrying on the fur trade, of great importance to the enemy. From the northern extremity of this lake, there is a back passage to Montreal; for the following luminous account of which we were indebted to the editor of the Aurore about a twelve month ago:

“The passage from Montreal to this post, [St Joseph's, to be noticed hereafter] is by the Outawas river, which has its source in the lake Timiskaming north of lake Huron, but the passage from which into lake Huron is by a portage of two miles to the navigable head of French river, which falls into lake Huron. The Outawas river falls into the Cadarague from the north west about ten miles above Montreal; and presents in the passage upwards from Montreal numerous rapids, the waters passable with difficulty by canoes, and portages over which every thing must be transported by human labor only; circumstances which render it inefficient for military use, since a force passing upward must not only transport its military stores and provisions over these portages, but the supply and difficulty must be increased with numbers. These facts in the present posture of affairs are very important, because they demonstrate, that with the command of the lakes, which the U. States can always possess when they determine to employ the ample and facile means they possess, the whole of the Indian trade of the British must fall, and their garrisons must surrender or descend the Ottawa river from mere necessity; we shall therefore give a short sketch of the passage up this river as it is pursued by the traders, whose commodities for transport are much more manageable than military apparatus.

"The navigation is conducted in canoes of birch, which carry about eight or ten men, and from forty to sixty packages of merchandize; besides their provisions, biscuit, pork, pease and Indian corn.—In May they leave La Chine about a mile below the entrance of the river Otawa, and proceed to St. Anne, about two miles from the western end of the island upon which stands Montreal, the two mountains being on the opposite side of the lake here formed by the confluence of the Otawa with the Cadaraqui, and taking the name of the lake of the two mountains; at St. Ann's, there is a rapid, where they are obliged to unlade part of their cargoes.—This lake of the two mountains is twenty miles long, and about two miles wide, and cultivation is seen on both its sides; at its end the water contracts and assumes the name of Otawa river. Here it is the inland voyage is considered as beginning; and after a course of fifteen miles, the current is interrupted by currents and cascades for a succession of ten miles, generally denominated rapids; here the travellers are obliged to unload and bear their burdens on slings or on their backs; whilst the canoes are towed up against the current with immense labor and patience. There are places where the ground will not admit of the carriage of large loads, and they are therefore carried at several times.

"After about sixty miles of smooth current, where the river is generally more than a mile wide, they reach the portage of the lake Chaudiere, where there is a cascade of twenty feet. The portage here is about half a mile, and canoes and all their lading are carried upon men's shoulders. Thence to the next portage des Chenes, is short, but the land carriage is about a third longer than the preceding, and is called portage du Chat; there are two smaller portages called des Sables and de la Montagne, in eighteen miles to the grand Calumet, where the current is again tranquil; next the portage Dufort, which is 245 yards, over which canoes and cargoes must be all carried—then the portage of the mountain, the Derige, where the loads must be carried 385 yards over one, and 250 over the other—the last portage of this river is a long one between Les Alouettes, Deux Joachims and Roche Captaine, and the discharge De Trou. The distance of the portages nearly two miles, and others over lofty and difficult rocks—when at about four hundred miles from Montreal, Petit Reviere falls into the Otawa from the south westward; here the voyagers must turn off to the left, and pass this river of about sixty-five miles length, interrupted by rocks and cataracts to the number of thirteen to the high lands: when after the greatest difficulties, and a course of land carriage of about six miles, they reach lake Nipissing, which is about thirty-six miles long and about fifteen wide; but the track of canoes is much longer, as they must follow the coast.

"Out of this lake flows French river before mentioned, precipitating its flood over rocks of considerable height, called the Kettle Falls, which necessarily infers another portage, of which there are not less than five more in a distance of about 80 miles to the entrance of lake Huron."

It is by this route it has been supposed general Procter would attempt to make his escape. Indeed, it was stated that the people of Malden had actually sent off their most valuable effects to reach Montreal that way. But this channel, as well as the route through the lakes, is closed by Perry's victory; as Huron, on the fall of Malden, must own the sovereignty of the "striped bunting," as the English in derision called our flag.

Lake MICHIGAN communicates with Huron by the streights of Michilimackinac, which are about 6 miles long. This lake is entirely embosomed within the United States, which are separated from the British possessions by an imaginary line drawn through the middle of lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron, and Superior, &c. The length of Michigan, from north to south, is estimated at 280 miles, and the breadth between 60 and 70, and it has about the same depth of water as Huron. The island of Michilimackinac, on which stands the village and fort of that name, is situate near the entrance of the streight from Huron, being about 7 miles in circumference, and four miles distant from the nearest land. It abounds with excellent water, and is high and healthy; rising to the centre "as to resemble when you approach it, a turtle's back, from whence it derived its name, Michilimackinac, or the Turtle." The fort is handsomely situated and commands the harbor, which is a beautiful basin of water, 5 or 6 fathoms deep, well sheltered from the winds. The village contained about 300 inhabitants in 1810, chiefly French Canadians; and a very brisk trade was carried on with the neighboring Indians. The export of furs in 1804, was valued at $238,936, and the duties received on goods imported from the British possessions, were $60,000. It was in a very flourishing situation when the enemy possessed themselves of it last year, before the declaration of war was known to our commandant. The hostile force came from St. Joseph's, a post about 40 miles north, situate at the foot of the streights of St. Marie, through which the waters of lake Superior are discharged into Huron. St. Joseph's was held chiefly as a place of observation on Michilimackinac; which later the British gave up with great reluctance by Jay's treaty in 1794 though they had conditioned to do it, immediately, in 1783, ten years before. Chicago, or fort Dearborn, famous for the murder of its garrison about a year since by the allies, is near the foot, or south end of Michigan, nearly 250 miles from Michilimackinac, and was the only post or settlement we had on the shores of the lake.

St. Joseph's was garrisoned by two companies of Canadians and a few regulars. It is assailable by water. The streights of St. Marie are 40 miles long, and so rapid that they cannot be ascended even by canoes, though the descent is safe, if the pilots are good. As it is not probable that any military operation will be carried on on lake SUPERIOR, we defer an account of it at present.

With these facts before him, the reader will easily imagine the entrance of some part of our squadron into lake Huron, immediately on the capture of Malden; and in his minds' eye beheld them scouring the whole shore of that lake and of Michigan, breaking up all the posts and factories of the white enemy and chastising his red allies, with a celerity and perfection of vengeance that belongs to their crimes. Michilimackinac passes into our hands, of course. St. Joseph's, too remote for intelligence or succor from the enemy, with its garrison, is given into our possession. All the places of deposit for indian supplies, will be destroyed; and the savages, employed in the business of the British during the summer, and cut off, at this critical season, from their accustomed resources, must perish by thousands for food and clothing. The whole trade of the North-West Company, a mighty mercantile establishment, of vital importance to Canada, and of great consideration with the mother country, is done. In less than four weeks we may have the reality of the things here anticipated, with an account of other events, perhaps quite as important as those apprehended, but which, for want of better information, do not at at this time appear.

Law of the United States.

An act laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, That every person who, on the first day of January next, shall be the owner of any still or stills, or other implements in lieu of stills, used for the purposes of distilling spirituous liquors, or who shall have such still or stills, or implements aforesaid, under his superintendance either as agent for the owner or on his own account, shall before the said day, and every person who after the said day shall use or intend to use any still or stills or implements as aforesaid, either as owner, agent or otherwise, shall before he shall begin to use such still or stills, or other implements in lieu thereof, for the purpose of distilling spirituous liquors, apply for and obtain from the collector appointed by virtue of the act entitled "an act for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties," for the collection district in which such person resides [or to the deputy of such collector duly authorised,] a license for using the said still or stills, or other implements as aforesaid; which licenses respectively shall be granted at the option of the proprietor or possessor of such still or stills, for any or either of the terms mentioned in this act, upon the payment in money by such proprietor or possessor of the duties payable on the said license or licenses according to the provisions of this act, if the said duties shall not exceed five dollars; and if they shall exceed five dollars, on such proprietor or possessor executing and delivering to the collector or to his deputy as aforesaid, a bond with one or more sureties to the satisfaction of such collector or deputy, conditioned for the payment of said duties at the end of four months after the expiration of the term for which such license or licenses respectively shall have been granted. And the said bond shall be taken in the name of the United States of America and in such form as shall be prescribed by the treasury department. And if any person shall after the said first day of January next, use or cause to be used any still or stills, or other implements as aforesaid in distilling spirituous liquors, or shall be the owner of, or have under his superintendance either as agent or otherwise, any still or stills, or other implements as aforesaid, which shall after the said day have been used as aforesaid, without having a license therefor as aforesaid, continuing in force for the whole time during which the said still or stills, or implements as aforesaid, shall have been thus used, every such person shall forfeit and pay the sum of one hundred dollars, together with double the amount of duties which would have been payable for the term during which such still or stills, or implements as aforesaid shall be thus used, had the said still or stills, or implements as aforesaid, been entered according to the provisions of this act, to be recovered with costs of suit.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the licenses aforesaid shall and may be granted for and during the following terms or periods, and on the payment or securing of payment as aforesaid of the duties undermentioned, namely:

For a still or stills solely employed in distilling spirits from domestic materials, for a license for the employment thereof, for and during the term of two weeks, nine cents for each gallon of the capacity of every such still, including the head thereof; for a license for and during the term of one month, eighteen cents for each gallon of its capacity as aforesaid; for a license for and during the term of two months, thirty-two cents for each gallon of its capacity as aforesaid; for a license for and during the term of three months, forty-two cents for each gallon of its capacity as aforesaid; for a license for and during the term of four months, fifty-two cents for each gallon of its capacity as aforesaid; for a license for and during the term of six months, seventy cents for each gallon of its capacity as aforesaid; for a license for one year, one hundred and eight cents for each gallon of its capacity as aforesaid: Provided, That there shall be paid upon each still employed wholly in the distillation of roots, but one-half the rates of duties above-mentioned, according to the capacity of such still.

For a still or stills employed in distilling spirits from foreign materials, for a license for the employment thereof for and during the term of one month, twenty-five cents for each gallon of the capacity of every such still including the head thereof; for a license for and during the term of three months, sixty cents for each gallon of its capacity as aforesaid; for a license for and during the term of six months, one hundred and five cents for each gallon of its capacity as aforesaid; for a license for one year, one hundred and thirty-five cents for each gallon of its capacity as aforesaid.

And for every boiler however constructed, employed for the purpose of generating steam in those distilleries where wooden or other vessels are used instead of metal stills, and the action of steam is substituted to the immediate application of fire to the materials from which the spirituous liquors are distilled, for a license for the employment thereof double the amount on each gallon of the capacity of the said boiler including the head thereof, which would be payable for the said license if granted for the same term and for the employment on the same materials for a still or stills to the contents of which being the materials from whence the spirituous liquors are drawn, an immediate application of fire during the process of distillation is made.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the collectors within their respective districts, to grant licenses for distilling, which licenses shall be marked with a mark, directing the rate of duty thereupon, and shall be signed by the commissioner of the revenue, and being countersigned by the collector, who shall issue the same or cause the same to be issued, shall be granted to any person who shall desire the same, upon application in writing and upon payment or securing of payment as aforesaid, of the sum or duty payable by this act upon each license requested.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the application in writing, to be made by any person applying for a license for distilling as aforesaid, shall state the place of distilling, the number and contents of the still or stills, boiler or boilers, and whether intended to distill spirituous liquors from foreign or domestic materials. And every person making a false statement in either of the said particulars, or who shall distill spirituous liquors from materials other than those stated in the application aforesaid as well as the owner or superintendent of any distillery, still or stills, with respect to which such false statement shall have been made, or which shall be thus unlawfully employed, shall forfeit and pay the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars to be recovered with costs of suit.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That every such collector or his deputy duly authorised under his hand and seal, shall be authorised to apply at all reasonable times for admittance into any distillery or place where any still or stills are kept or used within his collection district, for the purpose of viewaming and measuring the still or stills, boiler or boilers. And every owner of such distillery, still or stills, or persons having the care or superintendance or management of the same, who shall refuse to admit such officer as aforesaid, or to suffer him to examine and measure the said still or stills, boiler or boilers, shall for every such refusal, forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the collectors aforesaid, in their respective districts, and they are hereby authorised to collect the duties imposed by this act, and to prosecute for the recovery of the same, and for the recovery of any sum or sums which may be forfeited by virtue of this act. And all fines, penalties and forfeitures, which shall be incurred by force of this act, shall and may be sued for and recovered in the name of the United States, or of the collector within whose district any such fine, penalty or forfeiture, shall have been incurred, by bill, plaint or information, one moiety thereof to the use of the United States, and the other moiety thereof to the use of the person who, if a collector, shall first discover, if other than a collector, shall first inform of the cause, matter or thing, whereby any such fine, penalty or forfeiture, shall have been incurred; and where the cause of action or complaint shall arise or accrue more than fifty miles distant from the nearest place by law established for holding a district court within the district in which the same shall arise or accrue, such suit and recovery may be had before any court of the state, holden within the said district, having jurisdiction in like cases.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force until the termination of the war in which the United States are now engaged with Great Britain and Ireland and their dependencies, and for one year thereafter, and no longer.

Extract of a letter from major-general Pinkney to the secretary at war, dated,

His Quarters, Charleston, Nov. 1, 1812.

"I inform you, having been advised by the north to lieutenant Grandison, who at present commands in the naval department here, that six American seamen, who had been taken prisoners on board our privateers, had been sent to Jamaica to be tried as British subjects. To inform me, he called upon the marshal to obtain double that number of British seamen as hostages. The marshal in consequence of instructions from the department of state, asked my advice on the subject, and I have given my opinion that they ought to be detained until the pleasure of the president shall be known. The testimony of captain Moon is herewith. I hope, sir, you will have the goodness to have this business put in the proper train to have the president's pleasure on this subject communicated to the marshal.

Copy of a letter from captain Moon, of the privateer Sarah-Ann, Nassau, Nov.—President, October 14, 1812.

"Six of my crew, claimed as British subjects, were this day taken on board of and put on board his majesty's brig the Sappho, and sent for Jamaica, where 'tis said they are to be tried for their lives; consequently I requested each respectively as to the place of their delivery, and I tell to permission by the American government, when they stand as follows, to wit:

David Dick, seaman, that he was born in the north of Ireland, but has resided in the United States ever since the year 1793; he is a good sailor in the United States' navy, viz. on board the "Saratoga," the "Conqueror," President, "Constitution," John Adams, and "Washington;" he is a native of Connecticut, John Adams, and second mate of the "Saratoga," No. 2; David Dick, ship-carpenter, in Massachusetts is his uncle. Dick is about five feet six and a half inches high, dark hair, has a scar on his left elbow, and one on each wrist; he entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore.

John Gaul, seaman, says he was born in Northbrook, state of Massachusetts, where his parents, brothers and sisters, now reside; is married in New-York, and his wife (Mary Gaul) lives in Roosevelt-street, No. 37; has a regular discharge from the navy of the United States by captain Hugh G. Campbell, dated at St. Mary's, Georgia, 30th August, 1812; says he has served on board the United States' brig Vixen, gun-boats No. 10 and 158, from the last of which he was discharged. Gaul is twenty-seven years of age, about five feet seven inches high, brown hair, light complexion; he entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore.

Michael Pluck, ordinary seaman, says he was born in Baltimore; his parents are dead, but he is known by William Doolan, Thomas Taylor, and McDonald, of Baltimore; was a sister in some part of Pennsylvania whose name is Ann Welsh, was never at sea before; never had a protection. Pluck is twenty-six years old, five feet six and a half inches high, and has a scar on his left cheek bone; entered on board the Sarah Ann at Baltimore.

Thomas Rogers, seaman, says he was born in Waterford, Ireland, but has resided many years in the United States, and has been duly naturalized, a copy of which naturalization is filed in the custom-house at Baltimore; is known by Joseph Carey and Tom Rogers, cork-cutter, both of Baltimore; has a wife and three children in Baltimore; has lost his protection, but requests Joseph Carey to do all he can to effect his discharge from the British. Rogers entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore.

George Roberts, a colored man and seaman. This man I had not an opportunity of questioning; but I know him to be a native born citizen of the United States, of which fact he had every sufficient document together with free papers. Roberts entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore, where he is married.

Sentry Taylor, born in Baltimore, was born in Hackensack, New-Jersey, but had neither friends or relations nor acquaintance there; says Jane Snowden, of Savannah, Georgia, is his mother; never had a protection. Taylor is fifteen years old, has brown hair and light complexion; he entered on board the Sarah Ann in Savannah.

RICHARD MOON,

Late commander of the privateer Sarah Ann.

Copy of a letter from admiral Warren to Mr. Mitchell, agent for the exchange of American prisoners of war, dated,

Half-pay, 21st October, 1812.

Sir,—I had the honor to receive your letter and its enclosures relating to Thomas Dunn, and beg leave to inform you, that it appears the said man is married in England, has been eight years in his majesty's service, and received a pension from government under these circumstances, and the man never having made any application for his discharge from prison, he continues on board the Sarah Ann. I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN BORLASE WARREN.

Extract of a letter from William H. Savage, late agent for American seamen and commerce at Jamaica, to the secretary of state, dated,

Washington, December 1, 1812.

"I take the liberty to enclose you copies of a correspondence which took place between vice-admiral Stirling (commanding on the Jamaica station) and myself, since the declaration of war. I should have furnished it you at an earlier period, but an accident prevented, which I was not aware of, until my arrival at this city." Copy of my letter to vice-admiral Stirling, commanding on the Jamaica station on the subject of American seamen after the declaration of war.

Kingston, Jamaica, 6th August, 1812.

Sir,—Enclosed is a copy of a letter received by me yesterday from on board his majesty's ship Sappho, purporting to have been written by four American seamen on board that ship, with a view to soliciting aid towards effecting their discharge, in consequence of the declaration of war by the government of the United States against Great Britain.

In making this application I am fully aware that my duties ceased as agent for the commerce and seamen of the United States, on the knowledge of such declaration being made known here; but, sir, I am led to believe that at this period it will not be deemed inadmissible on your part to receive, nor improper on mine, to make the request, that you will be pleased to grant an order for the discharge of these seamen, feeling conscious (should they even not be protected with the usual documents afforded to citizens of the United States) that an English seaman would not declare himself otherwise than such under existing circumstances.

I seize the present opportunity also to forward to you twenty-one documents, as proof of the citizenship of that number of seamen, said to have been impressed by ships of war on this station, the great number of which have been heretofore unsuccessfully claimed by me, on behalf of the United States, and which may still course at this time some part of the crews of his majesty's ships on this station.

I beg further to state to you, that I have received numerous applications from on board various of his majesty's ships on this station for the relief of seamen, who I doubt not are entitled to the protection of the American government, many of them having with them the proofs of their citizenship, as I am led to believe from the assertions contained in their communications. Applications have also been made for the relief of many without success; the latter amount in number to forty-six, as per list of names enclosed, several of whom I understand have been shifted (since their impressment) on board of other vessels than those they were first taken on board of. All of which I beg to offer for your consideration, feeling as I do anxious to attend my last effort in behalf of those seamen who are entitled to them, and at the same time being impressed with the idea, that it would be for their own sake, to obtain any American in the service of the navy of Great-Britain contrary to their disposition during the present conflict, I therefore take the liberty of adding to my former request, that you will be pleased to grant orders that such seamen may be discharged from duty on board his majesty's ships on this station.

With sentiments of the highest respect, &c.

Copy of vice-admiral Stirling's secretary's letter, in answer to mine to the vice-admiral of 6th August, 1812.
Admiral's Pen, August 7, 1812.

Sir,—I am desired by vice-admiral Stirling to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, and to acquaint you that directions were given some days ago, that all the men in the squadron under his command, who can prove themselves to be American born subjects, should be sent to the prison-ship until an exchange of prisoners is established between the two countries, in consequence of the late declaration of war by the United States against Great Britain.

I return herewith the papers which accompanied your letter, and am, sir, &c.
(Signed) CHS. STIRLING, junr. Secretary.

Extract of a letter from Wm. H. Savage, esq. late agent for American seamen and commerce at Jamaica, to Charles Stirling, jr. esq. dated Kingston, September 16, 1812.

"In answer to my letter of the 6th ult. you were pleased to inform me that directions had been given by the vice-admiral, some days prior to the date of my letter, for the removal of all native Americans (who could prove themselves such) from on board his majesty's ships to that of the prison-ship; but as some time has now elapsed since you were pleased to give me this information, and learning that some instances of detention at present exist on board his majesty's schooner Deconverte, I am led to enquire this subject again, as in one instance I shall hope to satisfy vice-admiral Stirling of the man's being entitled to his removal from duty on board his majesty's schooner of war. The person alluded to is Elijah Stirling, an American seaman, who was impressed from on board the British merchant ship Brilliant, at the bay of Honduras, in the early part of the year 1810, by his majesty's schooner Ebr del Mar, and has since been detained on board of various of his majesty's ships on this station, although provided with a regular protection, which instrument this man got conveyed to me about the 20th of September, following, and which was by me forwarded to admiral Rowley, accompanied as usual in like cases with a request that the man might be discharged. On the receipt of my letter, the admiral answered through his secretary, that the nature of Stirling's imprisonment was such that he could not comply with my request; but which answer was unaccompanied in return with the protection in question, and what has become of it I am unable to say.

"About this period I was led to understand from admiral Rowley, that all American seamen who should be impressed from on board any British merchant vessel, would be retained in the service of his majesty, but that all American seamen who should be impressed from on board of American vessels, would on application, accompanied by proofs, be discharged. As this information was received about the period of my application for the discharge of Stirling, I was led to conclude it stamped the nature of his imprisonment, and what confirmed it in my mind was that I received similar assurances to various applications made for American seamen who had under various circumstances, slipped on board of British ships, and were from thence impressed on board of his majesty's ships of war, all of which I hope the admiral will be pleased to take into consideration; for to insist on the service of this man, I think will be a dereliction and a relief. American seamen from duty on board the squadron under his command. I beg to enclose a note from Mr. Mead (the late secretary) relative to my application for this man's discharge, and to observe, that it is possible the protection may yet be found among the papers of the late secretary; as it has not been used to return me the protections of those men whose applications for discharge were not complied with.

"I beg furthermore to observe, that there appears also to be on board his majesty's schooner Deconverte, two other American seamen, viz. John Englefield and Richard Land-rain; the former of whom asserts that he served his apprenticeship to the trade of a cooper at Boston, but has lost his protection; the latter declares himself to be a native of Rhode Island, and that his protection has been destroyed by Mr. Oliver, commander of his majesty's schooner Deconverte. I shall not now animadvert on the impropriety of such a circumstance; but request, should the matters here-ent be found correct, that they may meet the attention of the vice-admiral."

Extract of a letter from vice-admiral Stirling's secretary, to W. H. Savage, esq. in answer to his of the 16th Sept. ult. 1812.
Admiral's Pen, 19th Sept. 1812.

"I have just received your letter of the 16th instant, which I have laid before vice-admiral Stirling, and he is directed to acquaint you, that Elijah Stirling and other persons on board of his majesty's schooner Deconverte, said to be American seamen, however, when called upon, produced proof of being subjects of the United States. They do not fall under the description of persons which I intimated you in my letter of the 7th ultimo, were intended to be discharged from the king's service, and to be detained on board the prison-ship until an exchange of prisoners takes place with America.

"The note from Mr. Mead, dated the 1st September, 1810, is returned herewith, and as it appears to rely that admiral Rowley thought the circumstances under which Elijah Stirling was impressed, did not permit him to be discharged, vice-admiral Stirling does not feel himself justified in attending to the man's words on a bare assertion. The protection you allude to is not to be found among admiral Rowley's papers left at this office."

DETENTION OF MARINERS AS PRISONERS OF WAR, WHO WERE IN ENGLAND AT THE TIME THE WAR WAS DECLARED.

Extract of a letter from Robert Montgomery, consul of the United States at Alicante, dated the 4th of November, 1812, to the secretary of state.

"Herewith is a copy of a letter to admiral Hallowell with his reply. The man in question has declared under oath that he never signed any article or agreement whatever to serve on board the Indefatigable, nor any other British vessel, and he has shown his letter, losing what wages was due him."
Alicante, 23d October, 1812.

Sir,—Phillips, a mariner and citizen of the United States, as appears by a regular protection from the collector of New York, informs me that some time since he engaged to him as crew on board transport Indefatigable for six months at certain wages, and that he has now been eight months in said vessel, and demands his discharge and wages; but the master having refused both, obliges me to enquire if you will interpose yourself on the fact, and if, as the mariner states, you are led to be paid of and discharged. Pray let me to assure you, &c.

His majesty's ship Malta, in Albion Bay, 20th October, 1812.

Sir,—I find upon inquiry that there is on board the Indefatigable transport the man mentioned in your letter of the 23d. As there is no objection to that description, and as he has signed articles of agreement to serve on board the Indefatigable, I shall not molest him while he continues in her; but the moment he gets his discharge, I shall deem it my duty to take hold of him, and put him in confinement as a prisoner of war. I have the honor to be, &c.

COMPULSORY SERVICE OF CAPTURED AMERICANS ON BOARD BRITISH SHIPS OF WAR.

I, Beckman Van R Plank Hoffman, of the town of Poughkeepsie, do certify, that I am a lieutenant in the United States Navy; that I was a lieutenant on board of the Constitution frigate in the action and capture of the Guerriere; that after her surrender I was sent on board, and after taking out the crew first and blowing up the ship; that eight impressed American seamen were among the crew of the Guerriere who were liberated at Boston. I was also on board the Constitution in the action and capture of the Java, and was sent on board that vessel, and after the crew were removed set her on fire and blew her up. Amongst the crew of the Java, thirteen impressed American seamen were found, three of whom had entered the British service and were left, the others were liberated as Americans.

Richard Thompson, being sworn, saith that he is a native of New Paltz, opposite Poughkeepsie; that he sailed from Wilming-ton on a 28th of April, 1810, on board King Warren, William Killy, captain, for Cork. On the homeward passage in Sept. ult. following, he was impressed and taken on board the Peaceck, a British sloop of war, and compelled to do duty. That while on board that vessel he made many unsuccessful attempts to write to his friends, to inform them of his situation. He further saith, that after he had heard of the war, himself and two other impressed American seamen who were on board the Peaceck, went up to the captain and claimed to be considered as American prisoners of war, and refused to do duty any longer. They were ordered off the quarter-deck, and the captain called for the master at arms, and ordered us to be put in prison; we were then kept in irons about twenty-four hours, when we were taken out, brought to the gang-way, stripped of our clothes, tied and whipped, each one dozen and a half lashes, and put to duty.

He further saith that he was kept on board the Peaceck, and did duty all the action with the Homert; after the Homert hoisted American colors he and the other impressed Americans who went to the captain of the Peaceck, asked to be sent below, and it was an American ship, and that they did not wish to fight against their country. The captain ordered us to our quarters, called midshipman Stone to do his duty; and it was the bottom of our duty, to blow our brains out; "aye aye!" was answered by Stone, who then held a pistol at my breast, and ordered us to our quarters. We then continued at our posts, and were compelled to fight until the Peaceck struck; and we were liberated after an imprisonment of about two years and eight months.

James Tompkins, being sworn, saith, that he is a native of Ulster county, opposite Poughkeepsie; that he sailed out of New York, in the month of August, 1812, in the ship King Warren, bound to Ireland, and on her arrival at Cork, on the 17th of July, next, being put on board, with three or four other Americans, were taken on board the Peaceck, and John Brown was impressed and taken on board of the British ship A teon, David Smith, captain. We were taken on Saturday evening; on Monday morning we were brought to the gang-way and informed we must enter on board the ship and live as other seamen, or we should live on oarmeal and water and receive five dozen lashes. This disposition was, I think, and the other three impressed with him, did not wish to enter, and each of them were then whipped, five dozen lashes each. On Wednesday following, we were again all brought up and had the same order made to us to enter, which we refused, and we were again whipped, four dozen lashes each. On Saturday after, the like order was made to us, and on our refusal we were again whipped, three dozen lashes each. On Monday following, still refusing to enter, we were again whipped, two dozen each. On Wednesday following we were again whipped, one dozen each, and ordered to be taken below and put in irons till we did enter; and the captain said he would punish the damned Yankee rascals till they did enter. We were then put in irons; and had in irons three months. During the time of our imprisonment the ship had an action and captured a French ship. Before the action we were taken out of irons and asked to fight, but we refused; and after the action we were again ironed, where we remained till the ship arrived at London. After arriving there we first heard of the war with America, and that the Enterprise was taken. This department took his shirt, Samuel Davis and William Young took their handkerchiefs, made stripes and stars for the American colors, and hung it over a gun, and gave three cheers for the victory. The next morning at six o'clock we were brought up and whipped, two dozen lashes each, for hoisting for the Yankee flag. Shortly after this we were all released by the assistance of the American consul and captain Hall, who knew us.

This department further said, that all had protections, and showed them, and claimed to be Americans at the time they were impressed.

JAMES TOMPKINS.

Sworn before me this 17th day of April, 1813, at which time the said James Tompkins showed me his wrists, which at his request I examined, and there appeared to be marks on both of them, occasioned, as I suppose, from his having been in irons.

VIOLATION OF FLAGS OF TRUCE.

Montreal Prison, 6th May, 1813.

Sir,—I am an unfortunate American who was taken by the Indians on my way to Malden, with a flag of truce from general Harrison, on the night of the 31st January, and after a variety of indignities, too tedious to mention, I was brought here and put into the dungeon for thirty-three days, and have been up on the centre roar a week. I wish to see you, if possible, and have your advice, &c. &c. In haste, yours, &c.

SAMUEL M'KEEHAN,

Surgeon's mate 2d regt. 2d brigade Ohio militia.

Lieutenant Dudley.

Montreal Prison, 9th May, 1813.

Sir,—Yesterday Sir George's aid came and informed me that the nature of my confinement had been contrary to his orders, and colonel Leithbridge was required to restore me to my liberty. I was also informed that you and myself would probably in a few days be sent to the United States. Colonel Leithbridge told me he would send for me at three o'clock, and take my parole. In less than one hour, major Shackleton called and said, the governor, after mature consideration, had concluded he could not let me have my liberty until he would hear from general Proctor.

Two or three days after my imprisonment, major Shackleton told me that general Proctor had promised, with the next despatches, to send on all the papers relating to my case, and that then I would have a hearing.

So you may see punishment by torture is not yet abolished. If they had drove a dagger through my heart my punishment would have been much less and their compassion much greater.

Yours, &c.

SAMUEL M'KEEHAN.

Major Shackleton also told me that colonel Baynes was authorized to tell me what he did.

S. M'K.

Lieutenant Dudley.

Montreal Goal, May 12, 1813.

Sir,—I am requested by Dr. M'Keehan to inform you of his present unpleasant situation. He is at this time so unwell as to be confined to his bed, and has no chance of getting any thing to make him comfortable. No person attends here to examine our situation, neither have we a chance to send out after any necessaries that we want.

I am confident the doctor's case requires some very speedy aid, particularly as it respects his confined situation, lodgings, &c.

Yours, respectfully,

GEORGE H. RODGERS, United States army.

Lieutenant Dudley.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY MAJOR-GENERAL DEARBORN.

Sir,—Without introduction or apology I beg leave to state to your excellency, that on the 31st of January last, I was ordered by general Harrison to proceed to the river Raisin with a flag of truce. I was required in my instructions, if I met no British officer at the place to proceed to Malden (two great danger did not appear from the savages.) The same evening, thirty-three miles from the river Raisin, the Indians fired upon us and killed Dr. Leimont, (one of my attendants) wounded myself in the foot, then conveyed me to captain Elliot, who took me to the river Raisin, and from thence sent me to general Proctor, at head-quarters in Sandwiche, who swore, by God, that the flag and papers which I gave him was only a pretence to cover a dishonorable service. I rebutted his insinuations as moderately as my indignant feelings would permit. General Proctor made several observations on general Harrison's abilities as a commander; said he was used to fight Indians, but not British troops, &c. He kept my instructions; did not even inform the senior officer, ensign Baker, of the American prisoners, that he had a letter for him. I was ordered to a tavern to meet the case of a French sergeant. I waited till the 4th of February before I wrote to general Proctor, demanding in what character I was considered; how long I would be detained, and the cause of my detention.

The next day the general's aid informed me I was recognized as Burgoyne's mate, and would attend with Dr. Brown in the American wounded prisoners. On the 12th I received a letter from general Proctor, in answer to one I had written to him the day before, of which the following is a copy:

Montreal, 12th Feb. 1813.

Sir,—In answer to your letter of the 11th instant, I am directed by colonel Proctor, commanding, to observe, that you were sent in for the purpose of attending on the sick and wounded of general Winchester's army, for which purpose you are now detained; and beg leave further to observe, that in the execution of your duty you will render a most important service to your country.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. W. M'FARIN, A. D. C.

I continued to attend the wounded until the 2d of March, when A. D. C. M'FARIN, informed me that I was accused of carrying on a private correspondence, and that he was ordered to take me in custody and secure my papers; which was accordingly done in the most brutal manner. On the 5th of March I was taken by a guard to fort George, without trial or hearing, although I had written to general Proctor repeatedly, requesting an investigation, to which I received no answer of any kind. From fort George I was sent to Montreal and hurried on night and day, although totally exhausted (having been robbed and stripped by the Indians) and the weather very cold. On my arrival at Montreal, I was, without being asked any questions or permitted to ask any myself, put into a dungeon eight or ten feet below the surface of the ground, in dark and solitary confinement, and there kept thirty-three days, after which time I was put up with the American prisoners.

A few days after my elevation, lieutenant Dudley became acquainted with my situation, and made such representations to governor Prevost as induced his excellency to send his aid, colonel Baynes, who said he was directed by the governor to inform me that the outrage which had been committed on my person was contrary to his orders, and told colonel Leithbridge to take my parole and liberate me immediately. The colonel not having returned for writing at hand, said he would send for me at three o'clock. In less than an hour, the town-major came and informed me, that the governor, on mature consideration, thought he could not liberate me until he got despatches from general Proctor. On the 17th of May, eight or ten days after, I was taken from prison, and in company with lieutenant Dudley, sent to the United States. I may here observe, that the apartment in which I was confined did not contain either chair, bench or stool, or bedding whatever, for the space of two weeks. Fresh beef was furnished, but not salt. I was denied pen, ink and paper, and treated universally with the utmost contempt by the sergeant, whom I had the honor of seeing every day for a few minutes. By the request of fourteen American prisoners, now in Montreal jail, whose names are appended annexed, I beg leave to state to your excellency, that they are kept in close confinement, sometimes half a day without water, and frequently two or three days without wood to cook with; and when they complained the jailer's curs were freely lavished upon them. They have not the privilege of procuring some little necessaries, which the benevolence of some humane persons enabled them to do by giving them a little money. Sir George Prevost has told them that their confinement is owing to the bad faith of their own government, &c.

I would have stated to your excellency the knowledge I had, through the report of others, of the outrages and cruelties exercised on the American prisoners taken at general Winchester's defeat, but must refer your excellency to Mr. Rotland, who had a command in the Michigan militia last summer, and who was, after being dispossessed of all his property, sent to fort George with me, who no doubt had many opportunities of hearing such things triumphantly spoken of among British officers and subjects.

I have the honor to be, &c.

RANSOM OF AMERICAN PRISONERS FROM INDIANS IN THE BRITISH SERVICE.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Woodward to the secretary of state.

Albany, March 22, 1813.

"A few days previous to the thirty-first of January, 1813, I transmitted some letters addressed to the friends and families of a few of the prisoners whom we had been able to ransom out of the hands of the savages.

"On the thirty-first day of January I addressed you a letter covering similar information for twelve other families."

Imperial Parliament.

Horse of Lords, July 22.—This being the last day of the session, his royal highness the prince regent came down to the house in great state, for the purpose of proroguing parliament with a speech from the throne. The side benches were occupied by a large assemblage of ladies of the first distinction: among the numerous spectators were the Russian, Spanish and Portuguese ambassadors. The commons having appeared at the bar, his royal highness delivered from the throne the following speech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I cannot release you from your attendance in parliament, without repeating the expression of my deep regret of the continuance of his majesty's lamented indisposition.

The attention which you have paid to the public interests in the course of the season, demands my warmest acknowledgments.

The splendid and signal success which has attended the commencement of the campaign in the Peninsula;—the consummate skill and ability displayed by field-marshal the marquis of Wellington, in the progress of these operations which have led to the great and decisive victory obtained near Vittoria; and the valor and intrepidity by which his majesty's forces, and those of his allies, have been distinguished, are as highly gratifying to my feelings as they have been to those of the whole nation. Whilst these operations have added new lustre to the British arms, they afford the best prospect of the deliverance of the Peninsula from the tyranny and oppression of France, and they furnish the most decisive proof of the wisdom of that policy which has induced you, under every vicissitude of fortune, to persevere in the support of this glorious contest.

The entire failure of the French ruler in his designs against the Russian empire, and the destruction of the French army employed on that service, were followed by the advance of the Russian forces, since joined by those of Prussia, to the banks of the Elbe. And though upon the renewal of the contest the allied armies have found themselves obliged to retreat before the superior numbers collected by the enemy, their conduct during a series of severe and sanguinary conflicts, has nobly upheld their military character, and commanded the admiration of Europe.

I have great satisfaction in acquainting you, that there exists between me and the courts of St. Petersburg, Berlin and Stockholm, the most cordial union and concert, and I trust I shall be enabled, by the aids which you have so liberally afforded, to render this union effectual for the accomplishment of the great purpose for which it has been established.

I regret the continuance of the war with the U. States of America.

My desire to re-establish between the two countries those friendly relations so important to their mutual interests, continues unabated; but I cannot consent to purchase the restoration of peace by any sacrifice of the maritime rights of the British empire.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I thank you for the liberal provision you have made for the services of the present year. It is a great satisfaction to me to reflect, that by the regulations you have adopted for the redemption of the national debt, you have established a system which will not retard its ultimate liquidation; whilst at the same time it provides for the vigorous prosecution of the war, with the least practicable addition of the public burthens.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I entirely approve of the arrangements which you have made for the government of the British territories in India, and for the regulation of the British ommerce in that part of the world. They appear to have been wisely framed with a view to the circumstances which have occurred since this subject was last under the consideration of parliament. By these arrangements you have preserved in its essential parts that system of government which experience has proved to be not less calculated to provide for the happiness of the inhabitants of India, than to promote the interests of Great Britain; and you have judiciously extended to the subjects of the united kingdom in general a participation in the commerce of countries within the limits of the East-India company's charter, which will, I doubt not, have the effect of augmenting the resources of India, and of increasing and improving the trade and navigation of his majesty's dominions.

The tried and affectionate loyalty of his majesty's people, the constancy which they have displayed during this long and arduous war, and the patience with which they have sustained the burdens necessarily imposed upon them, have made an indelible impression on my mind. Such continued and persevering exertions, under so severe a pressure, afford the strongest proof of their attachment to that constitution, which it is the first object of my life to maintain.

In the success which has recently attended his majesty's arms, I acknowledge with devout gratitude the hand of Divine Providence, the use I desire to make of these and on all other advantages, is to promote and secure the welfare of his majesty's people; and I cannot more decidedly evince this disposition than by employing the powerful means you have placed in my hands, in such a manner as may be best calculated to reduce the extravagant pretensions of the enemy, and thereby to facilitate the attainment, in conjunction with my allies, of a secure and honorable peace.

Then the lord chancellor, by the prince regent's command, said—

My Lords and Gentlemen,

It is the command of his royal highness the prince regent, acting in the name and on behalf of his majesty, that this parliament be prorogued to Monday the 23d day of August next, to be then here holden; and this parliament is accordingly prorogued to Monday the 23d day of August next.

Law Case.—British Decision.

At Halifax, August 2, 1813, in the case of a licensed vessel.—Important and interesting.

THE ORION.—JUDIN.

For the captors—The king's advocate.

For the claimant—The solicitor general.

Dr. Croke.

As this is the first case which has arisen on the American blockades, I felt it to be my duty to give it the fullest consideration. I have examined scrupulously all its circumstances, I have weighed attentively the arguments which have been advanced by the counsel on both sides—I have searched out and carefully applied to the present case, all the former decisions of the higher courts which I conceived to have any bearing or relation to it; and I have now to make known to the suitors in this court the result of my enquiries.

The facts in this case are few and undisputed.—The vessel having on board a cargo of flour and Indian meal, sailed from New-York on the 15th May, 1813, bound to Lisbon, under a licence from the British secretary of state, bearing date upon the 11th September, 1812, and which was comprised in these words:

To all commanders of H. M. ships of war and privateers, and all others whom it may concern, Greeting:

I the undersigned, one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, in pursuance of the authority given to me by his majesty, by order of council, under and by virtue of powers given to his majesty by an act passed in the 48th year of his majesty's reign, entitled, "An act to permit goods, secured in warehouses in the port of London to be removed to the outports for exportation to any port of Europe, for empowering his majesty to direct that licenses which his majesty is authorised to make under his sign manual, may be granted by one of the principal secretaries of states, and for enabling his majesty to permit the exportation of goods in vessels of less burthen than are now allowed by law, during the present hostilities, and until one month after signature of the preliminary articles of peace," and in pursuance of an order of council heretofore annexed, I do hereby grant this license for the purposes set forth in the said order in council, to Cropper, Benson, & Co. and others, and do hereby permit a vessel being unarmed, and not less than one hundred tons burthen, and bearing any flag except that of France, or except a vessel belonging to France, or to the subjects thereof, or to the subjects of any territory, town or place annexed to, or forming a part of France, to import into the port of Lisbon, from any port in the United States of America, a cargo of rice, grain, meal or flour, without any molestation on account of any hostilities that may exist between his majesty and the said United States of America, notwithstanding the said cargo and ship aforesaid may be the property of any citizen or inhabitant of the said states or to whomsoever the said property may belong, and that the master of the said vessel shall be permitted to receive his freight, and return with his vessel and crew to any port not blockaded, upon condition that the name and tonnage of the vessel, and the name of the master of the said vessel shall be endorsed on the license at the time of the vessel's clearance from her port of lading.

This license to remain in force for nine months from the date hereof.

Given at Whitehall the 11th September, 1812, in the 52d year of his majesty's reign.

SIDMOUTH.

It is admitted by the captors that the license is good in itself, and that the terms of it have been complied with, but it is alleged by them that the vessel and cargo are still liable to condemnation notwithstanding the license, for having broke the blockade of New-York.

There are two points therefore for consideration. The first is a question of fact, whether New-York was blockaded at the time the vessel sailed from thence. The second is a question of law, whether, supposing the blockade to be established, the license can protect the vessel from the consequences of coming out of that port during its continuance.

The master has sworn roundly "that he had no knowledge of the blockade." But there is full proof that the notification of it, which was made by lord Castlereagh by the authority of the prince regent upon the 20th March, was at that time known at New-York. It is contained at full length in the Evening Post, a newspaper published in that city, of the 6th May, and consequently nine days before the vessel sailed; and it is morally impossible that the information of so important a nature to the mercantile inhabitants should not have been universal intercommunicated amongst them.

It has been argued by the captors that the notification alone establishes a blockade. That being a public act, and proceeding from so high an authority nothing more is required, and that it would constitute to all intents and purposes a blockade even if there were not a single vessel off the port—that the cases from which the contrary might be inferred were cases of notification from the commanders in chief, and not by the public authority of the sovereign, and that in the blockade of the French coast it was never required that there should be any vessels stationed off the ports—that even if it were necessary to prove the fact of the ports being actually blockaded by ships of war, the capture of this and many other vessels are sufficient evidence of it.

It has always been held by the British courts of prize that to constitute a blockade two things were required, that the ports in question should be invested by a force adequate to the purpose of preventing egress and ingress without imminent danger of capture, and that notice should be given of it to all the parties who were legally affected by it. The actual investment is absolutely essential to constitute this state, and as early as the West-India cases it was decided by the court of appeals, "that a declaration unsupported by the fact will not be sufficient to establish a blockade." In this respect there is no difference whatever between a public, and the most private notification. The object of both is the same, merely to inform the party who is to be charged with the breach of a blockade, that a blockade exists. A notification given by a commander, is as much under the authority of the sovereign as if it were an act immediately proceeding from him, because commanders derive from him the power of blockading such ports as they may judge proper. The most formal and diplomatic notification between governments is only meant for the information of individuals. Public notifications made to the government of a country will affect the inhabitants of that country with the knowledge of it after a certain time, as a presumption juris et de jure, because it is the duty of governments to communicate it to all their subjects, but, whenever it can be proved that any individuals are acquainted with the existence of the blockade by any other means, the consequences will be to them the same. But under all modes of notification it is absolutely necessary that there should be the fact of actual investment, without which no notification is effectual.

What has been called the blockade of the French coasts, by the well known order of the 26th of April, forms no exception to the principles maintained upon this subject by the British nation. That was a measure perfectly different from a blockade. It did not profess to be a blockade, but on the other hand the orders were "that those ports should be subject to the same restrictions as if the same were actually blockaded by his majesty's naval forces in the most strict and rigorous manner." The word blockade was introduced not as a definition of the measure itself but by way of explanation of the mode in which it was to be executed; in the manner of an actual blockade. No investment was even supposed to take place, because it was impossible that there could be an investment to the whole extent of the coast affected by the order. It was not therefore a blockade, but it was a retaliatory measure to counteract the effects of an unjust and unlawful attempt to run this country by cutting off its resources. It was not directed against particular ports, but against the enemy's trade universally. It was a total prohibition of all commerce with the enemy, as he had prohibited all commerce with Great Britain, and it would have been ineffectual and futile if it had not comprehended all the dominions of France, and it had been limited within the legal boundaries of a blockade. As none of the rules of law relating to blockades were therefore applicable to those orders which militated against their designs, so no inference can be drawn from thence, that the laws of blockade, before admitted in the British courts, have been in any manner altered or deviated from.

There is no necessity therefore to imagine with the counsel for the claimant, that those orders have been abandoned by the British government either in fact or in principle—They never have been in fact annulled. The supposed repeal was merely provisional and the conditions not having been complied with by the American government, they are still in force, as has been decided in this court in some recent cases.* They can never be abandoned in principle till this proposition is admitted to be true, that “it is the duty of a nation to submit to the annihilation of its commerce and resources, when it is attempted by its enemy, with a view to its final subjugation and destruction, without an effort of struggle or resistance, because that resistance may be some inconvenience to a third country.” Our enemies, both open, and in disguise, naturally are vehement in their outcries against the orders in council, because they have proved too successful in defeating their malevolent designs, but, as long as the right of self-defence shall continue to be the first law of nature and of nations, so long will those retaliating and defensive measures rest upon the solid foundation of eternal truth and justice.

It is necessary then to establish in this case besides a notification brought home to the knowledge of the parties, which has been sufficiently proved, that a blockade de facto existed. It is indeed to be supposed from the notification itself, that orders would be given to carry the intended blockade into effect. Yet this is not so conclusive as to carry it with a presumption that it has been actually done. It was argued by the captor’s counsel, that even if the high officer who has the supreme command on this side the Atlantic should refuse to execute the order, that the court would be bound to execute it, and to enforce the law. But this is not the true state of the case. If it were possible that an officer should be guilty of a great breach of duty in not observing orders sent to him by government, still though he might be personally responsible for the neglect, yet that would not supply the want of the fact that a real blockade had taken place. It has been held in the high court of admiralty,† that even where there was an actual investment, if any of the blockading ships have not enforced it, that the blockade is so far “virtually relaxed.” There is no evidence that the port of New-York has ever yet been in a state of blockade. It is not known as a matter of notoriety, or from the capture of vessels. There is no special evidence of it afforded by this case. No vessels were seen off the port. The capture was made in the latitude 40 degrees, and in the longitude of 70 degrees and 20 minutes, by the prize-master’s affidavit, at the distance therefore of nearly one hundred and fifty miles from New-York. There is no circumstance therefore to lead us to a conclusion that the port of New-York was in a state of blockade. Where the existence of a blockade has been generally known and continued for some time, and by public notification, it is presumed prima facie to continue till it is revoked. In such cases when a blockade has really existed it has been held to be incumbent on the party alleging the relaxations to prove it. But in the present instance where it is not known that any blockade has ever commenced, I think it fair that the party who is to have the benefit of the blockade should establish it by evidence. If the case therefore depends upon that fact, I should direct the captors to bring further proof of it, and should allow the claimants at the same time to bring such other evidence as they may judge proper on the point.

This however will be unnecessary if it should be found that, notwithstanding a blockade, this ship and cargo were protected by the license, which brings me to the consideration of the second point in the case. This license is dated on the 11th September, 1812, and the questioning is whether it is annulled by the subsequent order for blockading the port of New-York, as far as that, or other blockaded ports are concerned, or, in other words, whether, under a license to import goods from any port in the United States, they can be expected from a blockaded port in that country. I have examined all the cases to be found which at all relate to this question. A recent case that of the Byfield, Forster,* was the case of a vessel which was said to have had a license granted to certain British merchants, permitted a vessel to proceed from any port in the Baltic to any port in the united kingdom.

The vessel went into Copenhagen, then blockaded, and came out with her cargo, with which she was sailing to Liverpool when she was captured. It was laid down most strongly by sir William Scott, that “a license expressed in general terms, to authorise a ship to sail from any port with a cargo, will not authorise her to sail from a blockaded port with a cargo taken in there; to exempt a blockaded port from the restrictions incident to a state of blockade, it must be especially designated with such an exemption in the license; otherwise a blockaded port shall be taken as an exception to the general description in the license.” Nothing can be laid down more forcibly and generally than this doctrine. Yet it seems that there may be exceptions to it. In the Huffling, Berens,‡ without any such express exemption in the license, where it had been granted on the same day when the notification stated the blockade to commence, the learned judge “laid all question of blockade out of the case, for he thought himself bound to presume that it was intended the parties should have the full benefit of importing the articles without molestation from a blockade which could not be unknown to the great personage under whose authority the license was issued.”

Another ground of exemption was taken and admitted in the same case, for the judge concluded that since “the blockade was not considered as a ground for withholding these licenses, he was led to suppose, that it was not intended to have the effect of suspending such as had already been granted.”

In the case first cited, where the general doctrine was laid down so universally, but which must be understood with some little reference to the particular case in which it was stated, it was said that “as the vessel was lying at Christiansund, an open port at the time when the license bore date, and when there was no intention manifested of going to Copenhagen, the license could not be of a nature to prohibit the purchase of a cargo there, a transaction which was not in contemplation when the application was made,” still referring for an explanation of the license to the intention of government. It may then from these three instances be fairly inferred, as the judicial opinion of that great man, that notwithstanding there are no express provisions in a license or a blockading order to that effect, yet wherever it appears to have been the intention of his majesty, or of those who exercise his authority, that the permission given by a license should not be suspended by an order of blockade, that it is not affected by the blockades.

But before I consider the application of these principles to the present case, it must be observed that there is in limine a very material distinction between them. All those cases were of licenses granted to British subjects or neutrals, and the blockades were of ports belonging to third nations our enemies.—This is the case of a license granted to the enemy, and the blockade is of his own ports. These are such material circumstances, that the other cases cannot in any manner be considered as directly applicable to the present.

For the truth is, that a blockade is not a measure which legally affects the enemy at all, it operates in point of law only upon neutrals, upon them it has a real legal effect; it gives new rights to the blockaders. Without it neutrals might trade in safety to the port. It is the blockade alone which creates the right of capturing their vessels. But the vessels and the other property of the enemy would be equally liable to be captured and condemned, although a single blockade should never be established. It is indeed a disposal of naval forces which renders the capture of his property more easy to the blockading ships, and which distresses him by excluding neutrals, but this is all. As to the enemy's property, the blockaders acquire no new right by it. Before a blockade is established they can seize and confiscate the enemy's property, wherever they find it, and during a blockade they can do no more. It affects the enemy de facto and not de jure. That a blockade affects merely neutrals, is evident from the form of notification. This is conceived always nearly in the same words. It is signified to the ministers of neutral powers, and it informs them, "that measures will be adopted, which are authorised by the law of nations and the respective treaties between his majesty and the different neutral powers." The instructions to the blockading vessels, by which the blockade is established, are to stop all neutral vessels destined to or coming "out of the respective ports." No notification is made to the enemy, no instructions are given relative to the capture of his property, because it requires no special directions. Since then no orders are given to the blockaders respecting his property, it is left precisely as it was before the blockade; that is, liable to be captured generally, unless where it is protected by orders from the British government, or other peculiar circumstances. Since the orders to the blockading ships specify, and relate only to neutral vessels, they cannot authorize the capture of enemy's vessels, though protected by a license, which are not neutral vessels, although to ascertain their general rights and duties, they have sometimes been considered in that light, in the way of analogy, and of a partial similitude, which does not hold good in every respect, but which might be estimated from the nature and object of the special protection granted, and of the document by which it is conferred. Since a blockade creates no right of capturing enemy's property which did not before exist, if this general right of capturing his property has been suspended by a license, I do not see how it can be revived or renewed by a blockade, or how the cruisers can acquire from the blockade a right to capture the enemy's property in a case where that right had been superseded by the act of his own government.

Neither does the object of the present blockade at all interfere with that of the license, but on the contrary they are independent of each other, and both consistent. That of the blockade is to distress the trade of the enemy, but the design of the license is not to assist the trade of the enemy, or for the accommodation of any of the merchants of that country, but to relieve our own wants, and to promote an important and interesting service. It was an object with the British government to victual our troops in Spain, that object is not affected by the blockade. It is equally necessary that the soldiers should be fed whether New-York is blockaded or not.

Adopting from British and neutral cases the principle that the effect of licenses is to be deduced from the intentions of the British government, as far as it can be ascertained from circumstances, let us endeavor to discover what must have been its intention with respect to these licenses. I have just observed that the object of them was for the benefit of the British military service. The armies employed in the cause of liberty were starving in Spain. Most of the ports of Europe were shut against British vessels. It was necessary to have recourse to the United States, as long as those necessities continued which these licenses were intended to remedy, it must be supposed to be the intention of government that the supply should be continued. The existence of these licenses themselves, unexpired and unrevoked, is prima facie presumptive evidence that those articles are still wanted, till that presumption is overruled by a declaration to the contrary. In the next place, though the license is general and extends to any port in America, yet in fact the blockaded ports of the Chesapeake, and the other southern ports of America, are the only ports from which flour and grain can be expected. The northern countries of the United States do not grow enough for their own consumption, and are supplied from the southern ports. If government wishes therefore to be supplied at all, it is only from the blockaded ports that it can receive the supply.

Some evidence of their intention may be deduced from the form of the licence. It says that "these articles may be imported from any port in the United States without molestation on account of any hostilities which may exist between his majesty and the United States of America." It might not be overstraining the expression to interpret the words "any hostilities" to mean, "notwithstanding any mode of hostilities which Great Britain may think proper to employ whether by blockade or otherwise." It is true that the blockade was not established till many months after the date of the license, but it was not improbably in the contemplation of the British government. To carry on the war against that country by blockading their ports, has always been a favorite idea. Something of the consideration of blockade must have been present to the mind of those who drew up this order in council, because it is thus mentioned—"The master of the said vessel shall be permitted to receive his freight and return with his vessel and crew to any port not blockaded." It seems to have been understood and intended, that the license could and should protect the master against breaking a blockade, or why else would it have been thought necessary to prohibit his return to a blockaded port? Understanding the licenses then to have been a protection from the penalties of blockade breaking, though they do not forbid coming out of and exporting the articles described, from a blockaded port, it is a fair conclusion then that this was not intended to be prohibited. The reason of the distinction, as it is to be deduced from the present existing circumstances, and which were probably foreseen when the license was granted, on the grounds which I have just stated is evident. It was only by coming out of a blockaded port that the license would be executed, and its object accomplished, because the provisions to be imported to Lisbon could only there be procured.

It may reasonably be doubted whether by a license of this nature a kind of vested interest is not conferred upon the grantee, of which he cannot be deprived capriciously, at the mere will of the granting nation, or at least, whether he can be dispossessed of it without an express declaration of the government by which it was granted. Since it is a privilege which is to protect the property of the enemy, and for the benefit of the country which grants it, not only the interest but the good faith and honor of the country are implicated and pledged to respect them. They ought not to be revoked without full and timely notice. Adverse considerations ought not to be pressed too rigorously against them, but they should be supported by the most liberal interpretation. In case of doubt, the balance should incline in their favor; it is a contract for the benefit of one party, in which the British government says in fact—"If you will import provisions to the army in Portugal, we will protect your vessels from capture; when the Americans are performing their part of the contract, it would be a trap to turn round upon them and tell them that the protection is withdrawn, without any previous notice having been explicitly given to that effect. In point of prudence, by allowing the validity of these licenses, little mischief can be done. As they were limited to nine months, they now have nearly all expired, since it is understood that none have been issued since the beginning of October.—The object of the blockade will not be defeated by allowing them. The departure of half a dozen flour ships will not materially relieve the distressed commerce of the United States, but the intercepting of them may be injurious to the British service in the peninsula, and may be considered as not very creditable to the liberality and good faith of Great Britain. By restoring this property, therefore, I conceive that this court will but maintain the justice, the honor, and the policy of the country.

Such is the view which I have been enabled to take of this subject. It were to be wished that public documents upon which the important interests of many individuals depend, should be clear and definite in their language, that nothing should be left to supposition, and that either in the license it should have been explicitly stated, that the exportation might or might not be made from a blockaded port, or that in the order for the blockade, it should have been declared whether it was to extend to licensed vessels. If this had been done we should not have been driven to the necessity of divining meanings and intentions. Parties, including captors and claimants, commanders and merchants, would not be placed in a state of doubt and anxiety, and this court would be relieved from the painful duty, too often imposed upon it, of making its way amongst various difficulties, and opposite obligations, frequently with no other guide than probability and conjecture. If the parties are not satisfied with the decision of this court, it is competent to them to apply to a superior tribunal, where the instructions and objects of his majesty's government are known a priori, and not left to be determined by hazard and distant reasoning.

The United States Loan.

[As a counterpart to the article in our last, headed "The British Loan," see page 63, we designed to offer a similar statement regarding the loans of the U. S. and had made some progress to execute it, when the following presented itself in the Aurora—and we extract it pleasure, as being the very thing we wanted.

But to aid a just comparison of the state of our finances with the boasted resources of our enemy, we must recollect that 6 per cent. is the lowest rate of interest ever paid for money in the United States, and that, from the multitude of monied institutions, such as banks and insurance companies, &c. &c. that have continually presented themselves to the capitalist, that money has been considered as really and fairly worth eight per cent. which, indeed, was paid for the loan in the year 1803, of only 5 millions, and tardily filled at that rate. These facts, with the article inserted below from the National Intelligencer, affords us an honest view of the case, on which we cannot refuse to congratulate the friends of "Free trade and sailors rights.]"

In conversation with some of my neighbors a few evenings since, I found a difference of opinion prevailing as to what the late loan to government, of sixteen millions of dollars cost the United States. It seemed to be a prevailing opinion that the public pay somewhere above 7 1-2 per cent. per annum, which appears to me not to be the case. My opinion is that the loan costs the public $6 83 per cent. per annum, and no more.

The opinion that the loan costs above 7 1-2 per cent. is, as I understand, in this way. That the subscription being made at 88 per cent. the lender receiving $6 yearly for 88 paid, has $6 81 per cent. for his money:—and further, he is to receive at the end of thirteen years $100, which being twelve more than he has paid, those twelve dollars being divided among the thirteen years, makes the actual interest $7 74. It does not seem to be recollected that twelve dollars paid thirteen years hence is worth but $5 61; the interest of which being added to $6 81, as above, makes $7 15: nor does it seem to be recollected that government do not promise payment of the principal at the end of thirteen years—their promise is not to pay before that time. And if it should so happen that the principal shall not be paid before the end of twenty-six years, those twelve dollars cannot be called more than $2 52, at the time of subscribing. Therefore this mode of calculation, wanting certainty, as to the duration of the loan, is liable to error. There is, however, no occasion to make the calculation on any uncertainty.

The loan was subscribed for at the rate of 88 specie dollars for $100 in six per cent. stock, payable at the pleasure of the government, after the end of thirteen years. Therefore the subscriber, upon payment of $100 in specie, receives a certificate of 6 per cent. stock for $113 63, because

As $100—in specie,
Is to $100—in 6 per cent. stock,
So is $100—in specie
To $113 63—in 6 per cent. stock.

But, in order to show the utmost the government pay, it will be remembered that a 1-4 per cent. was allowed to the persons who collected the subscription—which will make some small difference, because

As $99 75—the sum paid, deducting the 1-4 per cent.
Is to $113 63—the amount of the capital received
So is $100—in specie
To $113 92—the real sum of 6 per cent. stock received for a subscription of $100. Therefore, the loan cost the subscribers, not exactly $88, but $67 78 only, because

As $113 63—the amount of the certificate received
Is to $99 75—the actual specie paid
So is $100 —6 per cent. stock
To $ 87 78—the actual sum in specie paid for $100—6 per cent. stock.

Hence it follows that the interest paid by the public is 6 per cent. on $113 92—which is $6 83.

As there is no stipulation on the part of government, when the principal is to be paid, whether in thirteen or any other number of years, the true calculation is, that the lender receives an annuity of $6 83 forever. Because whenever the principal shall be paid, the government parts with just so much money as will (money at 6 per cent.) procure that sum annually forever.

If John is indebted to Richard $100, and pays him, John, by the payment, parts with $6 per year forever. So the government, upon payment of the principal, be it when it may, will part with $6 83 per cent. per annum forever, of consequence $6 83 is the true cost of the loan.

The amount of the whole loan is	$16,000,000
Deduct for 1-4 per cent. paid for commissions	40,000

The sum received by government is	$15,960,000
-----------------------------------	--------------

The sum of 6 per cent. stock issued for this $15,960,000 is	$18,181,817 60
--	-----------------

The interest of which is,	1,090,909 05
---------------------------	--------------

Then,
As $15,960,000—the sum received by the government in specie,

Is to $ 1,090,909 05—the annual interest to be paid on the whole amount of the 6 per cent stock issued,

So is $100—specie

To $ 6 83—the interest, per cent. per annum, as before.

Until this principal sum shall be paid, the above interest will be paid—when the principal is paid, the interest of course, will cease, but the government having parted with so much principal, thereby virtually continues the payment of that interest.

No notice is here taken of the interest being payable quarter yearly—this is some additional advantage to the receiver, but is no disadvantage to the public, as it is not to be doubted, but that, if it were not paid, the money would lay idle in the bank. P.

The loan of $7,500,000.—It is pleasant to observe that the government can obtain as much money as it wants to carry on the war for "free trade and sail-or's rights." The following is from the National Intelligencer of Tuesday last,

"On Saturday last, being the day fixed for receiving proposals for the loan of 7,500,000 dollars, authorized by an act of the last session of congress, proposals for more than twelve millions and a half of dollars were offered to the secretary of the treasury. The loan was taken at 88 dollars 25 cents in money for 100 dollars in stock bearing an interest of 6 per cent. The privilege of prompt payment for the latter instalments not being given to the lenders in this loan, a measure which subjects the treasury to pay interest on the money before it is wanted, the terms are one per cent. better to the government, than those on which the loan of sixteen millions was contracted for six months since."

The brig Dispatch, (rescued some time ago by certain citizens of Boston, from the possession of a

The United States brig Enterprize was formerly a schooner, and is the same vessel with which lieutenant Sterrett, in August, 1801, captured, without loss of a man, the Tripolitan ship of war, Tripoli, of 14 guns and 85 men, 50 of whom were killed and wounded.

Blockade of the American coast.—A London paper of Aug. 9, says—"On the 28th of April, an explanatory letter was written from the admiralty to sir John B. Warren, in which he was told, "That their lordships expect, and direct him to maintain a blockade de facto of every part of the United States of America, to which his force may be adequate."

There was a general illumination in Philadelphia, on the evening of the 24th ult. by recommendation of the mayor; "such expressions of joy being prohibited by law," without his permission. Many of the public buildings in New York, were illuminated in great style. The bells were rung, and salutes fired from all the forts, from the navy-yard and the flotilla. Such demonstrations of joy have been exhibited in almost every town and village we have heard from.

At a district court to be held in Termon, at Rutland, on the 10th inst. no less than forty three cases are to be tried for a violation of the laws of the U. States, in the import of goods or export of provisions, to and from Canada!—It is highly honorable to the officers of the United States that such vigilance exists, and we hope it may check the treasons of the "well-inclined."

Messrs. Gallatin and Bayard have arrived at St. Petersburg—not having landed at the most convenient port to "proceed to Prague" as the "British writers in America" said they would.

Original anecdote.—At a late electioneering meeting in Maryland, one of the candidates, among other arguments to point out the inutility of the war and persuade the people to "peace," observed we were fighting for a thing we should never obtain; for Lord—somebody had declared that rather than give up the "right of impressment," they would "nail the flag to the mast and sink with it." On which a rustic wit, one of the crowd, requested aloud, that the orator would inform them if THE BOXEN'S COLORS WERE NOT SAILED? This ended the harangue.

London, Aug. 13.—In consequence of the great difficulty that has been experienced in completing the crews of the frigates now at Chatham and Sheerness, orders were given to disarm the Christian the VII. and to dispose of her crew. That vessel will be re-equipped as speedily as possible. We cannot omit relating this fact, although the conclusion to be drawn from it is very unfavorable to ourselves. Such measures were not necessary, when he had the ability of procuring seamen from the Mediterranean, the Adriatic, the Baltic, the United States, and even from the coast of France. We plainly perceive the disadvantageous effects of the perseverance of France in the continental system.

MILITARY.

From the northern armies, and the squadron on Ontario, we have little positive information since our last. We know nothing of what has been done at Fort George or Sackett's Harbor, as to military affairs. This augurs well in favor of the discipline of the troops. Of Chauncey and his fleet we have had a multitude of rumors. One account says that he returned to Sackett's Harbor on the 18th; but we rather believe he has not relaxed the blockade of sir James Hampton with his whole force, moved from Cumberland Head on the 19th inst. entered the enemy's country on the 20th, routed his pickets, drove in his advanced corps, and marched for the west; supposed to be hastening to Sackett's Harbor. Com. McDonough, has resumed the command of lake Champlain, and has blocked up the British fleet. The shores and frontier are lined by the New-York militia.

About 150 or 200 Indian warriors of the Oneida and Stockbridge tribes, for fort George, passed through Canandaigua between the 14th and 21st ult.

The New York militia, called out by the late requisition, have proceeded with great alacrity to the lines. About 800 men, artillery, infantry and riflemen, in full uniform, were reviewed by governor Tombkins, at Waterford, on Saturday the 18th ult. and highly complimented by him for their good conduct and soldier-like appearance. We hope and believe the time is close at hand when the patriotic people of this state will be relieved from the harassment incidental to their frontier situation, by the expulsion of the enemy for all the parts adjacent.

A brigade of New-York militia, 3000 strong, was collecting at Canandaigua, Sept. 14—267 light dragoons from Fort George had also arrived there; destination unknown.

It is stated that many deserters from the enemy come into Fort George daily; it is also reported the Indians have chiefly left the army in that neighborhood, supposed for Malden.

The term of service of the first requisition of the Connecticut militia, doing duty at New-London having expired on the 16th, they marched from the encampment, and paraded through the town and were dismissed with the entire approbation of the commanding officer. Indeed, they appear to have performed their duty in a manner highly honorable to themselves and their country. A delightful trait of character in their officers must not be forgotten.—By some new arrangement in the pay-master's department of the district being contemplated, the men could not be paid at the moment of dismissal—the officers, therefore, stepped forward, and with great liberality, made up a considerable part of the monies due to the privates, and divided it equally among them.

Bug. gen. Williams has reached Washington city from Fort George, "under orders for the 6th military district." He furnishes the most pleasant information of the state of the troops at that place, in high discipline, full of ardor and impatient for business, and completely divested of party, either of a political or individual character. Wilkinson was received with the best possible good disposition.

Two British officers made their escape from the United States cantonment at Pittsfield (Mass.) a few days ago, by the usual "influence," in bribing the centinels. Their names are William Kent and Alexander Graig—100 dollars reward are offered for each of them. Another officer, a prisoner, who "some how or other," had enjoyed an extensive range, and was treated with dinners and suppers in the highest style in several parts of the country, has left his ears at a pillory for forgery; and has since been put into close confinement.

A London paper of July 31, says "By the convoy which is now assembling at Spithead, detachments will be sent for every English regiment now in North America. Officers will also be sent for the Canada militia, with a great quantity of naval and military stores."

THE CREEK INDIANS.—The friends of humanity have manifold cause to regret the horrid tale that follows, communicated in a letter from St. Stephens, M. T. dated the 4th ult. and confirmed in substance by several other accounts. They will not only lament the butchery at Tensaio, but see in that affair the annihilation of the pleasing prospect they had of the amelioration of the Creeks, and their final settlement in civilized life. To effect this, the government of the United States, under every administration, had treated them with parental tenderness. Surrounded as they are by the white people and without a back country to fly to, they have many years existed by the justice of the United States; who have restrained all attempts to infringe on their territory or violate their rights—though the luxuriance of the land they hold has excited the avarice of many; and, remote as they were, rendered it no easy task to secure to them "peace, liberty and safety." Many of the chiefs had fully fallen into the plan of civilization; cultivating their lands in regular order; and, in their domestic or household affairs, approaching us so nearly that the difference could hardly be discovered. A gentlemen of great respectability who passed through their country some months ago, informed the editor of the REGISTER, that he had dined at one of the chief's houses where the whole business of eating and drinking was done in a stile and manner that might be compared with that of any private gentleman in the best settled states. All the pleasant prospects we had are clouded by blood, and forever blasted by that treacherous people, for whom we have done so much; so that mercy itself seems to demand their extermination, to prevent greater calamity. This is one of the horrible fruits of the "ever watchful influence of England,"—and destruction follows wherever her councils lead, in America as well as in Europe. But what cares she for the annihilation of the Creeks? What is it to her, that humanity must lament the destruction of these Aborigines? But the cruelty of exciting them to a war in which she knows they must perish, shall be registered to her infamy, and add a little to the fullness of the cup of her abominations—and the world shall rejoice when she herself becomes the prey of that desolation, which the hardness of her heart and serpent-blooded feeling of her rulers, has spread through all nations and people that listened to her voice or felt the power of her arms—

"The storm which has been so long gathering, and so often predicted by honest, respectable citizens, has at length fallen on our infant and defenceless settlements. On Monday last the Creek Indians commenced hostilities against us, and on that day reduced one fort at Tensaio, about 15 miles from Stoddert; in which there were between three and four hundred persons of every description. Of these, about one hundred and thirty-five were volunteers in the service of the United States and local militia. 'Tis said the fort was surprised; and that the Indians entered at one of the gates and set fire to an old frame house in the centre of the pickets. All was done that could be effected by cool determined bravery; but overpowered by numbers, they were literally butchered, the house set on fire, and the old men, women and children (who were in an upper room) burnt to death. Our little Spartan band sold their lives well, having killed (as stated by the few who escaped) about two hundred, and wounded many more. Of all that were in the fort, eight only have got in, and they escaped by cutting down the pickets. Under the double influence of British gold and furious fanaticism, the savages fought in a manner scarcely to be credited. The fight was obstinately maintained for a long time; and the opponents, overcome by fatigue and exertion, loaded their pieces deliberately and shot each other down, or were mutually dispatched by the bayonet and tomahawk.

"The brave and much lamented major Beaseley commanded, and was killed at the gate, very early in the action; at this place sixty-three of the savages were killed. Not an officer of the fort survived—they fell bravely discharging their duty to their country. This disastrous event has stricken a panic into many citizens east of Tombigbee, and they are flying in every direction. At this place we have made a stand, and must either repulse the enemy or share the fate of those who fell in the fort at Tenasio."

NAVAL.

It is announced officially, in the British papers, that commodore Rodgers captured his B. M. brig Cruizer, of 18 guns, off the Shedland Islands about the 1st of August. The Oberon was in company, but escaped. It was calculated that Rodgers had done infinite damage to the British trade to Greenland and in the north; which has also been vexed by several privateers: some are also off the H-brides.

It is understood that commodore Rodgers has taken the Cruizer into the service of the United States, and that she is cruizing with him. It was stated, when he left us, that he had on board some supernumeraries to meet a contingency of this kind. Rodgers had landed in Scotland (so say the English papers) and obtained supplies of water and live stock, for which he paid generously. For a considerable time he has given full employment to twenty or thirty of the enemy's vessels of war, and if they do catch him, he will "cost them more than he will come to." He is safe—see POSTSCRIPT,—last page.

An American frigate (no doubt the Congress) was lately seen off the coast of Brazil.

The Essex.—A Jamaica paper of August 12, says the Essex was off Lima, Peru, April 5, with two ships in company, supposed her prizes.

The enemy are burning a great many fishing boats off the eastern coast—seventeen were destroyed in one day.

The U. S. brig Argus is off the English coast and has captured many vessels. She is a very fast sailor, and happily fitted for the business she is engaged in.

The British have received accounts at London that the U. S. brig Argus is to cruise in the chops of the channel; where she had intercepted a vessel from Madeira laden with wine, which was suffered to proceed on account of two lady passengers—but every part of the cargo that could be got at was destroyed. What would Cockburn have done in this case?

The U. S. sloop of war Wasp was launched at Newburyport about 12 days ago. Captain Blakeley, late of the Enterprize, commands her.

The U. S. sloop of war Peacock has been launched at New-York. We have two sloops of war almost ready to launch at Baltimore; and the frigate is also in very great forwardness. The Peacock is to carry twenty-four guns—twenty-two 32lb. carronades and two long 18's. She was built in seventy-two "working days" and is a complete piece of workmanship. She is to be commanded by captain Harrington, and will be fitted out immediately; having the greater part of her crew already made up of the brave fellows that sent her name-sake "down in the cellar"—the former crew of the Hornet.

A cartel has arrived at New-Bedford from England, with prisoners, masters and mates of vessels. Another with 450 seamen sailed from Plymouth, August 13.

The crew of the Enterprize were treated with a splendid entertainment by the citizens of Portland. As it does "not become a moral and religious people," to rejoice at such victories, the senate of Massachusetts ought to pass a vote of censure on the immoral and irreligious inhabitants of that town.

We continue to receive many new evidences of the barbarities of the enemy towards our unfortunate seamen. Pressed by the want of men, he resorts to all sorts of privations and indignities to drive into his service such of our people as have not nerve enough to endure his floggings, denials of food, exclusion of air, and all that renders life comfortable, by which many are murdered.

Admiral Harren with his fleet from the Chesapeake, has arrived at Halifax. On the 17th ult. there were at that port four 74's, two 64's, nine frigates, four sloops of war and one schooner. Sixty-five American prisoners had been sent to England, in the Regulus, as British subjects; and sixteen persons had been confined in a dungeon, by order of government, in retaliation for British prisoners confined by order of the American government.

Mr. Mitchell, agent for American prisoners at Halifax, has been sent into the country, seven miles from that place. All accounts from thence agree that the English conduct themselves worse than a gang of cut-throats.

Lieutenant Budd, late of the Chesapeake, had written to the British agent in Halifax, but his letter was returned unopened, with this answer—"that no communication would be received from him."

Captain Patterson, of the Fox frigate, has died of the wounds he received at Craney island. Captain Broke, of the Shannon, has not yet recovered. It is said he is about to go home in that ship. By Halifax accounts, the Boxer had only forty men, and the Enterprize is made out to be some sort of a frigate. When the account of the battle gets to England we shall have a pretty tale of it.

In spite of the blockade of Europe and blockade of the United States, our vessels give the enemy the "dodge" as heretofore. During the present week there have been three very valuable arrivals from France, at the northern ports.

We have not received any additional particulars officially, of the battle on lake Erie, though a letter from commodore Perry is inserted below. An account from Lower Sandusky of the 12th ultimo, leads us to believe that 900 prisoners were taken—the British came to the fight with great reluctance, but the Indians forced them into it; being determined to see which of the big canoes had the command of the lake, or to commence a general massacre. Troops were sent from Sandusky on the 12th to take charge of the prisoners. It is reported that the infamous colonel Elliott is among them.

Leaves changed to laurels.—The Lawrence and Niagara were both of them growing in the woods last spring on the banks of lake Erie. Within six months they have descended from the forest to the lake, changed from trees to vessels of war, and as commodore Perry says, "by the blessing of the Almighty," been covered with a luxuriance of laurels, thicker than their natural foliage. [D. Press.]

Another naval challenge.—We have before us a letter (says the Democratic Press) from one of the crew of the United States' brig Enterprize, by which she had received and accepted a challenge from H. M. brig Young Emulous. The Enterprize is repairing, and the battle is to be fought in thirty days from the receipt of the challenge, which was on the 18th Sept.

Copy of a letter from commodore Perry to the secretary of the navy.

U. S. schooner Arick, off Portage River, Sept. 20th, 1813. Since I last did myself the honor of writing you, the vessels under my command have been employed in moving the army from the camps at Portage river and fort Meigs to Put-in-bay. A considerable body of troops have already arrived at that place. General Cass, commanding at the bay, mentioned to me a few moments before I left him this morning, that a man had arrived at Detroit, who reported that the Indians had burnt that place. The general had not seen the man; two of his officers conversed with him.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, &c.

O. H. PERRY.

The hon. William Jones, secretary of the navy.

Captain Oliver.—Though it is very certain that in consequence of the behaviour of captain Oliver, the bodies of Lawrence and Ludlow were brought to New-York by land, we insert the following letter which accounts for the conduct we reprehended.

H. M. ship Valiant, off Gardiner's Island, 30th August, 1813.

SIR—The weather was so bad yesterday when your boat arrived with the flag, that I was unwilling to detain her the time necessary to reply to your application and that of commodore Bainbridge, for a passport for the brig Henry, to convey the remains of the gallant captain Lawrence, from Salem to New-York, and for the brig to be allowed to return to the former port. I annex this permission (as suggested by commodore Bainbridge) to the passport by which the brig Henry proceeded to Halifax, and I shall at all times have particular pleasure in paying attention to your applications that can in any way mitigate the inconveniences attending a state of war, which I trust as far as depends on us will always be carried on in a way not unworthy of the subjects of two free and independent nations. I have the honor to be, sir, your most ob't servant.

ROBERT DUDLEY OLIVER.

Commodore Decatur,

U. S. ship United States, near New-London.

Our Triumphs.—The following excellent article is from the Aurora :—

"According to the London newspapers, our enemies have paid higher compliments to the valor of our tars than we have done ourselves. Their lamentations over the Guerriere, Java, Macedonian, Frolic, &c. &c. have thundered our applause over the universe; the tone of deep regret has been so universal with the boasted masters of the ocean, that its singularity must have been noted even at Algiers. Nor is our glory emblazoned only by the British lamentation—our fame is spread abroad by the tower guns and by British illuminations. Formerly, when a Duncan, a St. Vincent or a Nelson gained a signal victory, and destroyed a Dutch, a Spanish or a French fleet, the tower guns were fired, but never were there rejoicings at a victory over a squadron or ship—until the capture of the Chesapeake. Then indeed, were the tower guns fired and the Bow bells rung, and well they might, for it was an unusual thing to triumph over Americans—what an encomium did those guns pay to our tars! what a peal of joy did the bells ring in the ears of Americans! Yes, the bravery of our tars is such, that we have compelled the enemy to proclaim it themselves; so difficult was it to gain a single victory or a single ship from us, that when gained, as much was done to celebrate it, as used to be done after a battle in which twenty ships of the line were taken.

But short is the triumph over the Chesapeake; doubly dull and heavy will the British feel, after their short-lived joy, when they learn the fate of the Boxer and their fleet on lake Erie: the tower guns and Bow bells will be thought of every day more and more by the "thinking people" when they learn our new triumphs: our victories will be spoken of, and thought of, ten times more, because our loss of the Chesapeake was so much rejoiced at: Glorious cause, which has such tars to maintain it!! Fortunate seamen, who have a country which will ever make your cause its own, which will never make a peace until your rights shall be secured and your glorious toils rewarded."

BLOCKADE OF NEW-LONDON.

New-London, Sept. 22.—Fourteen deserters from the Acasta arrived here on Sunday last. By their story it appears that between 12 and 1 o'clock that morning, the boat came alongside the frigate for a relief guard, when by a concerted plan as soon as the officers and crew except two men had left the boat, 12 seamen jumped into her and pushed off; the centinel of the gang-way being of the number, their design was not immediately perceived. They rowed under the stern, and thus avoided the ship's guns; orders were given for the centurions to fire upon them, which they did without injury, and the bold fellows answered with 3 cheers and pull d'away for the land. The night was very dark; having approached the shore of Fisher's Island, not knowing with certainty where they were, they threw out their ketch, and remained at anchor nearly an hour, when they got under way, rowed down the south side of the island, and early in the morning got safe into Stonington, where they were kindly received, took breakfast, sold the boat and her armament, peck'd the cash and proceeded to this place. The boat was a fine 12 oared barge, with sails; had on board 6 muskets, 10 cutlasses, two pair of pistols, with an ample magazine.

BLOCKADE OF THE CHESAPEAKE.

On the night of the 21st ult. from 100 to 150 British troops landed at the Pleasure House on Cape Henry, and compelled a party of about 40 men stationed there to retreat; in doing which they had six men taken prisoners by mistaking the enemy for their own people. No one was killed or wounded. The British finished the affair by burning the house.

A frigate and three or four smaller vessels came up the bay, and anchored off Smith's Point (the mouth of the Potomac) on the 24th ult. They appear to be moving about in the neighborhood to embarrass the trade of the bay and its waters.

University of the state of N. York.

COLLEGE OF PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS.

The union of the college of physicians and surgeons, with the faculty of physic of Columbia college, so long desired by the friends of science, has at length most happily taken place. In April, 1811, the honorable the regents of the university, expressly endeavored to effect this important object; fully impressed as they professed themselves to be, "with the advantages to the state, which a well organized medical school in New-York must afford." For this purpose the regents new modelled the school of medicine at that time, with a view of introducing into it, the professors of the medical school of Columbia College, and other eminent and distinguished individuals; that thus united in one institution, the medical talents of both seminaries, might be a greater benefit to the public, and still better entitled to the patronage and encouragement of the legislature.

The following arrangement, therefore, has been concluded, and will be carried into operation at the ensuing session of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, which will commence on the first Monday of November next, at their new and spacious buildings, recently completed in Barclay-street:

Anatomy, physiology and surgery, by Dr. Wright Post, and Dr. John Augustine Smith.

Theory and practice of physic, by Dr. David Hosack.

Clinical surgery, at the New-York hospital, by Dr. Post.

Clinical practice of medicine, at do. by Dr. William Hamersley.

Obstetrics and the diseases of women and children, with practical illustrations at the lying-in-hospital, by Dr. John C. Osborn.

Chemistry and Pharmacy, by Dr. William J. M'Neven.

Medical jurisprudence, by Dr. James S. Stringham.

The principles and practice of surgery, by Dr. Valentine Mott.

Materia Medica, by Dr. John W. Francis.

Natural history, including botany and mineralogy, by Dr. Samuel L. Mitchill.

Natural and experimental philosophy, by the vice-president of the college, Dr. Benjamin De Witt.

The lectures on anatomy, the principles and practice of surgery, the theory and practice of physic, and on chemistry, will be delivered daily, and the other courses of instruction three times in each week throughout the session, which will continue from the first Monday of November to the first Monday of March.

Although the most liberal and extensive system of medical and philosophical instruction has thus been provided at this institution, the expense of education to the candidate for medical honors is not increased, beyond that of any other college in the union; as none of the courses are made indispensably necessary for graduation, and the student is at liberty to attend any course or courses he may think proper; the professors insisting upon the attainments of the candidate and not upon the number of courses nor the number of years he may have attended at the university.

By order,

S. BARD, President.

THE CHRONICLE.

By the arrival of the very valuable schr. Grampus of Baltimore, at New York, from Bayonne, we have very late dates from France and England, but no news of importance. The armistice continued, but nothing had transpired of the proceedings of the plenipotentiaries at Prague. "It is only known that every thing is done by exchanging notes." The emperor of Austria is often there; and it is said will take up his residence in the vicinity.

In Spain, though our accounts of the late proceedings therein are not distinct, it appears that Wellington with 150,000 men had defeated Soult with 50,000, with great loss to the latter. That the allies yet held Passage, and continued the siege of St. Sebastians. The French seem to be acting on the defensive; and though the allies were in great force in the neighborhood, Bayonne was not considered in danger. Another and a later account says, that Soult and Suchet had formed a junction and totally defeated Wellington. This account is probably correct. The battle lasted from 4 o'clock in the morning of the 13th of August until 3 in the afternoon. The English had 2,700 killed and lost 4,000 prisoners. In their retreat they are said to have burnt a part of the city of Vitoria. The English head-quarters were at Burgos, at the latest date from the armies.

British stocks,—3 per cent. consols 57 7-8.

It was reported and believed in France, that in case of a rupture of the armistice, Bonaparte would instantly act against the allies with 800,000 men.

It is reported that "troubles have broken out in Sweden."

It was said at Bordeaux about the 20th of August, that the armistice had closed and Austria had joined France—but the late English papers state that the Earl of Aberdeen was about to proceed to Prague to meet the general congress. Another account says this was a "stock jobbing" paragraph; and is false.

The Catholics of Ireland (says a late London paper) have determined on making an application to the Spanish government for their mediation with the British government in their behalf.

The report of the death of Berthier is not adicted.

London, June 14.—A morning paper contains the following paragraph: "A grand Orange Lodge was held on Monday, at lord ———'s, in Portman-square, when some distinguished personages were admitted members. The Orange institution promises to become universal through the empire.

Perpetual motion at an end.—Mr. Gobert of Philadelphia, who lately advertised that he would take any bet from five to one hundred thousand dollars on the feasibility of Mr. Redheffer's discovery of perpetual motion, was taken up for five thousand dollars, by Mr. Jacob Perkins of Newburyport—After making a series of experiments in vain, to construct a moving machine upon Mr. Redheffer's self moving principle, he discovered to his infinite chagrin, that Mr. Redheffer had in the mean time moved himself off, with 20,000 dollars in notes of hand given him by Mr. Gobert for his valuable secret. We understand that Mr. Gobert has acknowledged his bet forfeited, and is now in pursuit of Redheffer, who keeps himself in perpetual motion to elude him.

POSTSCRIPT.

Com. Rodgers, in the President frigate, has arrived at Newport, R. I. after cruising "all round and round" the British islands, though the sea is theirs and they have a "a thousand vessels of war." We have nothing that can be positively relied on as to his cruise. It is said however that he brought into port, a sloop of war and one of his majesty's armed schooners, and that he had captured and manned 13 vessels—Another report says, that he also took and destroyed 16 Greenlanders, being 29 vessels in all, and that he has got the private signals of the British.

We shall have an account of particulars that may be relied on next week.

Sketches of La Plata.

The important incidents occurring in South America excites a laudable zeal for information of the country. The provinces of La Plata are frequently referred to; and yet we are exceedingly ignorant of whatever relates to them, as to their extent, wealth, population and resources, &c. To collect into one body, all the information within his reach, the editor has taken considerable trouble, but the jealousy of the Spaniards, combining with natural causes, forbids an intimate knowledge of those regions, at all times desirable, but at this time of peculiar interest from the struggles of the people for independence. So far as the detail goes, it may be presumed tolerably correct, for many authorities have been consulted and compared.

The Spanish possessions in America were divided into four vice-royalties, to wit, Mexico, New-Grenada, Lima and La Plata.

LA PLATA is a very extensive region, bounded by Amazonia on the north, Brazil on the east, Patagonia on the south, and Chili and Peru on the west, being 1600 miles long and 1200 wide; and consisted of four great distinct divisions, or governments, viz. Charcas on the north and west, Paraguay on the north and east, Buenos Ayres on the south and east, Tucuman, with the provinces of New-Chili, (or Chili east of the Andes), or the south-west and west; each of which were subdivided into many provinces, districts and governments.

CHUCAS, or "SOUTH-PERU." This part of the vice-royalty of La Plata, like its other great divisions, had its particular governor. The following is the account of some of its subdivisions:

Moxos, in the north of La Plata, is 600 miles long, from east to west, and 400 broad. The air is very hot, but moist, on account of the great rivers and forests it contains. Its waters chiefly empty into the river Amazon. It is a rich and fertile country, producing maize, sugar canes, yucas (a plant from which the inhabitants make excellent bread,) rice, the plantanos which the Indians consider their best aliment. They also raise cotton and cocoa, and the soil naturally produces the Quinquina, or Peruvian bark, almonds and vanilla. Moxos abounds with wild animals, such as tigers, bears and hogs, and its rivers are well stocked with fish.

Santa-Cruz de la Sierra, lies on the south of Moxos, and joins Potosi. In addition to the productions of Moxos it has a species of the balm, whose great leaves serve for thatching the dwellings of the natives—from the body of this tree a flour is obtained of which they make very pleasant cakes, eating them as bread. This district has a capital of the same name, situate on the banks of a noble river, is the see of a bishop, lat. 17, 46, S. long. 65, 14, W. The country is but thinly peopled, the Spaniards having impressed a great number of Indians as slaves, and transported them to Peru, where they sold themselves to work in the mines.

Chiquisaca, has a capital of the same name, sometimes called La Plata, on account of the famous silver mines in its vicinity. It is situate on the river Chimao, in lat. 19, 16, S. long. 63, 40, W. This city contains 14,000 inhabitants, and is the seat of an archbishop whose authority extends over the whole of La Plata. The mines have produced immense sums to the Incas of Peru, but since the working of those at Potosi have been much neglected. Here are found many descendants of the ancient nobility of Peru, who still retain some of their former privileges and are much respected by the Indians.

Potosi is celebrated over the world for its famous silver mines—since the year 1545, that metal to the value of more than seven hundred millions of dollars, is supposed to have been dug from its mountain. Its riches were accidentally discovered by an Indian, who having hold of a shrub to assist him in ascending a steep place, and the shrub coming up by the root, laid open to his view a mass of fine silver. The Indian applied to this abundant resource for some time in secret; but at length discovered it to a friend, that revealed it to the Spaniards, who first began to work it 1545.

The mountain of Potosi is in the form of a sugar-loaf, about eighteen miles in circumference, in which more than three hundred mines or pits, are worked, but many of them are greatly incommoded by water. The country round Potosi is dreary, barren and desert; all the necessaries of life are brought from a distance; it is also destitute of wood, and the ordinary fuel of the inhabitants is transported from thirty to sixty miles; pieces of timber, sixteen inches square and thirty-four feet long, is stated, by Helms, to cost the enormous sum of two hundred pounds sterling. The markets are well supplied, but every thing, except silver, is dear at Potosi. The population of the city is variously stated, Helms, who resided here for several months, estimated its inhabitants at 100,000; but some other authorities rate them as low as 25,000. The former seems the nearest the truth; particularly when we consider that Potosi is the seat of the administration of all the mines, and has a very great commerce with the interior. Potosi, with several adjoining districts, were formerly considered as a part of Peru, and its greatest trade is at present with Lima.

Sicasica, Oreco, Jamparues, Cayata, Cashabambas (a very populous and rich district, emphatically called the granary of Peru, producing vast quantities of grain, and some gold) Carangas, Porco, Itacama and Lipes, are the chief subdivisions of Charcas, not yet described. They have mines of gold, silver, copper, tin and lead. In Carangas a mass of silver weighing seventy-five pounds was found a years ago; but in Porco a quantity of virgin copper, estimated to be worth three millions of dollars, was discovered—alum and salt are also found in these countries, with quantities of sulphur and nitre, which are manufactured into gun-powder. The Charcas honey is celebrated; it is chiefly collected in Cayata. Horses, horned cattle and sheep are numerous in these districts, and, in general, they are well supplied with grain and fruits; and make a good deal of wine and sugar. White copper, lead-stone and iron are found in Lipes. Of the population of those places we have no data whereon to form an opinion—but they are in general thinly inhabited, having large saline plains, and immense forests.

PARAGUAY, taking in a great extent of country, bounded on the east by Brazil, is very imperfectly known and chiefly possessed by the aborigines. It takes its name from the great river Paraguay one of the branches of the river La Plata. The whole country is beautifully watered, but the southern part is barren and swampy. It has few or no mines, which perhaps may account for our great ignorance of the country. It produces the sugar cane, cotton, wild cinnamon, rhubarb, vanilla, cochineal, and various kinds of fruit and grain; but is chiefly famous for a certain herb called mate, or the tea of Paraguay, exporting 100,000 arrobes, of 25lb. each, to Peru, alone, every year, with large quantities to Chili, and other places. A decoction of it forms the common drink of all who can obtain it, as tea does in China. In Paraguay are many wild beasts, jaguars, cougars, bears, apes and monkeys—the latter are eaten by the Indians.

Assumption, the residence of the governor and see of a bishop, is the capital, situated on the river Paraguay, containing about 20,000 inhabitants. Lat. 26, 0. S. long. 57, 40, W. The air is pure, temperate and healthy, and the trees are always green.—From hence to Buenos Ayres is 840 miles.

Paraguay is famous for the settlement of the Jesuits, founded in the beginning of the seventeenth century, under a grant from Philip III. They undertook to make proselytes to the church, and open a new source of wealth to the mother country, and flocked thither in considerable numbers. They formed many prosperous establishments among the Indians, teaching them to apply themselves to agriculture and the arts. In process of time they acquired a wonderful ascendancy over the people, exercising absolute dominion in civil as well as ecclesiastical matters, and are said to have instructed them in military discipline. They boasted they had converted 350,000 families; they labored with the accustomed zeal of the order, and erected towns and established schools—and manufactories. In 1737 a part of the country being exchanged with Portugal for the colony of St. Sacramento, the Indians took up arms to maintain the possession; but were defeated by the Spaniards, 2,000 of them being killed. In 1767 the Spanish court expelled the Jesuits from South America, and placed the natives of Paraguay on the same footing as the other Indians.

Buenos Ayres.—The audience of Buenos Ayres comprises a large tract of country on both sides the Rio del Plata. The eastern part is crossed by the Uruguay, and has many mountains; the other part is an immense plain, extending to the base of the Andes and frequently impregnated with salt and nitre.

Rivers.—The chief rivers of Buenos Ayres are the Plata, Parana, Salado, Vernego and Uruguay.—There are many other rivers and powerful streams, the whole country being intersected with them; few however being in the great plain just spoken of compared with the other parts of the audience.

Winds.—The west wind at Buenos Ayres, is called the pampero, because it passes over a plain nine hundred miles long, denominated the Pampas, inhabited by many tribes of migratory Indians. The west wind crossing the plain and meeting with nothing to resist its progress, acquires great impetuosity, and is much dreaded by the people on account of its ravages: it is particularly dangerous to the shipping.

Buenos Ayres, the capital of the whole province of La Plata, situate in lat. 34, 34, S. long. 58, 26, W. was the residence of the vice-roy and see of a bishop. The vice-roy's palace and the cathedral are spoken of as being very splendid and magnificent buildings. It stands on a noble stream of water, a short distance from the great river, whose opposite shore cannot be reached with the eye, though nearly two hundred and fifty miles from the sea. Its environs are rich and fertile, and the air so pure and salubrious as to give the name to the city. Buenos Ayres is the emporium of trade with Peru and Chili, carried on by great caravans of horses, waggons and mules. The city is pretty well built, and contains, according to the best authorities, about 45,000 inhabitants. Sir Home Popham, who captured the place in 1806, stated its population to be 70,000. The dress and manners of the people are the same as in Spain, but a great proportion of the inhabitants are Creoles, i. e. born in America of Spanish parents. By a good post-office establishment, Buenos Ayres corresponds with the most distant places in La Plata, Peru and Chili. The city is abundantly supplied with all kinds of provisions, and is well known as a place of great trade. The chief exports are gold, silver and copper, with tobacco, cotton, wool, sugar and wax, and great quantities of hides and tallow. Buenos Ayres was founded in 1535, by Mandoza, but afterwards abandoned, and in 1582, rebuilt by a new colony.

Monte Video is a thriving and prosperous settlement on the river, 150 miles below Buenos Ayres, and about 60 from the sea. Its chief trade is in hides and tallow. It has of late been much frequented, and become a place of great export. This city has been the great asylum of the tories of La Plata, and underwent several sieges of the patriots. At our last accounts from that country it was again besieged, and the prospect of its fall was highly flattering. It seems the tory fleet has always had the command of the waters of La Plata, which has much retarded and obstructed the operations of the Buenos Ayreans.

San Sacramento, Santa Fe, Corrientes, Los Reyes, and Ciudad Real, are also considerable towns.

TUCUMAN, a pleasant town, 600 miles from Buenos Ayres, in the interior, is the see of bishop and has three monasteries, and is surrounded by groves of orange and citron trees in continual bloom. The province, or government, of Tucuman extends to the Andes; the northern part of the high land, is cold in the winter. In the southern part are many lakes and swamps. Its greatest rivers are the Salado, one of the branches of the Rio del Plata, and the Dolce, which empties itself in the Lake Porongas.

Salta, in lat. 25, 25, S. long. 66, 30, W. has a cathedral, seven churches, and several monastic establishments, with a magnificent town house, and a convenient and spacious market place. It contains 500 Spanish families, and the whole number of its inhabitants are about 9000. It is the seat of a great transit trade with Potosi, Peru and Chili. Salta is the capital of Tucuman, and the residence of the governor.

The other towns of the greatest note, are Jujui, with 3000 inhabitants; Rayo—San Fernando, Saint Jaques, San Miguel and Cordova. The last named place contains 6000 inhabitants, of whom 4000 are negro slaves. It is a clean well built town; and the streets are paved, which is not the case in any other city or town in La Plata. The cathedral is a costly edifice, and the private houses handsome and spacious.

At Ramanso, 60 miles from Cordova, commences a saline plain, 210 miles long, the most part of which is barren and desert, the whole ground being covered with a white incrustation of salt, bearing no plant but the salsoli kali, which grows 12 feet high.

La Paz, situate in the north of the province of Tucuman, is a populous city having 20,000 inhabitants, who carry on a great trade in the tea of Paraguay. Gold abounds in its neighborhood, but the mines are feebly worked. About 50 miles from this city is the lake of Tijuaca, the largest in South America, being 80 miles long and in some places as many miles broad.

GENERAL REMARKS.—Gold and silver mines are the chief sources of riches to La Plata. At present 30 of gold, 27 of silver, 7 of copper, 2 of tin and 7 of lead are worked. The productions of the country have been generally noticed in the preceding remarks. The prodigious number of wild horses and horned cattle which rove on the plains of La Plata, are well known; so numerous are they that they are killed merely for their hides and tallow, and from one to two millions are thus destroyed annually.—Wild dogs, descended from the domestic animal, are so numerous in some parts of the country as to become the terror of the inhabitants. They live in holes in the ground, and prey on the cattle. At Buenos Ayres the winter begins in June, accompanied with much rain and thunder and lightning; but here it is mild, and indeed, generally so through the whole country of Plata. The population of La Plata has been stated at three millions; but we presume the estimation is a great deal too high, perhaps one half—about one tenth of the inhabitants are native Spaniards, four tenths Creoles, and the rest Indians and negroes. The aborigines are generally a mild and timid race of people, patient and laborious, and capable of enduring the most incessant toil, soon outdoing the negroes. The Spaniards and Creoles are spoken of as lazy and indolent; ever on the stretch to indulge themselves in some new luxury or pleasure, but inattentive, heedless and cruel. The Abipons, are a warlike nation of Indians, 5000 strong, residing in the audience of Buenos Ayres, who have as yet preserved an entire independence. They fight on horse-back armed with lances. When a warrior dies, they sacrifice his horses on his tomb, as if to serve him in the other world. They pluck the hair from the forehead so as to make them appear bald, and tear out their beards by the roots.—There are many other independent tribes of Indians who pay little, if any, reverence to the Spanish name, not having felt the force of their power—but they inhabit countries where gold and silver mines are unknown. At Monte Video the Rio del Plata is so wide that, from a vessel in the middle, the land cannot be discovered on either side. The water of this river is turbid. It was discovered in 1515 by Jno. Diaz de Solis, who supposed it an opening through which he could reach the East Indies. The various exports from La Plata are supposed to be worth from six to eight millions of dollars per annum, of which about one half are in metals.

“The Deliverance of Europe.”

We have felt it right frequently to exhibit to scorn the wicked or silly politicians of the United States who preach to US about “legitimate princes;” for we hold, that all princes are politically illegitimate, and believe that a large majority of them are also naturally so. The whole are “usurpers,”—and it was the grand object of those who are now (in the queer language of the day) contending for the “liberties of Europe” to have destroyed liberty in France, and partition that territory, whose population has caused their own to be laid off, or blotted from the map. But some loving “England and monarchy” too well to believe me, denied all this. I will now give them royal authority for the matter, which their allegiance will not permit them to doubt. It is an extract from the speech of Ernest Augustus Guelph, ALIAS duke of Sussex, delivered at a public meeting held in London on the 22d April, for the purpose of raising subscriptions to assist the Germans in recovering their independence.

“The debt of gratitude I owe this country is vast. The people of this country have placed my family on the throne. Nevertheless I do not forget that I am of German blood; but this circumstance, indeed, enhances, rather than diminishes my gratitude, for it keeps present to my mind the fact, that I am a native of this country by the favor of its inhabitants, and not by accident. For eighteen years, I have with much attention, marked the effects of the French revolution. I have, reasoning from analogy, anticipated still more fatal effects, than those which had already taken place, every day’s experience showing that my views were not fallacious; and I have ever maintained, that if the violent and wide spreading plague by which we were assailed, were not resisted with proportionate violence, universal destruction must be the inevitable result. We are not, indeed, met to sit in judgment on past events, but reference to them does not seem out of place, as tending to impel us to counsels calculated to promote a successful termination of that great contest in which we have been so long engaged, in which we are still, unfortunately engaged, but from which we have now better prospect than ever of extricating ourselves with advantage and honor. (Applauses.) Perhaps nothing can be more mortifying than a contrast of what Germany was at the commencement of the French revolution, and what she has since been. At the former period, mighty in arms, and elate in hope, she menaced that power, which has since overrun her soil and enslaved her sons. Austria and Prussia, and all her other powerful states, in combination for the avowed purpose of quelling the insolence of French democracy:—nothing was contemplated but the complete dismemberment or annihilation of that nation! Since then (but I forbear from entering minutely into the affecting detail) suffice it to say, that by a singular revolution of human affairs, Germany has fallen beneath the yoke of that power, whose squadrons had passed her best protected lines, at whose approach her capitals had trembled.”

“The Deliverance of Europe,” like the “legitimacy of princes,” is one of the great eating phrases of all the English—and John Bull and his “calves” rant and foam, and fret and froth, an t whine and bleat out it, as though the destinies of nations were at their bidding, and no one cared for religion and liberty but themselves, the Pharisees of the world.

It appears from the speech of the “royal duke” above quoted, that Great Britain, assisted by the tyrants of the continent, succeeded in “delivering” France of her “democracy.” But the monarchy pleases them no better. The groaning creatures put me in mind of the culprit that the Irish drummer was flogging, who cried, “a little higher” and “a little lower” until the patience of the executioner was exhausted, and he exclaimed, “By —, let me strike where I will, there is no such thing as pleasing out.” Nor will they be satisfied until the power of France is dissolved, and her territory partitioned among them, as originally designed by the conspirators at Pillnitz.

I have always believed that Great Britain was the immediate instrument of Napoleon’s authority. Had the vile confederates against liberty, permitted France to have managed her own affairs, there was every human probability that she now would have had a republican government; or, at least, that the race of the Bourbons, under a liberal constitution, would have administered the law, within the old boundaries of the empire. Seeing they have brought about the sad reverse, and see the people of the U States, as republicans and friends of freedom, pay them, until signs of repentance appear—Nay, let the libertyeids suffer to the very extremity of endurance—let them whine over these evils and do on themselves that they would have been paid for their. They are "paid in their own coin." They began, and have continued, the quarrel—they first invaded France—they would have partitioned her territory.

And who are they that are to "deliver Europe?"—Russia!—Prussia!—England!!!—Heaven defend the people from such deliverers!—a trio of powers each as rapacious as Bonaparte, and, by combination, much more to be dreaded by the civilized world. The gross population of the first is rather below the level of our negro slaves; they have less freedom, are less intelligent, and infinitely more barbarous and uncouth. True it is, that a good deal has latterly been done to ameliorate their condition, but the work of a century will not place on as good a footing as the blacks have, in all the middle and eastern states of America. Let Russia "deliver" her own people before she volunteers to give "freedom" to others—let her "cast the beam out of her own eye," and shew an example of regard for the "liberties of Europe," by restoring to the Poles their violated country; whom she, in villainous conjunction with Prussia and Austria, "delivered" from a state of comparative freedom and prosperity, to the slavery and misery of her own subjects. As to England, holy and happy England, let her "deliver" her own poor houses, teeming with one fifth of her whole people—"deliver" Ireland—"deliver" India, where she holds a population in vilest durance as great as that that Bonaparte lords it over. Shall these preach moderation to the "Corsican," or charge him with ambition?—Why, it is like a veteran bawd lecturing on chastity, and should have the same weight.

"The deliverance of Europe!"—To whom? For what?—I cannot tell, nor will they themselves say. Does any one believe that the nations of Europe want this "deliverance?" Are 100 millions of people to be conquered and enslaved by one man?—I believe that in the "change of masters" they have have been benefitted, else Bonaparte could no more hold France, itself, than I could, much less be looked-up to from the shores of the Vistula. But this is the "deliverance" that is really meant—the delivery of British goods at the ports of the continent, and nothing else. Are all the nations so insensible to their "deplorable situation" as not to know it, until their rulers are enlightened by British bribes, or bullied into understanding by the terror of the British arms?—Who of them have gone forward of their own accord (partially in Spain excepted) to fight against Napoleon?—Not one!—Their "patriotism" never moved until England applied the "essential oil" of freedom, by subsidizing corrupting those in authority. She, "magnanimous nation," is willing to "deliver" any body, unless she can hold him for her own use—Christian, Jew, Turk or Pagan; worshippers of the true God or the idol Juggernaut: they are all as one in the scope of her benevolence—and any people may freely have the title of "patriots" contending for "the religion and liberties of Europe," even the savages residing on the North-West coast of America, provided they will take up arms on her side, and receive her manufactures. But if they refuse to do both, they are denounced as being under the influence of France. As "the bulwark of the religion we profess," (meaning the Protestant religion)—she fights against "popery" in Ireland, and decries it as the "holy church" in Spain and Portugal—nay, a little while ago, the king's own regiment of guards were doing duty at Rome to protect the very person of the supreme pontiff, whom she calls "ANTICHRIST." And further, she kicked our ancestors from their homes and native country, for professing that very religion that she is called the "bulwark" of. Here is a "deliverance" in three ways!—The last, we admit, was a blessed deliverance, and we humbly thank that great Providence who directed our fathers here to build up a living altar where every man may worship according to his own conscience, free of offence and safe from persecution. Besides, she would also have "delivered" us of our liberty, as is recorded in the Declaration of Independence. She is for "delivering" every body. Her gallant admiral, with forty sail of vessels of war, and a land force of 4,000 men, "delivered" several undefended villages on the Chesapeake to the flames, and a good many women to ravishment—and he "delivered" upwards of 100 negroes from their old masters in Maryland and Virginia to new masters in the West India islands, with the common purpose that all her "deliverances" have; which is, to make money out of them.

For the deliverance of Europe, in the honest meaning of the words, I have as much zeal as any man—but I want it delivered into the hands of the people, who, by their own free suffrages, might regulate their own affairs as to them seemed expedient. France would have had this high and glorious privilege, and it might and would have extended to other nations, but for that conspiracy the "royal duke" speaks of. England has been the soul of the crusade against freedom; and is responsible before heaven and posterity for the enormities of the French revolution, and all the wars that have followed it. Until the allied powers interfered to "deliver" France of her "democracy," by insurrections within and armies without, there was every prospect of a happy termination to the labors of the illustrious men that planned her emancipation from a state of slavery that for centuries had been the scoff of Englishmen. But it belongs to history to investigate the causes that led Napoleon to the throne; and we have only to add, that if England can go on to purchase the kings for the "deliverance of Europe," there is much probability that the whole country may be "delivered" into his hands. The continent desires peace—long enough has the "blood of the people fattened their corn-fields," and, worn out with sufferings, they will naturally cleave to that power who can command it. To prevent this, we hope and trust that the career of England has nearly closed—that the nations may learn wisdom and refuse her bloody bribes—cultivate and cherish their resources, and, in their own quarrel, avenge the insults and restrain the ambition of France.

British Jurisprudence.

The uprightness and independency of the British judiciary has been remarked and commented upon, as though the judges were gods; and compared, some years ago, with the judges of continental Europe, they certainly deserved a very considerable part of the high reputation they held.—But "like causes produce like effects" in all countries, and in proportion as the influence of the people has decreased, and the influence of the crown increased, in England, this boasted palladium between the rights of the former and the will of the latter, has lost its virtue. Between individual Englishmen, the courts of Great Britain have yet some claims to praise;—but when the court is interested on the one side, or an Englishman stands opposed to "foreigner," there is not much greater chance of justice, than in the judicatories of some other nations, who "register" the decrees of their sovereign. In regard to the British admiralty courts this obs-servation applies with immediate force; though, it once was the custom of the judges to make the law of nations their guide; and to do justice according to law. But latterly, and for several years past, an order from the king's ministers has established their decisions, fixing the law. They are now, in fact, no more independent of the crown than the sweeper of lord Castlereagh's office is of lord Castlereagh—"a servant of servants."

Many trials before the redoubtable sir William Scott establish the truth of all that we say:—and, as to the vice-admiralty courts at Bermuda, Halifax, Gibraltar, &c. earth does not hold set of knaves more vile than they.

These remarks occurred on reading the following letter: adversity is the best school—but the writer's licence protected him, we should not have heard the truth he unfolds.

Extract of letters from Gibraltar, dated July 19 & 23.

"You will perhaps be surpris'd to learn that we have been captured, our licence notwithstanding! we were taken in sight of the rock. Although every remonstrance was made that reason and justice suggested, ag'dust sending the ship to another port, she was immediately manned and ordered here, as the British have not yet established any prize court in Lisbon. She is libell'd and to be tried in a few days "for breach of blockade,"—that is the ostensible ground, but the real one, his majesty's officers cannot pay club in the mess unless they are indulg'd with plucking the Yankees, as they call it, and if not lawful prize, piracy is sanctioned by this religious government.

Another ship was taken at anchor in port, and sent here. What steps will our government adopt towards the Portuguese, for permitting those outrages? Their flag should be inadmissible in our ports, until such wrongs be redressed.

Several Spanish, Portuguese and English vessels are now fitting out for the United States in Cadiz and Lisbon, some of them are to go via Havanna and Brazil; those vessels and cargoes are altogether on British account. They say that from experience those voyages answer capitally. Thus we enrich the enemy whom we should distress in self-defence.

The marquis de Casa Yrujo has been sent in here also, in the ship Eugenia of and from Philadelphia, bound to Cadiz, from off that port, with a special licence from admiral Warren to remove his property and family. I fear her fate, as she has a large and valuable cargo; many people here as well as the naval officers observe "she is too valuable to escape."

The judge having heard the owner of the ship was born in France, and that he was rich, and that governor McKean the marquis's father-in-law is a democrat, affords ample cause of condemnation to a British judge, this—observing frequently "I will examine my last instructions!" But our eastern patriarchs stile this nation the bulwark of our religion. If such be fact, we are all Pagans.

The error of permitting our vessels to be thus employed is now glaring, and I am ashamed of myself for not following your advice and going into the army, instead of disgracefully feeding an unfeeling brutal enemy; but alas! avarice will destroy our country!—our poor seamen are the principal sufferers. Confiding in treacherous documents on which merchants embark their property, the sailor considers his wages safe, but he not only loses his hard earned pittance, but his clothes, (always plundered by those freebooters) his liberty, and perhaps his life, by sickness in a loathsome prison ship, without even the satisfaction of having contended with the robber of his rights for either. The crews of all those vessels are now considered prisoners of war —my eyes are opened—I now see the grossness of the folly this system of warfare exposes. The innocent are made to suffer for the guilty.

The ship Madoc of New Bedford, with 5000 barrels of flour was condemned two days since. Thus are we fattening the Philistines. It is not yet too late to make them feel the power of the United States, which now they ridicule. Should congress at their next session immediately prohibit the exportation of provisions, &c. our rights would be acknowledged before the adjournment."

British Depredations.

We have a long list of articles pilfered by the British during their landing in St. Mary's county, Maryland, near Point Look-out. Such as knives, forks, and spoons; combs, sugar-bowls and handkerchiefs; tea-cups, scissors and hand-saws;—besides the cattle and sheep, with poultry, as usual. The seizure of the latter, under some circumstances, may be excused; but the meanness of capturing the others cannot be reprehended too severely. As a caution to watchfulness, as well as to express the abhorrence of the people at the depredations of the enemy, the following saying is likely to come into use—"Take care of your spoons, the English are coming!" for it is a fact that one of the officers, when some part of the squadron was near the head of the Chesapeake bay, went very orderly, and "religiously" and "magnanimously" to a lady's cupboard, in her presence, and there, with that deliberation which British officers are so remarkable for on trying occasions, did gallantly seize upon and make prize of, all her tea-spoons, thrusting them into his pocket with the dexterity of a Barrington. Now we do not much mind the taking of a few combs, if they will make a good use of them; for they require a good deal of combing to divest themselves of their verminous appendages!

We have also many disgraceful particulars of their conduct on the shores of the James River in Virginia. Much has been said, but the thousandth part of their enormities are not recorded. The following case deserves to be remembered—Four officers, one of them supposed to be a captain, with a large party of armed men, went to the house of Richard Young of Warwick county. Mr. Young having heard it said they would not plunder unless the owners fled, determined to stand by his property; and being an old man thought he might preserve it. They entered, and while one party was scouting the fields for sheep and cattle, the others were breaking open the desk and drawers, and stealing the table linen, bed-clothes and whatever else they took a fancy to; and battering into splinters the bureaus, tables, chairs, bed-steads, &c. These things were principally done by the officers themselves. After which they seized upon the negro women, and, in the presence of Mr. Young, violated them, by force. To Mr. Young's remonstrances the captain said, "get out of the house, you d—d old rascal!" After having secured or destroyed every thing they could, the captain said he would pay for them, and called for pen and ink to write an order. There being no ink at hand, he wittily took sheep's blood for a substitute, and wrote as follows:

"Warwick, 25th June, 1812.

Three days after sight please to pay Mr. Young, parish of Warwick, for 50 bullocks, 30 sheep and 50 calves, for the use of the British navy, and place the same to the account of

JAMES MADISON, Esquire,
President of the United States.
Secy United States."

To ————, ————

Then handed it to Mr. Young, telling him it was a full discharge of all he owed, and departed, mightily pleased with his excursion. Mr. Young preserves the original of this "discharge," and it may yet lead to a discovery, through the fortunes of war, of the vile wretch who wrote it.

Similar things were done by other parties, at many other places—wantonly destroying the furniture they could not take away.

How is it possible that we can feel any respect for men guilty of such infernal deeds? How esteem as brave men the force under sir John E. Warren, of nearly forty vessels of war, with about 4000 land troops, who effected nothing more valiant than the deeds above mentioned?

Domestic Manufactures.

It is with singular pleasure we learn, that a complete digest of the returns of the marshals, regarding the manufactures of the United States, &c. has been prepared at the treasury department, to be laid before congress, at its next session. We are told that the statement embraces the particulars belonging to every county; so that each attentive observer may as well test its accuracy as notice the improvement of his immediate neighborhood. The grand aggregate value of these manufactures is upwards of one hundred and seventy seven millions of dollars; though the account excludes flour of all kinds, pot and pearl ashes, and some other articles, of which the cost of the original material still constitutes the chief value of the manufactured commodity.

Though this enormous amount has far surpassed the calculations of all men, the time that has elapsed since that calculation was made, has added, perhaps, one third to the aggregate. The last three years have done more to the establishment and extension of domestic manufactures than the ten or twenty that preceded them. This must be evident to every man. We see it and rejoice at it; for the day of independence, with the downfall of foreign influence, draws nigh. "Where the treasure is the heart will be also"—and, when the dealing men on the seaboard, shall find more profit in exporting American goods than in importing British manufactures, be assured we shall have little concern about the "deliverance of Europe;" and care not whether the French beat the Cossacks or the Cossacks beat the French. THAT TIME WILL COME; and it will be the political mellinism of the United States.

With the prospect of being speedily enabled to present this important document to our readers, we shall hasten to publish, as preparatory thereto, Mr. Hamilton's report, when secretary of the treasury, in 1790, on the then condition and future prospects of the United States, as to manufactures. This report, though one of the most luminous documents of its day, by the changes that have taken place, has become a curiosity—a sort of a "modern antiquity," on which we look with wonder to see how things once were, many, very many years ago.

The Friendly Indians.

A PROCLAMATION.—Whereas a number of Delaware and other Indians are collected with their families near Piqua, under the protection of the United States, and the chiefs and many of the warriors of the said Delawares and others have joined the troops of the United States under the command of major-general Harrison, and have recently on several occasions exhibited proofs of faithful adherence to the interests of the N. W. army:

And whereas several of the inhabitants of Ohio have been murdered by savages, and those murders attributed by some to the Indians collected near Piqua, because of their contiguity to those several scenes of destruction; and the resentment of many highly exasperated against those Indians, menacing, as I am informed, an indiscriminate vengeance upon them:

And further, as it is truly ascertained, that the British government has adopted and is aiming to carry into effect the insidious policy of promoting discord between the frontier inhabitants of Ohio and the neighboring Indians by sending their hostile Indians to commit murders in those neighborhoods, settlements and places where such murders would be likely (at first) to be chargeable on those Indians who are under the protection of the United States:

Thus inhumanly contriving such artful practices, to involve us in war with every Indian tribe, and deprive the commanding general of the N. W. army of the services of those chiefs and warriors who have joined his standard, at an approaching crisis when those services will be very important:—

I therefore exhort the good citizens of Ohio to endeavor to discover, as far as practicable, the authors of any murders committed on the frontiers of Ohio, that the murderers may be demanded, apprehended and punished with death, the chiefs first herein mentioned having at general Harrison's headquarters solemnly pledged themselves to deliver up to justice and execution any one of their tribes who shall have been guilty of any murder as aforesaid.

And I further forwarn all the good people of the state, against acts of indiscriminate revenge—that they take not justice into their own hands—and violate not the sanctity of treaties—nor disrespect the asylum established by the government—but that they would confide in the exertions of major-general Harrison, superintendent of Indian affairs, to examine into the past and guard against the future, pledging myself to aid at all times (with whatever force of Ohio shall be necessary) in the apprehension and punishment of any murderers whose tribes profess amity to the United States, when the murderer can be pointed out or the tribe to which he belongs designated. Hoping and expecting at the same time, that no rash or unauthorized measures either of individuals or assemblages should be taken so as to produce the baneful effects and we become the victims of that insidious British policy, and thus indirectly aid our enemy in effecting his scheme of embroiling us with those who wish to remain under the protection of the United States, and to deprive us of the aid of those now with the N. W. army, which to support is the duty of every citizen of Ohio.

RETURN J. MEIGS, Governor of Ohio.

Marietta, Sept. 12th, 1815.

The preceding proclamation is predicated on the following letter:—

Head-Quarters, Seneca Towne,
September 4th, 1815.

DEAR SIR,—Information recently received has satisfied me, that the Delaware Indians near Piqua are in great danger from the resentment of the people in that quarter.

I regret that any portion of the community should thus venture to compromit the public faith and to violate engagements solemnly entered into. I regret it the more, as the policy on the part of the enemy to produce such a state of things, and to excite discord and collisions between our own people and the Indians attached to our cause, is too manifest to escape observation, and facts which have come to my knowledge convince me, that this obvious course Revolution in Mexico.

Don JOSE BERNARDO GUTIERRES, commander in chief of the Northern Mexican army, and governor of the new state of Texas, to the friends of the patriotic cause, and freemen of all nations!

FRIENDS OF THE MEXICAN CAUSE!—The independence of Texas, a desideratum long looked for and greatly wished by all nations except Great Britain and Spain in Europe, is at length accomplished! After a long and tedious warfare, I have happily succeeded to erect the standard of union and liberty in the capital of Texas! That sacred banner is venerated by the Mexican patriots, and feared by the enemies of human liberty. We have one and all assumed the honored name of FREEMEN. Thus far have my brave countrymen become the warm and immutable advocates of independence, peace, and free commerce. By their gallant behaviour in their glorious struggle against the usurpations of royal minions, have they evinced to all nations, that their revolution is just in its origin—useful in its progress, and honorable in its termination. The unaltered friends of Ferdinand VII. now at the disposition of France, alone say that the advocates of our institution are the oppressors of the people and the plunderers of their trade. But they shall more than ever feel the power and vengeance of an injured people, who but yesterday became sensible of the injuries done them, under the old government.

Inordinate ambition and the insatiable cupidity of ungrateful despots no longer disturb the repose of him who knows no other right than justice. The people of Texas are now united, and have convinced the enemies of republican governments that their energy dies not in a day, but may always be called out to defend their infant state against oppression. They have asserted their rights in the face of Heaven, and will not suffer them to be polluted by the black and contaminating hand of despotism. The example, the wise receipts of the immortal Hialgo, whose soul "reposes in the bosom of his father and his God," is still before their eyes. These are the assertions of those who followed me to the field, and these are the undeniable rights they claim of nature and of man. A great portion of New Spain indicates a will to oppose them.—They are not yet settled from war in case their power is doubted. Hence let her royal heroes fear and tremble.

The brave Americans who stood the siege of La Bahia, now triumph over their enemies and honor the strength of their arms. They have united themselves with the immortal Mexicans as brothers, as freemen, and as men defending the same just cause which liberates the slave, ameliorates the overbearing wants of the poor. Their souls are united in council, and their arms are mingled in the field.—The same sacred and mighty light that sleeps in clouds and illumines the one, warms the generous soul of the other. Happy union! immortal patriots! what a conquest have they gained! What imperishable fame have they quickly acquired!

Seventy-nine days had the Mexican colors been unfurled at St. Fernando de Bexar, when they were insulted by the pride of Elexondo, who planted the royal standard in sight of the capital! the ardent spirit of patriotism which warmed the bosom of my invincible troops, burst forth with redoubled vigor, on discovering a superior force stationed within the limits of their free and independent territory.—Though the misfortunes, vicissitudes and ravages of war are inevitable and well known to all who have borne arms in defence of the patriotic cause, their courage was not less stimulated, and the prudent measures taken to strengthen our means of defence, policy has been adopted, and unless its effects are immediately checked, it promises to be but too successful. I trust the authority of your excellency, aided by the good sense of the community, will be sufficient to prevent those Indians from being sacrificed to false impressions and angry passions. Did I suppose that any of these were concerned in the recent murders and depredations committed upon the frontiers, I would lose no time in procuring their apprehension and bringing them to justice. I am assured by their chiefs, now here, that in case it can be proven, they will immediately apprehend and surrender them to the civil authority of the country.—This is all the most rigid justice can demand. The conduct of the Shawanese upon a late and similar occasion, ought to satisfy every one that they are disposed to listen to and redress every complaint when properly made and supported. When one of their young men in July last shot one of our citizens, he was immediately apprehended by the chiefs and surrendered to general Wingate at St. Mary's; two of these very Delaware Indians who have been most strongly suspected, have lately proven their fidelity in a very exemplary manner, by the rescue of one of our officers from a party of hostile Indians. I request your excellency to take immediate steps to afford security to these people. They have thrown themselves upon us for protection. The faith of the country has been solemnly pledged that this protection shall be afforded them.

Many of their warriors are now here rendering important service to the army. If any man has just cause of complaint against them, let him come forward; he shall be heard and redressed. Were I not correctly convinced that the suspicions against these people are groundless, I should be one of the last men in the country to lend them countenance and support.

But a long acquaintance with them gives me some right to judge, and their recent conduct, present situation and future hopes, convince me that their fidelity to the United States is unquestionable. To attempt indiscriminately to murder these people, would inflict a blot upon the national honor which would never be effaced. It would drive every Indian, in their own defence, to take up arms against us, and it would afford to the enemy a subject of rejoicing to find us pursuing a course of conduct, only to be paralleled by the tragic scenes of Hampton. I yet hope the information I have received upon this subject may prove erroneous, and that my countrymen will still manifest that sacred regard to public faith, which has heretofore characterized the government and community. But the crisis is so important, and the subject so interesting in every point of view, that I should have deemed myself culpable had I not requested you to direct your attention to it.

In a personal interview with your excellency, I could give you many reasons for my opinions, but as they ought not to be committed to paper, I must rest satisfied with making this communication.

I am, dear sir, with great regard,
Your humble servant,

(Signed) Wm. HENRY HARRISON.

His excellency R. J. Meigs.

P. S. I have been informed that the man whose wife was killed near Piqua asserts, that he knew the Indian who killed her to be a Delaware. There are persons now here who were at Brownstown, when her scalp was brought in by a party of the prophet's Indians.

were not until now increased. The greater the danger the more firm their resolution of opposing the perfidious intentions of a vile and sanguinary foe, who defend that odious system of oppression which has too long deprived them of the enjoyment of the most trivial privileges that preserve harmony in society—a foe whose demeanor and ostentation become offensive to the most common mind, and whose pursuit is one continued system of fraud, treachery, bribery and unheard of crimes!

That divine justice which punishes the perjured and ungrateful, once more invited them to the field where their heroic virtues and much admired patriotism were put to the test. Elesondo headed in person an army of 16,000 strong. He assured his troops we would never give them battle, and that he would consume us within the narrow walls of the capital. On the 18th of June last, we offered him battle with only 750 strong. He fled before us in confusion and despair. On the 20th of the same month and the same hour, resolved on victory or death, my little band of renovated heroes appeared before them on the banks of El Charco del Alazan arrayed for battle, and took them on surprise. After a severe engagement of two hours and a half the republican standard was planted central of the enemy's camp! Elesondo was the first that fled—his troops soon after were completely conquered, dispersed, and the field covered with his dead and wounded! The sun had not yet sunk in the bosom of the west, when I returned to the capital with the enemy's standard at my feet, stained with their own blood!

The plains of Charco del Alazan, where the heroes of La Bahia and Salado so nobly distinguished themselves, shall never again be stained with the pure blood of renowned patriots. Aradondo attempted to avenge the wrongs of Elesondo. He came as far as Lareda, where reason taught him that freemen never can be conquered. He has fled to the Rio del Norte, where his troops are hourly deserting to republican armies in their interior—"Dio la miliede, guai a chi la tocor?"

The liberties of Texas are now perfectly secure. The strength of our arms is known by all the royal troops. Ryan is endeavoring to unite his powerful forces with mine, and the inhabitants of Cogquilla will rise against their oppressors the moment we commence our march to defend them, when the successful blow is given.

I may therefore invite freemen from all nations to share in the conquests I have gained, and enjoy unmolested the rights and privileges of Mexican citizens. Not far distant is that welcome period when all New Spain will cease to nourish her oppressors. The old system of monarchy is about to expire, and the love of freedom pervade the breast of all men. Her trade and commerce will no longer be confined to one or two powers, but the whole universe enjoy a portion of her unknown riches.— Vera Cruz will cease to be the only port by which the provinces will be supplied with foreign trade.— The industrious patriot will hail with ecstasy and joy, the slow moving vessel that gently glides upon the waters of Matagorda, which comes to supply Texas—also Cogquilla on the west, and New San Antonio on the south. The northern and eastern frontiers of Texas receives, by land, the trade of the Ohio, Missouri and a great part of the state of Louisiana.— All the bays and harbors of the gulph of Mexico and California will be opened in a short time to the trade of all commercial powers. The wealth of Potosi will be divided among those who merit the enjoyment of her stores. Spain will be a theatre on which millions wish to act a distinguished part.— In fine, the universe will court her for her wealth, and admire her for the liberal government that protects her.

Freemen of all nations! The fertile plains of Texas will no more be stained with the precious blood of patriots. Here you may enjoy life according to your wishes; here peace and comfort will smile, must smile, on renovated Mexicans, until the end of time.

To the immortal sons of Columbia am I indebted for this favorable change in the government of my country. The strength of their arms has weakened the pride and insupportable arrogance of my enemies. Worthy people? you are certainly entitled to more honors than I can pay you. I offer you as a tribute of respect the gratitude of a young but virtuous government and a peaceful habitation among the grateful Mexicans, who know how to appreciate your worth and stimulate your ambition to serve them in the hour of danger.

Done at the government house of St. Fernando de Bexar, July 4, 1813, and the third year of our Independence. BERNARDO GUTIEREZ.

University of Maryland.

At a meeting of the faculty of physick of the University of Maryland, on the 17th of August, 1813, a committee was appointed to examine into and report the present state of the Institution. The following report was presented at a meeting held on the 19th inst.

"The committee appointed on the 17th inst. to inquire into the state of the Medical Department of the Institution beg leave to REPORT—

"That they have examined the state of the Institution and congratulate the regents and the friends of medical literature generally, on the flourishing condition and flattering prospects of the University. Notwithstanding the numerous difficulties incident to the organization of a new and extensive establishment, the perseverance and industry of the building committee have surmounted every obstacle.

"That the building for the accommodation of the professors and the different classes, was commenced on the 7th May, 1812, and so far advanced as to admit all the professors in the course of the last winter.

"The apartments provided for the classes are more spacious and convenient than any other in America, and deemed inferior to none in Europe.

"That the professor of chemistry and mineralogy, has been occupied during the recess of the classes, in improving his apparatus and in augmenting and arranging his mineralogical collection.

"That the greatest attention has been given to making such arrangements as will most promote the cultivation of anatomy; such preparations also as were necessary to the professorship of midwifery, have been provided—and that the professor of the principles and practice of surgery, is abundantly furnished with such drawings, preparations, models and instruments as have been introduced into the best schools of Europe.

"That the various branches of medical science will be taught as follows: Institutes of principles of physick—by John B. Davidge, M. D.

Anatomy—by James Cocke, M. D.

Principles and practice of surgery—by Wm. Gibson, M. D.

Chemistry—by Elisha De Butts, M. D.

Materia Medica—by Samuel Baker, M. D.

Midwifery—by Richard W. Hall, M. D.

Practice of physick—by Nathaniel Potter, M. D.

"The lectures will commence on the last Monday in October, and terminate on the 1st of March."

Law of the U. States.—Seamen.

The bill for the "regulation of seamen on board the public and private vessels of the United States" has already been inserted in the REGISTER. But it underwent some alteration, and the law, as passed and approved, is so very important to a consideration of the merits of the contest in which we are engaged with England, that we insert it from the official copy, for easy reference.]

An act for the regulation of seamen on board the public and private vessels of the United States.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, That from and after the termination of the war in which the United States are now engaged with Great Britain, it shall not be lawful to employ on board any of the public or private vessels of the United States any person or persons except citizens of the United States, or persons of color, native of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the time when this act shall take effect, it shall not be lawful to employ as aforesaid any naturalized citizen of the United States, unless such citizen shall produce to the commander of the public vessel, or to a collector of the customs, a certified copy of the act by which he shall have been naturalized, setting forth such naturalization and the time thereof.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in all cases of private vessels of the United States sailing from a port in the United States to a foreign port, the list of the crew, made as heretofore directed by law, shall be examined by the collector for the district from which the vessel shall clear out, and, if approved of by him, shall be certified accordingly. And no person shall be admitted or employed as aforesaid, on board of any vessel aforesaid, unless his name shall have been entered in the list of the crew, approved and certified by the collector for the district from which the vessel shall clear out as aforesaid. And the said collector, before he delivers the list of the crew, approved and certified as aforesaid, to the captain, master or proper officer of the vessel to which the same belongs, shall cause the same to be recorded in a book by him for that purpose to be provided, and the said record shall be open for the inspection of all persons, and a certified copy thereof shall be admitted in evidence in any court in which any question may arise, under any of the provisions of this act.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the president of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized from time to time to make such further regulations, and to give such directions to the several commanders of public vessels, and to the several collectors, as may be proper and necessary respecting the proofs of citizenship, to be exhibited to the commanders and collectors aforesaid: Provided, that nothing contained in such regulations or directions shall be repugnant to any of the provisions of this act.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That from and after the time this act shall take effect, no seaman or other seafaring man, not being a citizen of the United States, shall be admitted as a passenger on board any public or private vessel of the U. States, in a foreign port, without permission in writing from the proper officers of the country of which such citizen or seafaring man may be subject or citizen.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That from and after the time that this act shall take effect, the consuls and commercial agents of any nation at peace with the United States shall be admitted (under such regulations as may be prescribed by the president of the United States) to state their objections to the proper commander or collector as aforesaid, against the employment of any seaman on board of any public or private vessel of the United States, on account of his being a native citizen or subject of such nation, and not embraced within the description of persons who may be lawfully employed according to the provisions of this act; and the said consuls or commercial agents shall also be admitted under said regulation, to be present at the time when the proofs of citizenship of the persons against whom such objections may have been made, shall be investigated by such commander or collector.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That if any commander of a public vessel of the United States, shall knowingly employ or permit to be employed, or shall admit or receive, or permit to be admitted or received, on board his vessel, any person whose employment or admission is prohibited by the provisions of this act, he shall on conviction thereof forfeit and pay the sum of one thousand dollars for each person thus unlawfully employed or admitted on board such vessel.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, contrary to the prohibitions of this act, be employed, or be received on board of any private vessel, the master or commander, and the owner or owners of such vessel, knowing thereof, shall respectively forfeit and pay five hundred dollars for each person thus unlawfully employed or received, in any one voyage; which sum or sums shall be recovered, although such seaman or person shall have been admitted and entered in the certified list of the crew aforesaid, by the collector for the district to which the vessel may belong; and all penalties and forfeitures arising under or incurred by virtue of this act, may be sued for, prosecuted and recovered, with cost of suit, by action of debt, and shall accrue and be one moiety thereof to the use of the person who shall sue for the same, and the other moiety thereof to the use of the United States.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained, shall be construed to prohibit any commander or master of a public or private vessel of the United States, whilst in a foreign port or place, from receiving any American seamen in conformity to law or supplying any deficiency of seamen on board such vessel, by employing American seamen or subjects of such foreign country, the employment of whom shall not be prohibited by the laws thereof.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall have no effect or operation with respect to the employment, as seamen, of the subjects or citizens of any foreign nation which shall not, by treaty or special convention with the government of the United States, have prohibited on board of her public and private vessels the employment of native citizens of the United States who have not become citizens or subjects of such nation.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed so to prevent any arrangement between the United States and any foreign power which may take place under any treaty or convention, made and ratified in the manner prescribed by the constitution of the United States.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That no person who shall arrive in the United States, from and after the time when this act shall take effect, shall be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, who shall not for the continual term of five years next preceding his admission as aforesaid, have resided within the United States, without being, at any time during the said five years, out of the territory of the United States.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall falsely make, forge or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged or counterfeited, any certificate, or evidence of citizenship referred to in this act; or shall pass, utter, or use, as true, any false, forged or counterfeited certificate of citizenship, or shall make sale or dispose of any certificate of citizenship to any person other than to the person for whom it was originally issued, and to whom it may of right belong, every such person shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of felony; and on being thereof convicted, by due course of law, shall be sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labor for a period not less than three or more than five years, or be fined in a sum not less than five hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars, at the discretion of the court taking cognizance thereof.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, that no suit shall be brought for any forfeiture or penalty incurred under the provisions of this act, unless the suit be commenced within three years from the time of the forfeiture.

Trial for Piracy.

LONDON, July 6.—High court of admiralty.—Yesterday the high court of admiralty, for the trial of offences committed on the high seas, was opened before Sir W. Scott, in the justice hall of Newgate, with the accustomed solemnities.

PIRACY.

John Wiltshire, alias Jonathan Bowers, alias John Wright, alias John Reley, a native of Plymouth, and Chas. Conolly, a native of Ireland, stood indicted for having piratically sailed in a privateer called the True Blooded Yankee, under color of an American commission, on the high seas where they aided, assisted, and comforted divers armed men in the capture of vessels appertaining to the sovereign or the subjects of England.

It appeared that the True Blooded Yankee was fitted out as an American privateer by certain citizens of Boston, in the harbor of Brest, about the commencement of the year. She was armed with 16 guns, and carried a complement of 175 men, 20 of whom were French. About the latter end of December, Charles Conolly entered on board of his own free will, and on the 28th March, the prisoner Wiltshire was put on board by two armed men, under the name of Reley. On the 1st day of March, 1813, this privateer sailed, and on entering the British channel she gave chase to a merchant ship, fitted with several guns for her, but she escaped by superior swiftness of sailing. They proceeded to the coast of Ireland, where they chased and captured a vessel before the lights of Wicklow exhibited. Margaret, and put an American prize-master, with six sailors, on board, and removed the greater part of her crew.—The two prisoners at the bar were of the number put on board; Wiltshire carried a dink canoe loaded with his clothes and sometimes managed the helm.—Conolly was unarmed, but performed duty in common with the other sailors. They proceeded for Morlaix, when they were captured by the Namrod cutter, and carried into Plymouth. There they were put on board the Salvador del Mundo, where they were suspected to be natives of Britain, by Mr. Farham, the master at arms, but they both denied the circumstance.

Two persons proved the identity of Wiltshire as an Englishman. Concerning the birth place of Conolly, there was no evidence.

The prisoner, Wiltshire, in his defence, said, he had been confined three years in a French dungeon, and anxious to see the light of day, he pretended that he was an American, without being conscious of war being declared, upon which two armed men carried him on board the privateer, where they left him. His mortification was intolerable when he discovered he was to be armed against his native country, and he sailed with a sore heart. When the Margaret was captured, he, with six others, were put on board, and he formed the design of carrying the vessel into Liverpool, which he communicated to the helmsman, who discovered it to the prize-master, and he was most carefully watched in consequence. He had served his country long, had lost blood in her service, and he prayed for the mercy of the court.

Conolly said he was a native of Ireland, and had been carried to America in his youth.

Justice Chambre, in summing up the evidence, pointed out the necessity of acquitting Conolly, inasmuch as there was no proof of his being a native of either Britain or Ireland.

The Jury immediately found Wiltshire guilty, and acquitted Conolly.

Sir Wm. Scott, in passing sentence of death on the prisoner, said that the circumstances which he had mentioned in extenuation of his guilt should be represented to those from whom mercy, under his present situation could only flow.—The prisoner bowed and retired.

No. VII.

PILLAGE AND DESTRUCTION OF PRIVATE PROPERTY ON THE CHESAPEAKE BAY, AND IN THE NEIGHBORING COUNTRY

William Sears, of Talbot county, in Maryland, states, that about the 10th day of April last, whilst the British squadron, commanded as he understood, by Admiral Warren, lay about Storr's island, in the Chesapeake bay, he being on the island, called Poplar island, his place of residence, observed some tenders and barges coming off from the squadron in a direction towards the said island. The report was then in the act of removing his furniture and other property from the island, and hastened therefrom, giving the appropriate alarm of the enemy; but the said tenders and barges, whilst this report was crossing to the main with his cows and his wax taken with his property, and in tow of his schooners, appeared suddenly to put back, to their ships. The report afterwards, in the afternoon and evening of the same day made two other trips to the island and succeeded in getting off all his bacon. On the succeeding day, as this report thinks it was, he again went on the island and got off forty or fifty barrels of his corn and some other articles, without any interruption from the enemy. The report having, in his first trip, got off his family and slaves, he now watched the movements of the enemy from his farm on the main. On Sunday morning the 12th he saw two tenders come to at Poplar island and go ashore in barges, and after same length of time he saw them depart from the island. The re-lator, in the afternoon of the last mentioned day, in company with several of his neighbors, went to see what the enemy had done on the island, and found that they had burned nothing, nor taken any thing away except some cedar from the wharf. The re-lator then took off with him as many of his boys and other articles as he could, and was burned off by seeing the enemy part off from the wharf with several barges in tow of their enemies. The enemy, on that evening, took possession of the island, and remained that night and part of the next day, as well as in the relator's recollection; and on the last mentioned day, left the island and followed the squadoon, which in the mean time had moved up the bay. The re-lator seeing this, on the next or second day after, again went on the island, and there found that the enemy had taken and killed about thirty head of black cattle, forty-six head of old sheep and between twenty and thirty lambs; that they had killed three hundred brooding sows in their yards, whose pigs were found dead; and that they had taken of almost all their poultry, all he supposes they could catch. From his house (which he had left some of his worst furniture) he valued taken of a pair of lookingglass worth about four dollars, and some newspapers in a pile.—

 They broke several locks and one door, and had many things about the house. In a house on the island which had been occupied by James Sears, they broke his desk to pieces and took away his furniture and other things, but the re-lator does not now recollect what they there were taken away.

In testimony whereof, the said William Sears hath hereunto set his hand this 22d day of June, 1813.

WILLIAM SEARS.

Maryland, Talbot county, ss.

Be it remembered, that on this 22d day of June, 1813, William Sears, esq. of Talbot county, personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace of the state of Maryland, in and for Talbot county, duly commissioned and qualified, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists, that the statement of fact herein contained is substantially true, to the best of his knowledge, recollection and belief.

PETER DENNY.

State of Maryland, Talbot county, to wit:

I hereby certify, that Peter Denny, esq. before whom the above affidavit appears to have been made, and who has there subscribed his name, was at the time of taking and signing the same, and still is one of the state of Maryland's justices of the peace, in and for the county aforesaid, duly commissioned and qualified.

In testimony whereof, I have here to set my hand and affixed the seal of my office, this twenty-fourth day of June, Anno Domini 1813.

J. COB LOCKERMAN,
 Clerk of Talbot county court.

Cecil county, state of Maryland.

Personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for the county and state aforesaid, Frisby Henderson, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that on the 27th day of April, 1813, about seven o'clock, A.M. a considerable British force, distributed into thirteen barges, commenced a hostile attack on a landing called Frenchtown, the property of this deponent, in the county aforesaid; that some days previous thereto, a battery for five guns had been commenced on the wharf, but was in an unfinished state; that on the approach of the British force eight or ten men collected and commenced firing from the battery, and stopped the advance of the barge for some time. The ammunition being expended, the barge then came on and a firing from them commenced against the wharf, and also at the dwelling-houses in Frenchtown. The British then landed on the wharf and from thence set fire to a new store-house on the wharf, which at that time contained nothing but a large quantity of oats, the property of this deponent, and also a factory of making the wharf was set on fire at the same time; after burning the said store-house and factory, a force of about two hundred and fifty marines was marched from the wharf through Frenchtown to the river shore to the dwelling-house of the deponent, and descended the way to the town of Elkton; that finding the river must be crossed on that direction to go to Elkton, the whole force returned to Frenchtown, broke open the upper store-house, which was at that time full of goods, part of which was the property of the United States, and the remainder for different merchants of Baltimore, to the amount, probably, of fifty or sixty thousand dollars, and plundered and carried off part of the goods, and set fire to the house and burnt it with the remainder of the goods. This deponent saith, that the two store-houses and the fishery, together with the out-ous and other property he had in the upper store-house, burned by the British as aforesaid, he has sustained a loss of about three thousand dollars.

Personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for the county aforesaid, Cordelia Pennington living in Frenchtown, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that she saw the British on the 29th of April, 1813, land on the wharf at Frenchtown and immediately set fire to and burnt the store-house and fishery; that on the British breaking open the upper store-house, this deponent went down to the storehouse and collected the commanding officer not to burn the house;
 he replied that he came for the purpose of burning the store-houses, that they were public property; that this deponent replied, that the store-houses were private property and belonged to her husband; the officer said that it was public property in it and should be burnt, and ordered the house set on fire and burnt it with all the goods they did not carry away.

Personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for the county aforesaid, Della Pennington, and she deposes on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that she saw the British on the 29th of April, 1813, land on the wharf at Frenchtown and immediately set fire to and burnt down the store-house and fishery; that after the store-house was on fire, the marines were marched on from the wharf and set fire to the house of the deponent and burning the upper store-house the marines were found at the pond opposite her mother's house, the officer commanding the marines, who informed this deponent his name was Wagoner, and their orders were to burn the store-house and destroy the store-house; that on this deponent's objection of his not to burn the store-house and fishery, the officer replied, the question they generally asked would they want any place was, how they voted on the objection, and he signed of this deponent if not made, causing
 Mr. Henderson, voted for the war.

I do hereby certify, that on the morning of the 6th of May last, I was impressed at my house in Frenchtown, by the British forces as they passed up the river Saratoga to Frenchtown and George town, and I was forced to accompany them to the above places. On our way up we were met by a committee in a boat from Elkton, Capt. Byng (the name of the deponent of the office) in whose boat I was, took a white man, Kerchiff, instead of a his companion, and was about to enter the battans when the negro's in order to proceed up the river to inform the officer commanding there, that if he would not fire upon the barge they would not destroy the town, when he was ordered by the admiral to do so, who observed, that the town would only be saved by the negro's with the message, that as they were known to the people in the town he expected that they would believe what they told them. We were then opposite to Mr. Wagoner's farm, which I think must be about a mile below the town. The battans with the negro's went to the fort in the town and the British force's soon after followed. I was in the fore part of boat and continued in said boat until their return down the river after burning the town, when I was asked on Mr. Wagoner's ship, and most positively declare that there was no white flag ever hoisted in her or any of the other boats to my knowledge, nor did I ever hear any of the British officers or privates say that they had ever hoisted a flag, or that one ever had been fired on.

The captain, on his return down the river, declared, that if he could catch color I Wagoner, was commanded at the fort above, he would quarter him and give one part of his quarter for steaks, for that the British had no food was out of Washington's rounds.

I can't say positively what number of men they lost, as they would only reckon five wounded, but think they have sustained a greater injury.

Given under my hand this 9th day of June, 1813.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for the county and state aforesaid, Peter's Point on the 6th of May, when a squadron of British barges visited Frenchtown, that I had a full view of all the barges until they got possession of the battery on the Cecil shore, and that I saw no white flag hoisted from any of the barges.

 June 9th, 1813.

We, the undersigned, do certify, that on the 5th of May last, at the time when the Commodore's fleet of vessels arrived at and force attacked and destroyed the Frenchtown, on the 5th of May, on the river in the state of Maryland, we were on the river as aforesaid below French-town, and in the company of Colonel Thomas W. Wagoner, from our position, we saw a full and perfect view of the enemy's hostile movement, and were not only with it, or present or followed it, but witnessed or saw the appearance of a flag of truce, according to the established usage of civilized nations.

We had a staff of a flag of truce to be a standard for a public purpose, accompanied by men without arms, and unprotected by a naval or military force.

The barge above on the river in disobedience and contempt of the leading flag, a few men landed on the shore, and to be arrested Commander's, except a wounded man, and was rescued by not less than 2 fifteen armed men and a boat of about an hundred and fifty men, and were only apprehended by a commanding officer and with hostile intentions.

Given under our hands this 10th day of June, 1813.

The poor miserable tool Ferdinand was charged by his own father with a design to murder him, and acknowledged by his mother (a wanton strumpet) to be the fruit of her intercourse with Galley, a low-lived and infamous creature. But this does not lessen the infamy of Napoleon's conduct, in my opinion; though it should have great weight with those who reverence the blood of princes. Will they agree with me that monarchy is altogether a roguery?—and cease to rant about the cause of liberty in Spain, to be elicited by the British, who destroy liberty in Sicily?—Will they make in repressing and repelling every thing that avows monarchy, and cleave to their public as the last hope of freedom, and unite in exciting a "holy hatred" of kings, and every thing that belongs to them?

The following is a copy of a letter addressed by the queen of Sicily to the British ambassador, previous to her leaving the country; which none of the English above alluded to, have yet noticed in their newspapers:—

"Lord Bentinck—Notwithstanding the present extraordinary and irregular proceeding of your court, to force me, the queen of the two Sicilies, by firch ambaſſades of Austria, to abandon, after an union of 35 years, the King my spouse, and my family, to retire into my native country, under the specious but false pretexts—sometimes of my pretended correspondence with the common enemy, [an atrocious calumny! of which I defy any one to bring the slightest valid proof,] and sometimes the violent propensity I betrayed, as it is said, to create obstacles to the project of the English government to change the constitution under which Sicily has existed so many ages; notwithstanding, I am very far from acknowledging the authority of the British government, of which God has rendered me quite independent by birth, I do not feel less the necessity of submitting to the order it prescribes; since this submission appears the only means of preserving the interest of my family, to which having devoted myself during the whole of my toilsome career, I do not hesitate to make this last sacrifice, though it may, perhaps, cost me my life.

"I declare, then, to you, my Lord, and through you to your court, that, to this consideration only, and not to any other, I yield—and am ready to set out towards the end of the present month, to return to the Dominions of the emperor of Austria, my august kinsman and nephew.

"I must decline going to Sardinia, as I do not choose to be separated from every branch of my family, and as, at my time of life, the separation must be expected to be final; I wish likewise to avoid dying in a foreign land.

"I wish that in making the arrangements for my return to my native country, the voyage may be rendered as short and as little toilsome as possible; my age, and my health destroyed by twenty years of pain, of chagrin, and persecution of every kind, do not even leave me the hope of terminating this journey.

"In submitting to this act of violence, as I cannot nor ought not to forget what is due to my birth and rank, I demand, I crum, the previous execution of the following conditions; and I am persuaded, my Lord, that you will both consent and hasten the fulfilment of them.

"1. That an arrangement shall be made to secure to my creditors payments of their demands, not being willing to quit Sicily, and fall in so sacred a duty. I demand also, that measures shall be taken for the restitution of my diamonds, which are deposited in the bank of Palermo.

"2. There shall be delivered to me, as soon as possible, a sum equal to the expences of a journey so long and so remote as I shall be compelled to undertake, with a retinue befitting the rank in which providence has placed me.

"3. That there shall be secured to me a sum sufficient to sustain this rank in the country to which I shall retire, and that it shall be paid every 6 months in a trance,

"4. That permission to depart shall be granted to every person whom I may be willing to attach to my service, and to that of my son Leopold, who accompanies his unfortunate mother; and that those who receive pay from me, or pensions from the Sicilian government, shall receive an assurance that they shall be transmitted wherever I may rest.

"5. Lastly, that there shall be placed at my disposition, a frigate belonging to the King, a corvette, and the necessary transports, on board which my retinue and my equipage may be embarked; and I request to have the appointment of the captain of the frigate, for my particular tranquility, being in the greatest dread of travelling by sea.

"I have reason to believe, my Lord, that you will find nothing but is reasonable and convenient in my demands, the execution of which is indispensable to a journey as long as it is toilsome, and to which your government compels me.——Your instructions, according to my information from England, are to make use of your influence over the Sicilian government, to dispose it to make all necessary and convenient arrangements which may be required. If you have hitherto demonstrated extreme perseverance and firmness in obliging me to make a sacrifice of my existence, I have reason to hope, my Lord, that without you depart from the orders of your court, you will maintain the same character in order to insure the last days of a princeless, the victim of all kind of misfortunes, and to whom your government, and the English nation itself, will one day or other tender the justice that she merits.

"I transmit you this letter by the hands of general Macfarlane, to whom I owe infinite gratitude and thanks for the delicate manner in which he has borne himself towards me and which makes me desirous of continuing to receive through him, any further explanations of their painful affair.

"I beg you will offer my compliments to lady Bentinck, whose feeling heart, I am persuaded, participates and deplores my unmerited sufferings.

April, 1813."

Events of the Year.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Russian Mediation.—"On this subject, so interesting to every class of our readers, (says the National Intelligencer) no further official information, we believe, has yet been received by government. The British ministerial prints ridicule the idea of accepting the mediation of any third power and employ all their influence, such as it is, against it. And we have no recent circumstance on which we place much reliance, which favors the idea of its acceptance by the British government. The only indication of any disposition on the part of the British government to respect the friendly interference of Russia, is the intimation contained in the late English papers that Lord Walpole has sailed for St. Petersburg; with what object is not stated. A gentleman of high respectability, now in London, writing to his friend in this country however, suggests an opinion, or rather a hope prevalent in certain circles in England, that our ministers will not be suffered to leave St. Petersburg without an effort by the British authorities towards an amicable settlement of our differences. This hope, frail as it is, is all we have to rely on; and we have thought it proper to state our views of the subject, to prevent erroneous impressions in this respect from gaining ground."

It is stated that our people are very scantily fed and basely treated, at Quebec. Many of them die daily. "British humanity."

It is the infamous capt. BURTON, who suffered his school-fellow capt. Hart, of Kentucky, to be murdered by the savages, that was on board the British fleet on Erie, and now is a prisoner. The whole are marched to Chillicothe. If they were sent round to Canada, by the way of New Orleans, it would be a just retaliation for the proceedings of the enemy, in this respect.

The lieutenant in the navy, who had charge of the public stores which were set fire to at Sackett's Harbor in May last, was arrested by order of com. Chauncey, on a charge of cowardice, tried by a court martial, and most honorably acquitted on that charge; but ordered to receive a private reprimand for not putting fire to the stores sooner than he reluctantly did, as required by his superior officer.

Some hints are thrown out that induces us to believe that the very valuable cargo of the British brig Ann, sent a prize, and a good prize, into Newbern, was expressly shipped at Liverpool to be smuggled into the United States. We rejoice that the goods have changed owners. It is intimated that some folks in Baltimore had a concern in this business.—We pray that they may be executed.

Flour has risen in Baltimore to 7 or 8 dollars per barrel. Immense quantities are going on by inland conveyance, to the eastern ports, "not blockaded," where, by "neutrals," it goes direct to Halifax. This must be stopped. It is disgraceful beyond precedent, and injurious beyond calculation. Perd the forces of the enemy, and let him smuggle his goods into the United States, and he will gladly agree that the war shall last forever. The export of provisions should be absolutely prohibited. The states that are the growers would rejoice at such a law, for they honestly want peace; and very well know that the only way to obtain an honest peace is to give all possible effect to the war. Those who have nothing to sell will oppose such a law; but we hope it will pass immediately on the meeting of congress, and that every resource of the country will be pointed to the common object of distressing the enemy, as leading to justice.

Singular present.—An officer belonging to the Five fleet, has sent as a present to his friend, Mr. Clay, speaker of the house of Representatives of the United States, the NAIL with which the British commodore had fastened his flag to the mast. How pitiful after that, to strike to an inferior force? But our tars know better "how to nail'em."

The enemy squadrons off New-London and in the Cheapeake have been very quiet and peaceable since our last.

Mr. Larcher (says the Albany Argus) a member of the Troy Greens, and the only one of that corps, we are told, who turned out at the call of his country, states in the last Northern Budget, that one political party offered to provide for his family if he went into the service, and the other political party offered to pay his fine if he would stay at home.

British frigates.—The enemy is building many vessels apparently for the express purpose of fighting for the opinion of the vulgar; and to regain, in the estimation of the multitude, the honor he has lost. We say of the "vulgar," because no well informed man can be duped by the names they give these new vessels, calling them razees or frigates, when in truth they are really ships of the line. For instance, we learn from a London paper, that the Achbar frigate, is fitting out at Woolwich, "to carry 64 very heavy guns." No doubt her main battery will consist of 42 pounders; and her strength and weight of metal be fully double that of our largest frigates.

A new frigate to be called the Java, is immediately to be built in England, of the following dimensions:—gun-deck 172 feet, keel 145, breadth 43, and 1450. She will be rated 50, but carry 64 guns.

The design of having a frigate of that name will probably be anticipated by the United States. We already have a Frolic and a Peacock in the water, and may have a Guerriere and a Java, in two or three months.

The surviving lieutenants of the Shannon, have been promoted to commanders.

The Lord Nelson, to carry 144 guns, was to be launched in England in August.

The whole mystery unveiled, or John Bull as cunning as any body!—LONDON, July 28.—The victories of the American ships, over the British frigates, are said to be attributable, in a great measure, to an improvement in their shot. The cartridge (instead of being made up in canvas,) is ascertained to have been cased with lead. This enabled them, it seems, to load with greater despatch, and to fire with additional effect—hence the destructive havoc of their broadsides. The commissioners of the admiralty are now in full possession of all the circumstances, which are stated to have been communicated by a lieutenant in our navy. Such, it is rumoured, are the consequences attached to this discovery, that an officer who made it, and gave the important information, has very properly, by way of reward, been promoted by their lordships to the command of a vessel.

VIOLATION OF CARTEL.—Captain Daniel Campbell, master of the cartel brig Anna Maria, lately arrived at New-Bedford, was forcibly dragged from his vessel by the lieutenant of a British press gang on the 26th of July just after the vessel had got under way at Falmouth, bound to Dartmouth, where she was to take in the American prisoners to bring to the United States. Capt. Campbell is a citizen of the United States, and has resided 17 years in this city, where his family still resides; his certificate of naturalization was taken from him, and he was taken on board a guard ship at Falmouth, and detained, so that the cartel was obliged to put to sea without him.

DAVON, (O.) September 12.—Extract of a letter from John Johnson, Esq. Indian agent at Plover, to the editors.—"I have information from Detroit that the British and their allies are in great confusion, and have no confidence in each other; a number of the Indians have gone home. Tecumseh and Round Head are said to be the only leaders that are determined to adhere to the enemy; they are the most popular, and of course have a considerable number of followers. It is my opinion however that when matters come to a crisis, the savages will shew their true character; and will abandon "the bulwark of our religion" to her fate."

Col. Gardiner, (says a Plattsburgh paper) appointed agent for prisoners in Quebec, from Boston, on his way thence, was turned back this side of Montreal, by the commanding officer on the station, who observed to him that they did not want an agent at Quebec—and requested him to return home.

MILITARY.

From the armies under Hampton, at Sackett's Harbor, or Fort George, we have no intelligence since our last. Of Harrison's movements some account will be found below.

Major Chapin with an adventurous party of volunteers, passed from Buffalo into Canada, on the 19th inst. for the purpose of surprising a British guard commanded by col. Warren; but the colonel is supposed to have anticipated the design, and had retired.

They, however, took several prisoners and some flour and blankets belonging to the enemy; but paid a scrupulous regard to the property of individuals. Gen. Porter, with a similar party, also crossed a day or two after, and marched some miles through the country without opposition. He brought four prisoners back with him.

A report prevailed at Chillicothe Sept. 23, that brig. gen. Tecumseh had been killed, and his aid had been taken prisoner, in a skirmish with a party of our spies.

A letter to the editor of the Democratic Press, dated Sept. 24, says—"Owing to the high premium offered by the British for horses, equipments, &c. several of our dragoons had deserted to them from Fort George, and were duly rewarded. A pretty sleek Yankee proposed playing them a trick in his own way, and obtained permission to desert; and on his arrival at the British camp he received the promised reward, and from his agreeable manners, soon became a favorite of the commanding general—after gaining all the information he wished, this modern Araspes returned to camp with general Vincent's domestics, best riding horses, &c. &c.—Gen. Vincent sent in a flag, demanding his horses as stolen; his demand was refused. A few days after two poor honest dragoons deserted; immediately on their being reported to general Vincent he ordered them shot—this being known generally, has effectually stopped any further movements of this kind of gentry.

"Many deserters arrive at Fort George every day. The Swiss and Germans now begin to find their way here from Kingston and Prescott, all would visit us, but for the difficulty of crossing the water, to obviate which, I expect we shall pass over in a few days, as preparations are in a state of forwardness for a movement.

Our men are getting in order for a fight, and I think when the day of trial arrives they will not be found wanting."

It is admitted that a dreadful sickness, as well as a great scarcity of provisions, prevails in Upper Canada. The Montreal papers dolefully announce both.

Extract of a letter from an officer of the U. S. army to the secretary of war dated

"CHILICOTHE, Sept. 28, 1813.

Although much has been said on the subject of the barbarities of our enemy to our countrymen, that the fortune of war have placed in their power, and which have been supported by proofs undeniable; even those honored with the proud name of Americans pretend to doubt the authenticity of their origin. I am, therefore, from a sense of duty to my country and my injured fellow brethren in arms, induced to make known to you a confirmation in part from the lips of a British officer now on his parole in this town, of the enormities committed on our soldiery at Raisin, and Miami, opposite fort Meigs, by the Indians under the command of gen. Proctor. In conversation with him, he informed me that after the surrender of the Kentuckians under col. Dudley at the Rapids of the Miami of the lakes, he was near general Proctor's tent when one of our unfortunate officers came up and asked the general 'where they were to be quartered?' that Proctor imperiously ordered him off—that the officer retired but a few yards, when he was met by a small party of Indians and inhumanly murdered under the eye of Proctor.

Another instance he relates of a soldier that was taken during the last siege of fort Meigs by a party of Indians and conducted to the British general's camp, painted black, (a mark they always affix to prisoners when sentence of death is pronounced on them); that some one of the officers (he thinks lieutenant col. Short lately killed at Sandusky) went to their general to intercede for the poor captive; that he was ordered off, and severely reprimanded for interesting himself in a 'damned Yankee;' and that shortly after, the prisoner was conducted and barbarously butchered in the face of the British army.

This same officer also relates a conversation that took place between Proctor and Tecumseh, in which the latter observed, 'I conquer to save, and you to murder.'

Vincennes, Ind. Sept. 18.—We are informed gen. Howard marched on the 4th inst. against the Indians with a force of from 2000 to 2500 men—against what point his force will be directed we are not informed—the next mail from the westward will no doubt furnish us with some particulars.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman at St. Louis, to his friend in Pittsburgh, dated August 27.

"An expedition is formed at this place to route the savages from the Illinois and Mississippi territories, to rendezvous on the 30th inst. about 30 miles from this place, and take up their line of march on the 1st of September. Gen. Howard commands the expedition which is to consist of 200 regular troops in boats, 3 companies U. S. Rangers each about 100 strong, 2 companies of old rangers, each 75 strong, and three companies of mounted militia, 100 strong each. The expedition will be 40 days out, and there is no doubt but we shall have to contend with powerful hordes of red skins, as our frontiers have been lined with them last summer, and have had frequent skirmishes with our regulars and rangers. Report says Dixon is come to the Upper Mississippi with cannon. I hope in my next to be able to give a good account of him and his savage associates."

A letter to the editor of the Register from the neighborhood of Erie, Pa. states that the enemy's fleet on the lake had been very scantily supplied with bad provisions, and confirms the many accounts we have had of the great scarcity of food in the upper province of Canada; so much so that the white war chief, the English gen. Proctor, had been compelled to dismiss a considerable part of his blood hounds. The writer exults at Perry's victory, and congratulates himself that that frontier is relieved from all apprehension of "the white or red savages."

The infamous Elliott, who is general Proctor's great scalping knife, is, we believe, a native of Maryland, and an uncle of the gallant capt. Elliott, of the navy, Perry's able second on the lake. One branch of the family were whigs, the other tories. The torism of Elliott satisfactorily accounts for his deeds.

NAVAL.

Oliver H. Perry, esq. master-commandant in the navy of the United States, and senior officer on lake Erie, acting as commodore, has been promoted to the rank of captain, by the president, in approbation of his gallant conduct in the late battle on the lake.

Capt. Oliver, of the Valiant, commanding off N. London, says it "cannot be true" that Perry has captured Barclay's fleet on lake Erie.

Capt. Barclay who commanded the British force on Erie, lost an arm in the battle of Trafalgar.—

The unfortunate man lost the other in his battle with Perry.

Decatur's squadron, at New London, fired a salute on receiving the news of Perry's victory. The bells of the town were also rung, and a salute fired from fort Trumbull. Brig. gen. Burbeck forbade a repetition at fort Griswold.

The battle on the lake.—At the moment that Perry commenced the action he hoisted, at his fore-top-gallant mast-head, a large flag, until then unseen by, and unknown to his officers, on which were these words legible to the whole fleet and to the enemy, "DON'T GIVE UP THE SHIP." This had a powerful effect. When he left the Lawrence she had only seven men fit for duty—and the commodore himself helped to fire the last gun that was serviceable, before he quitted her. Some of the British officers have arrived at Chillicothe. A Worthington, O. paper says, that the enemy had 300 killed in the action. Some of the prisoners have passed through that place, accommodated with horses, and furnished with every convenience. They speak of the battle as being one of the hottest ever fought, and acknowledge that the wind was very favorable to them; giving them an opportunity to use their long guns, (of which we had very few) and preventing our vessels from getting into close action, as all would have done, had it been possible.

The British papers call com. Rodgers "the Julius Cæsar" of America. And on its being reported that he had been captured by a 74, say, and we believe truly that "few events would give more satisfaction to the public than a visit from the commodore." They strangely hate, or wonderfully fear, this man. But they will by and bye learn that every officer is a Rodgers, and that every Rodgers is, at least, a Nelson. The lamented Burrows died more valiantly; and the fortunate Perry equalled him in the boldness of his Carings.

From the London Courier of July 20.

Several small squadrons have been detached in search of commodore Rodgers, and the other frigates which lately escaped out of the American ports. Commodore Rodgers having watered at North Bergen, sailed thence on the 2d inst. Lord A. Beauclerk sailed from St. Helen's on Thursday, with the Royal Oak and Seahorse; the hon. captain Paget is gone from Plymouth, with the Superb, Melampus, and Fly; and admiral Young has detached several frigates from his fleet, to go north about.

A cartel has arrived at New-York with 151 prisoners from St. Johns, Newfoundland.

About 60 sailors passed through Montgomery, N. Y. for the lakes, on the 24th inst. It is said the greater part of these have just returned from the British prison ships, immediately volunteering to fight for the acknowledgment of those rights that had been so grossly violated in their own persons.—They were impressed men, discharged at the beginning of the war, and held as prisoners for exchange.

Capt. Blyth, killed on board the Boxer, had distinguished himself at the conquest of Cayenne, and received of the prince regent of England a handsome present in money to purchase a sword or some other memorial. His opponent, the invincible Burrows, had little or no experience in the business of a battle, and the gallant McCall, (on whom the command of the Enterprise devolved) had never even seen a fight!

The Enterprise and Boxer.—A gentleman just arrived from the eastward, who was in St. Johns when the Boxer sailed from that port, on her last cruise, (says the Boston Patriot) states, that great exertions were made at St. Johns several days before the Boxer sailed by the government officers, as well as the magistrats of the place, to man and equip this vessel in a perfect manner to fight the Enterprise.—Capt. Blyth sailed with the most confident belief of speedily returning to port, crowned with the same laurels that decked the brow of capt. Broke. Indeed so confident was he of success, that he made promises to some of his crew before they entered on board his ship, that they should form a part of the prize crew to conduct the Enterprise to Halifax.—No American, that has a soul within him, can help feeling additional exultation and pride at the glorious issue of this engagement, when he is informed of the high expectation which the British entertained of succeeding in all naval battles which should follow the victory over the Cherapeake; "the more conspicuous because it stands alone."

The common council of New York and Albany have each voted a sword to com. Perry, and the former have also resolved to present him with the "freedom of the city."* At BOSTON, a committee of the citizens has been raised for the purpose of procuring a sword as aforesaid. In the committee we observe the names of some of the gentlemen of the senate of Massachusetts who solemnly voted, that it did not become a "moral and religious people" to rejoice at our victories, and we hail with pleasure their return to patriotism.

Copy of a letter from Com. O. H. Perry to the Secretary of the navy, dated United States' serv. Ariel, Put-in-Bay, Sept. 24, 1813.

SIR—I have the honor to acquaint you, that about twelve hundred troops were yesterday transported to a small island distant about 4 leagues from Malden, notwithstanding it blew hard with frequent squalls. This day, although the weather is not settled, the squadron will again take over as many more. We only wait for favorable weather to make a final move. I need not assure you, sir, that every possible exertion will be made by the officers and men under my command to assist the advance of the army, and it affords me great pleasure to have it in my power to say, that the utmost harmony prevails between the army and navy.

I have the honor to be, &c. O. H. PERRY.

U. S. schooner Lawrence, Erie, 23d September 1813.

SIR—I have the honor to announce to you my safe arrival here with the U. S. sloop Lawrence. She has on board all the sick and wounded of the squadron. I have made such arrangements as will contribute much to their relief. Died of the typhus fever, Richard Williams and Henry Vanpool, mates, during our passage from Put-in-Bay.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN J. YARNALL.

COMMODORE RODGERS' CRUISE.

Copy of a letter from Commodore Rodgers to the Secretary of the navy, dated

U. S. frigate President, Newport, Sept. 27, 1813.

SIR—Your having been informed of my leaving Boston on the 23d of April last, and of my depart-

* This is a "custom more honored in the breach than the observance." The compliment is well enough; but it goes to sustain an old English aristocratical usage, repugnant to the whole spirit of our institutions. It may be useful to observe, that in most of the towns and cities of free England, a man cannot exercise certain trades or professions therein, or be eligible to office, unless he has served an apprenticeship there, or obtains the "freedom of the city," by purchase, or in compliment.

ture from President Road in company with the Congress, on the 30th of the same month, it now only remains for me to make you acquainted with my proceeding since the latter date.

In a few hours after getting to sea, the wind, which had been light from the westward shifted to the S. E. and obliged me to beat, consequently prevented our getting clear of the bay, until the 3d of May, when in the afternoon while in chase of a British brig of war, near the shoal of George's Bank, we passed to windward of three sail, two of which, from their appearance and the information previously received, I judged to be the La Hogue 74, and Nymph frigate and the third a merchant brig. After getting clear of George's Bank the wind veered to the north eastward, and we continued along east southerly, in the direction of the southern edge of the Gulf Stream until the 8th of May in long. 60. W. lat. 39, 50, N. when I parted company with the Congress. After parting company I shaped a course as near as the wind would permit, to intercept the enemy's West India commerce passing to the southward of the Grand Bank; not meeting with any thing in this direction except American vessels from Lisbon and Cadiz, I next pursued a route to the northward on a parallel with the eastern edge of the Grand Bank, so as to cross the tracks of his West India, Halifax, Quebec, and St. John's trade. In this route experiencing constant thick fogs for a number of days, and not meeting any thing, after reaching the latitude of 48 N. I steered to the S. E. towards the Azores, off which, in different directions, I continued until the 6th of June, without meeting a single enemy's vessel, or any others, except two Americans. At this time falling in with an American ship bound to Cadiz, and receiving information that she had, four days before, passed an enemy's convoy from the West Indies bound to England I crowded sail to the N. E. and, although disappointed in falling in with the convoy, I nevertheless made four captures, between the 9th and 13th of June.

Being now in the latitude of 46 N. and long. 28 W. I determined on going into the North Sea, and accordingly shaped a course that afforded a prospect of falling in with vessels bound to Newfoundland from St. George's channel, by the way of Cape Clear, as well as others that might pass north about to the northward of Ireland: to my astonishment, however in all this route I did not meet with a single vessel, until I made the Shetland Islands, and even off there nothing but Danish vessels trading to England under British licenses. At the time I reached the Shetland Islands, a considerable portion of my provisions and water being expended, it became necessary to replenish these, previous to determining what course to pursue next; and I accordingly for this purpose, put into North Bergen on the 27th of June; but, much to my surprise and disappointment, was not able to obtain any thing but water, there being an unusual scarcity of bread in every part of Norway, and at the time not more in Bergen than a bare sufficiency for its inhabitants for four or five weeks. This being the case, after replenishing my water I departed on the 2nd of July, and stretched over towards the Orkney Islands and from thence towards the North Cape for the purpose of intercepting a convoy of 25 or 30 sail, which it was said would leave Archangel about the middle of July under the protection of two brigs or two sloops of war; and which was further confirmed by two vessels I captured on the 13th and 18th of the same month. In this object however the enemy had the good fortune to disappoint me, by a line of battle ship and a frigate making their appearance off the North Cape on the 19th of July, just as I was in momentary expectation of meeting the convoy: on first discovering the enemy's two ships of war, not being able owing to the haziness of the weather, to ascertain their character with precision, I stood towards them until making out what they were, I hauld by the wind on the opposite tack to avoid them: but, owing to faint, variable winds, calms, and entire day light (the sun in that latitude at that season, appearing at midnight several degrees above the horizon) they were enabled to continue the chase upwards of 80 hours; during which time, owing to different changes of the wind in their favor, they were brought quite as near to us as was desirable. At the time of meeting with the enemy's two ships, the privateer schooner Scourge of New-York, which I had fallen in with the day before, was in company; but their attention was so much engrossed by the President that they permitted the Scourge to escape without appearing to take any notice of her.

Being thus disappointed in meeting with the convoy, and a still further portion of my provisions being expended, I determined to proceed to a more westerly station, and accordingly steered to gain the direction of the trade passing out of and into the Irish Channel. In this position between the 25th of July and 2d of August, I made three captures, when, finding that the enemy had a superior force in that vicinity, I found it expedient to change my ground; and after taking a circuit round Ireland, and getting into the latitude of Cape Clear, steered for the banks of Newfoundland, near to which I made two more captures, and by the latter one found that the Bellerophon 74 and Hyperion frigate were on the eastern part of the Bank, and only a few miles to the westward of me; I however did not fall in with them. From the eastern edge of the Grand Bank, to which I had beat all the way from the N. W. coast of Ireland (the wind having prevailed without intermission, from the 1st of August to the middle of September from west to south west) I steered for the United States, without seeing a single vessel of any kind until the 22d of the present month, being near the South Sheal of Nantucket, I met with a Swedish brig and an American cartel (the Russian ship Hoffnung) from London, bound to Newbedford.

By this time my provisions, and particularly bread, was so nearly consumed as to make it indispensably necessary that I should put into the first convenient port after gaining the requisite information of the disposition of the enemy's cruizers as could enable me to steer clear of a superior force; and this I was enabled to do in a manner which I shall communicate in another letter.* On the 23d inst. I captured his Britannic majesty's sloop High Flyer, (tender to admiral Warren) with which vessel I now have to inform you of my arrival at this port.

Annexed is a list of vessels captured and destroyed, in which were made 271 prisoners. I have now however, only 55 prisoners on board, having sent to England on parole 78 in the Duke of Montrose; 76 in the Greenland ship Eliza Swan, and 62 in the barque Lion, of Liverpool.

During my cruise, although I have not had it in my power to add any additional lustre to the character of our little navy, I have nevertheless rendered essential service to my country, I hope, by har-

* It is understood that com. Rodgers, when he saw the High Flyer, luckily or providentially hoisted a flag that happened to be the private British signal of the day. The High Flyer came to him, and believing him British, communicated what he desired, with a knowledge of all the signals of the British navy.—EP.

raising the enemy's commerce, and employing to his disadvantage more than a dozen times the force of a single frigate.

My officers and crew have experienced great privations since I left the United States, from being nearly five months at sea, and living the last three months of that time upon a scanty allowance of the roughest fare; and it is with peculiar pleasure I acquaint you that they are all in better health than might be expected, although you may well suppose that their scanty allowance has not been of any advantage to their strength or appearance.

The High Flyer was commanded by lieut. Hutchinson, second of the St. Domingo. She is a remarkable fine vessel of her class, sails very fast, and would make an excellent light cruiser, provided the government have occasion for a vessel of her description.

Just at the moment of closing my letter, a newspaper has been handed me containing capt Broke's challenge to my late gallant friend capt. Lawrence, in which he mentions with considerable emphasis the pains he had taken to meet the President and Congress with the Shannon and Tenedos.

It is unnecessary at present to take further notice of captain Broke's observations than to say, if that was his disposition, his conduct was so glaringly opposite as to authorise a very contrary belief. Relative to capt. Broke, I have only further to say, that I hope he has not been so severely wounded as to make it a sufficient reason to prevent his re-assuming the command of the Shannon at a future day.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JNO. RODGERS.

TREMBLEOUS BATTLE ON LAKE ONTARIO.

Extract of a letter to the secretary of the navy, dated "Head-Quarters, Fort George, Sept. 9, 1813.

"I enclose you a letter from commodore Chauncey, which he put into my hands the day before yesterday, and beg leave to add the following brief but interesting detail

"The commodore entered this port on the 24th instant with his squadron. On the 26th we received satisfactory information direct from York, that on the day of the commodore's arrival here (Friday the 24th) the British squadron was on the opposite coast. This communication being made to the commodore he promptly ascertained the fact to his satisfaction, and on the 27th in the evening left port in quest of his antagonist. Yesterday morning his squadron was descried near mid channel, between this place and York, standing for the latter place, and about noon we discovered by the smoke in which his vessels were occasionally enveloped, that he was closely engaged and had the wind of the enemy, who were scarcely discernable. We could, however, with the aid of our glasses, distinctly perceive that the British squadron was forced to leeward towards the head of the lake; and the action continued without intermission until we lost sight of the sternmost of our vessels about three o'clock, P. M. The issue must therefore have been decisive, because the breeze freshened, without any change in its direction, and the narrowness of the lake made it impossible for the vanquished party to escape by any manoeuvre.

"I have no doubt the victory is ours, but am apprehensive it has cost us dear; since the batteries of the enemy were superior to those of our squadron, and the British commander is an officer not only of desperate resolution but of great naval skill.

"If commodore Chauncey has survived, which I implore Heaven may be the case, we shall behold him mantled with glory, as his ship was yesterday beheld wrapt in the flame and smoke of her batteries."

A postscript to the above letter dated late in the evening, says "a flag was sent to the British camp on the lake last evening; the receiving officer acknowledged we had the wind and observed that a vessel had been dismasted; this was observed from the heights of Lewistown also, and it is believed it was the Royal George, by the Pike. A vessel supposed to be the Wolfe, bore up to the relief of the crippled ship, and engaged the Pike, and they went out of sight, covered with smoke, and apparently about to board."

"September 29th, eight o'clock, P. M.—We have not, as yet, heard from Chauncey: the utmost does not exceed five miles to the end of the bay—but the wind is still adverse. I begin to fear his victory may have cost too much—I have sent out several small craft to look for him; but the sea which is running has forced them back. It was visible the Pike bore the brunt of the engagement."

Copy of a letter from commodore Chauncey to the secretary of the navy, dated

U. S. ship General Pike, Niagara river, 25th Sept. 1814.

SIR—After I had the honor of addressing you on the 13th, I continued to blockade the enemy until the 17th, when the wind blowing heavy from the westward, the enemy having run into Kingston, and knowing he could not move from that place before a change of wind, I took the opportunity of running into Sackett's Harbor.

I remained but a few hours at the harbor and left it at daylight on the morning of the 18th, but did not arrive here until yesterday, owing to continual head winds, not having laid our course during the passage. On the 19th I saw the enemy's fleet near the False Ducks, but took no notice of him as I wished him to follow me up the lake.

There is a report here, and generally believed, that Capt. Perry has captured the whole of the enemy's fleet on Lake Erie. If this should prove true in all its details (and God grant that it may) he has immortalised himself and not disappointed the high expectations formed of his talents and bravery.

I have learnt from a source which can be depended upon, that we did the enemy much more injury in our rencounter on the 11th than I had expected—I find that we killed captain Mulcaster of the Royal George and a number of his men and did considerable injury to that ship, as well as several of her vessels. It was truly unfortunate that we could not have brought the enemy to a general action on that day, as I am confident that the victory would have been as complete as that upon Lake Erie. I how ever have the consolation to know that every exertion was used to bring him to close action. If we did not succeed it was not our fault.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ISAAC CHAUNCEY.

Denmark.

[The fate of no country in Europe, (says the National Advocate) except Poland, is more interesting than that of Denmark. We extract from the Paris Moniteur the following expositions of her affairs, which agrees exactly with the Danish declaration on the same subject, and is not contradicted by the London journalists, who admit the whole extent of the baseness of the treatment she has met with from the British cabinet.]

Her majesty the empress and queen regent has received the following intelligence from the army, dated the 13th June:

Baron de Kaas, Danish minister of the interior, despatched with letters from the king, has been presented to the emperor.

After the affair of Copenhagen, a treaty of alliance was concluded between France and Denmark. By that treaty the emperor guaranteed the integrity of Denmark.

In the year 1811, Sweden made known at Paris, the desire she had of uniting Norway to Sweden, and demanded the assistance of France. She was answered, that whatever wish France had to do an agreeable thing to Sweden, a treaty of alliance having been concluded with Denmark, guaranteeing the integrity of that power, his majesty could not give his consent to the dismemberment of the territory of his ally.

From this moment Sweden detached herself from France, and entered into negotiations with her enemies.

Afterwards, the war between France and Russia became imminent. The Swedish court proposed to make common cause with France, but at the same time renewing its propositions relative to Norway. It was in vain that Sweden represented, that from the Norwegian ports, a descent upon Scotland was easy, it was in vain that she dwelt upon all the guarantees which the ancient alliance of Sweden gave France of the conduct she would follow towards England. The reply of the cabinet of the Tuilleries was the same; it had its hands tied by the treaty with Denmark.

From that moment Sweden kept no longer any measures; she contracted an alliance with Russia and England; and the first stipulation of that treaty was the common engagement of compelling Denmark to cede Norway to Sweden.

The battles of the Smolensk, and of the Moskwa, restrained the activity of Sweden; she received some subsidies, made some preparations; but began no hostilities. The events of the winter of 1813 arrived, the French troops evacuated Hamburg; the situation of Denmark became perilous: at war with England, threatened by Sweden and Russia, France appeared unable to support her. The king of Denmark, with that fidelity which characterises him, addressed himself to the emperor, in order to get out of this situation. The emperor, who wishes that his policy should never be at the expence of his allies, replied, that Denmark was at liberty to treat with England to save the integrity of her territory, and that his esteem and friendship for the king should receive no diminution from the new connection which the force of circumstances obliged Denmark to contract. The king expressed all his gratitude at this proceeding.

Four ships' crews of very excellent sailors had been furnished by Denmark, and manned four ships of our Scheidt fleet. The king of Denmark, during this time, having expressed a desire that these sailors should be restored, the emperor sent them back to him with the most scrupulous exactness, at the same time expressing to the officers and seamen the satisfaction he felt at their good conduct.

Events, however, proceeded. The allies thought that the reveries of Burke were realized. The French empire, in their imagination, was already effaced from the face of the globe; and this idea must have predominated to a strange degree, when they offered Denmark, as a compensation for Norway, our departments of the 32d military division, and even all Holland, in order to recompense in the north a maritime power, who should act in conjunction with Russia.

The king of Denmark, far from suffering himself to be surprised by those deceitful offers, said to them—You wish, then, to give me colonies in Europe, and that too to the detriment of France?

In the impossibility of making the king of Denmark participate in so foolish an idea, prince Dolgorouki was sent to Copenhagen to demand that they should make a common cause with the allies, in consequence of which, the allies would guarantee the integrity of Denmark, and even of Norway. The urgency of circumstances, the imminent danger which Denmark ran, the distance of the French armies, her own salvation, made the policy of Denmark give way. The king consented, in return for the guarantee of his dominions, to cover Hamburg and to keep that town sheltered from the French armies during the war. He felt that all was disagreeable to the emperor in this stipulation; he made all the modifications which it was possible to make in it; and did not even sign it, but by giving way to the entreaties of all those by whom he was surrounded, who represented to him the necessity of saving his states; but he was far from thinking it was only a snare laid for him. They wished to place him at war with France, and after making him by this measure lose in that circumstance his natural support, they would have broken their word, and obliged him to subscribe to all the shameful conditions they chose to impose on him.

M. de Bernstorff proceeded to London; he expected to have been eagerly received there, and to have nothing more to do than renew the treaty concluded with prince Dolgorucki: but what was his astonishment when the prince regent refused to receive the king's letter, and when lord Castlereagh gave him to understand, there could be no treaty between England and Denmark unless, as a preliminary article, Norway was ceded to Sweden. A few days after, count Bernstorff received an order to return to Denmark.

At the same moment similar language was held to count Mollke, envoy from Denmark to the emperor Alexander. Prince Dolgorucki was disavowed as having exceeded his powers: and during this time the Danes were giving their notification to the French army, and some hostilities took place!

We shall in vain open the annals of nations to discover in them policy more immoral. It was at the moment that Denmark found herself thus engaged in a war with France, that the treaty to which she was conforming was at the same time disavowed at London and in Russia, and that advantage was taken of the embarrassments in which that power was placed, to present her as an ultimatum with a treaty which engaged her to acknowledge the cession of Norway!

Under those difficult circumstances the king shewed the greatest confidence in the emperor; he declared his treaty void; he recalled his troops from Hamburg; he ordered his army to march with the French army; and, in short, he declared that he still considered himself as allied to France, and that he relied upon the emperor's magnanimity.

The president de Kaas was sent to the French headquarters, with letters from the king. At the same time the king dispatched to Norway the hereditary prince of Denmark, a young prince of the highest promise, and particularly beloved by the Norwegians. He set out disguised as a sailor; threw himself into a fishing boat, and arrived in Norway on the 22d of May.

On the 30th May, the French troops entered Hamburg, and a Danish division which marched with our troops entered Lubeck.

Baron de Kaas, while at Altona, experienced another scene of perfidy, equal to the first. The envoys from the allies came to his lodgings, and gave him to understand, that they renounced the cession of Norway, and that on condition of Denmark making common cause with the allies, it should no longer be made a question; they conjured him to delay his departure.

The reply of M. de Kaas was simple—"I have my orders and must execute them." They told him the French armies were defeated; that did not move him; he continued his journey.

However on the 31st of May, an English fleet appeared before Copenhagen; one of the ships of war anchored before the town, and Mr. Thornton presented himself. He stated that the allies were going to commence hostilities, if, within forty-eight hours, Denmark did not sign a treaty, the principal conditions of which were, to cede Norway to Sweden, to immediately give up, en dépôt, the province of Drontheim, and to furnish 25,000 men to act with the allies against France, and conquer the indemnities, which were to be the portion of Denmark. He at the same time declared, that the overtures made to M. de Kaas, on his journey to Altona, were disavowed and could only be considered as military suggestions.

The king indignantly refused this insolent summons. Meanwhile, the prince royal, having arrived in Norway, published the following proclamation.

"NORWEGIANS!—Your king is sensible of, and appreciates your unshaken fidelity, both to himself and the dynasty of the kings of Norway and of Denmark, who have, for centuries past, reigned over your sires and yourselves. His paternal desire is to draw still closer the indissoluble ties of brotherly love and the union which prevail between the people of the two kingdoms. The heart of Frederick VI. is ever with you; but his cares of watching over every branch of the administration of the state, deprives him of being personally in the midst of his good people of Norway. It is for this reason that he has sent me amongst you, as governor, to execute his will, as if he was present. His orders shall be my laws. My efforts shall be to gain his affection and confidence. Perhaps difficult trials await us. But, placing confidence in Providence, I shall without fear, be the first to meet the storm that may threaten us; and with your aid, faithful Norwegians, I shall surmount all obstacles. I know I may rely upon fidelity to the king; that it is your wish to preserve inviolate the ancient independence of Norway; and that the motto which unite us is, For God, the king, and the country."

(Signed) "CHRISTIAN FREDERIC, Prince of Denmark and Norway, governor of the kingdom of Norway, and general in chief."

The confidence which the king of Denmark had in the emperor has been entirely justified, and all the bonds between the two nations have been re-established, and strengthened.

The French army is in Hamburg; a Danish division follows its motions to support it. The English, by their policy, obtained only shame and confusion; the wishes of all worthy men accompany the hereditary prince of Denmark into Norway. What renders the situation of Norway critical, is the want of provisions; but Norway shall remain Danish—the integrity of Denmark is guaranteed by France.

The bombardment of Copenhagen whilst an English minister was still with the king; the burning of the capital with the fleet, without a declaration of war, or any previous hostility; appeared to be the most odious scene of modern history; but the crooked policy which leads the English to demand the cession of a province, happy for so many years under the sceptre of the house of Holstein, and the series of intrigues to which they have had recourse to obtain this odious result, shall be considered as more immoral and more outrageous than even the burning of Copenhagen.

It is to observe that policy of which the houses of Timour and of Sicily have been the victims, and which has despoiled them of their dominions. The English are accustomed in India to be never stopped by any idea of justice—they follow this policy in Europe.

It appears that in all the negotiations which the allies have had with England, the powers the greatest enemies to France have been disgusted by the excessive pretensions of the English government.

The basis even of the peace of Lunenburg are declared by the English to be inadmissible, as too favorable to France.

Madmen! They are deceived in their latitude, and take Frenchmen for Indians.

Bad news from Mexico.—It was only in the last number that we published Bernardo's proclamation, holding out the most flattering prospects of the progress of republicanism in Texas. We have now the unpleasant duty to record the reverse that follows, politely communicated to the editor of the Register from a source that forbids him to hope it is ever doubtful:

From the Red River Herald—Extra.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman of the first respectability, dated Natchitoches, Sept. 4, and received by this day's mail.

"I am sorry to inform you, the Republican army of Texas were, on the 18th ultimo, entirely defeated, 20 miles beyond St. Antonio, by the army of Aradondo. General Tolleto attacked them in their camp, a well chosen position, with a force of about one to three.

The royalists (mostly regular troops from the interior) were at first beaten and driven some distance with the loss of three pieces of cannon and many killed. General Toledo, suspecting an ambush, ordered his troops to halt and form on a better ground, but the Americans with an indescribable enthusiasm and impetuosity in despite of every exertion of their officers, rushed into the ambush, where many pieces of the cannon of the enemy were opened on them by which they were mostly destroyed—such as were not, retreated in confusion, leaving every thing behind them. General Toledo, colonels Kemper and Perry, with about sixty others, have arrived at Nacogdoches, and report says as many more are at Trinity. W. B. Wilkinson, who was in the battle acting as aid to general Toledo, arrived here yesterday and returned this morning with ammunition to embue such as were at Nacogdoches to make a stand, and as far as possible cover the retreating remnant of the army, who are hourly coming in.

Three hundred families had left St. Antonio and La Baha for this place, but of them women on foot, escaping from the bloody vengeance of Aradondo, who, at Atlanta and S. Hilario distinguished himself by putting women and children to death.

It is probable 300 Americans are lost, and the whole country between Rio Grande and the Sabine will be desolated. We can yet form nothing like a list of the whole number killed.

From persons who are hourly arriving here we are led to believe we shall in a few days have several hundred of the most wretched of human beings fleeing from their country and their homes to save their lives.

Doctor Forsythe is safe at Nacogdoches. William Slocum, the two Combes and Gaston of the Mississippi territory, are missing.

How safe we are here, is doubtful; a little time will shew us.

A letter from Havana, dated Aug 18, says—"A vessel has just come in from Fera Cruz, which brings the melancholy intelligence that El Uno Moreno at the head of 30 or 40,000 republicans, has taken possession of the rich province De Orana and Del Puerto De Jacupica. The revolution makes progress, and nothing henceforth can stop it.

We have a verbal report that Austria has joined the allies!—It is very improbable.

Patriotism of Tennessee.

Soon after the legislature of Tennessee, now in session, had convened, information reached them of the late horrible massacre on the Mobile. The following official acts, the spontaneous result of the impression such an event was likely to make on the minds of high-minded freemen, have been obligingly handed for publication. This is the genuine patriotism of a republic—prompt, energetic and without alloy.

AN ACT

To repel the invasion of the state of Tennessee by the Creek Indians; and to afford relief to the citizens of the Mississippi territory and for other purposes.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Tennessee, that of the militia of said state, the governor is hereby authorised to organize and march immediately any number not exceeding three thousand five hundred men; in such proportions of infantry, riflemen, cavalry, artillery, and mounted infantry, as the governor and commanding general may deem proper for the public service—to any place in the Creek nation of Indians or in the Mississippi territory, where said troops may give relief to the citizens of said territory, and repel the invasion of the state of Tennessee by said Indians and their allies.

Sec. 2. Be it enacted, That the governor of Tennessee be and he is hereby authorised to contract for and supply said troops with provisions, ammunition and arms at the expense of said state, until the general government make provision for said troops, and to draw on the treasurers of said state for the money; or borrow the same of either the banks in Tennessee, or any other source at a rate of interest usual in said banks.

Sec. 3. Be it enacted, That in the event the general government refuse to pay the aforesaid troops, for their services, as other similar troops are paid by the said government; then and in that event, said troops shall be paid by the state of Tennessee in the same manner the United States pay similar troops.

Sec. 4. Be it enacted, That each or either of the banks in Tennessee are hereby authorised to lend to the governor any sum or sums of money, not exceeding three hundred thousand dollars to be used in supplying the aforesaid troops, or for their pay, or the purchase of ammunition or arms.

Sec. 5. Be it enacted, That any sum the governor may borrow under the provisions of this act, the revenue of this state shall be pledged to the lenders of the same and the interest—and in the event the general government do not pay the debts contracted by the governor, at the next session of the legislature of this state a tax shall be laid on the taxable property of this state, sufficient to raise the sum and the interests thereon, which may be borrowed by the governor.

Sec. 6. Be it enacted, That the governor's warrant on the treasury of this state, for the sum or sums he may borrow, and the interests thereon, shall be sufficient and conclusive evidence of such debts, and shall entitle the lenders to draw interest on the sum or sums advanced from the time advanced, until said sum or sums be repaid, and that the interest shall be paid half yearly, agreeable to the rate of interest mentioned in the second section of this act.

State of Tennessee, in general assembly, September 27th, 1813.

WHEREAS the recent massacres committed by the Creek Indians, on our southern frontiers, together with the unexpected number of warriors of that nation which have lately resorted to arms against the United States, has produced a conviction on the minds of the members of this legislature, that the number of troops called for by the general government, to repel and subdue this savage enemy, is insufficient to answer the contemplated purpose, and the general assembly have directed three thousand five hundred additional troops to be raised in this state, to aid in suppressing this new ally of the British government, and as it is believed that the force should also act under the direction of the general government, and be supported at the common expense; Therefore,

Resolved, That the governor of this state be and he is hereby required forthwith to give immediate information to the executive of the United States of the time when, and the place at which, the three thousand five hundred men will be prepared to obey the orders of the general government, accompanied with a request that the said troops be immediately received into the public service.

Indian Warfare.

The following letter from Judge Toulmin to the editor of the Raleigh Register, gives a particular account of the late shocking massacre at Tensas:

Mobile, September 7.

"DEAR SIR—The dreadful catastrophe which we have been some time anticipating has at length taken place. The Indians have broken in upon us, in numbers and fury unexampled. Our settlement is overrun, and our country, I fear, is on the eve of being depopulated. The accounts which we received led us to expect an attack about the full moon of August; and it was known at Pensacola, when the ammunition was given to the Indians who were to be the leaders of the respective parties destined to attack the different parts of our settlement. The attempt was made to deprive them of their ammunition (issued by the Spaniards on the recommendation of a British general) on their way from Pensacola (and in which it was said the Indians lost more than 20 men, although only one third of our people stood their ground) it is highly probable in some measure retarded their operations; and the steady succession of rain contributed to produce the same effect. Had their attempt been conducted with more judgment and supported with more vigor, there would have been an end, for a time of Indian warfare. In consequence of the delay, our citizens began to grow careless and confident; and several families who had removed from Tensaw to Fort Stoddert, returned again and fell a sacrifice to the merciless savages.

Our whole plan of defence was erroneous. It was adopted by the citizens under an imperfect view of their danger. From the best accounts which I can obtain, I suppose that there must have been twenty forts erected on the two sides of the river between Fort Stoddert and the upper settlements, a distance of about 70 miles, which in a country so thinly settled as ours, could not be maintained, even if they had been better constructed. About the 20th of August, intelligence was communicated to us by the Choctaw Indians, that in eight or ten days, that an attack would be made by distinct bodies of Creeks on Mims's Fort, in the Tensaw settlement, which is on the east side of Alabama, nearly opposite to Fort Stoddert—in the forts in the forks of Tombigby and Alabama—in Beasley's fort, near the Choctaw line on the Tombigby—and finally on the Fort and United States' trading house at H. Hopkins. A very valuable officer, Major Beasley of the Mississippi Territory volunteers, commanded at Fort Mims. About a mile or two from it was another fort, at Pierce's mills; and a few miles below that place, at another mill a small party of soldiers was also stationed. Mims, however, where were the greatest number of families and property collected, seems to have been the sole object of attack in that quarter.

A few days before the attack, some negroes of Mr. McGirt's who lived in that part of the Creek territory which is inhabited by half-breeds, had been sent up the Alabama to his plantation for corn; three of them were taken by a party of Indians. One escaped and brought down news of the approach of the Indians. The officer gave but little credit to him; but they made some further preparation to receive the enemy. On the next day Mr. James Cornels, a half-breed, and some white men, who had been out on the late battle ground, and discovered the trail of a considerable body of Indians going towards Mr. McGirt's, came to the fort and informed the commanding officer of the discovery. Though their report did not appear to receive full credit, it occasioned greater exertions; and Saturday and Sunday, considerable work was done to put the fort in a state of defence. Sunday morning three negroes were sent out to attend the cattle, who soon returned with an account that they had seen 20 Indians.—Scouts were sent out to ascertain the truth of the report. They returned and declared that they could see no signs of Indians. One of the negroes belonging to Mr. Haddon was whipped for bringing what they deemed a false report.—He was sent out again on Monday, and saw a body of Indians approaching; but afraid of being whipped he did not return to Mims's, but to Pierce's fort; but before his story could be communicated, the attack was made. The commanding officer called upon Mr. Fletcher, who owned another of the negroes, to whip him also.—He believed the boy and resisted two or three applications; but at length they had him actually brought out for the purpose, when the Indians appeared in view of the fort. The gate was open. The Indians had to come through an open field 150 yards wide, before they could reach the fort, and yet they were within thirty steps of the fort, at 11 in the morning, before they were noticed. The sentry then gave the cry of "Indians!" and they immediately set up a most terrible war-whoop and rushed into the gate with inconceivable rapidity, and got within it before the people of the fort had any opportunity of shutting it. This decided their fate. Major Beasley was shot through the belly near the gate. He called to the men to take care of the ammunition and to retreat to the house. He won himself to a kitchen where it is supposed he must have been buried.

The fort was originally square. Major Beasley had it enlarged, by extending the lines of two sides about 50 feet, and putting up a new side into which the gate was removed. The old line of pickets stood, and the Indians upon passing into the gate, obtained possession of this additional part, and through the port holes of the old line of pickets fired on the people who held the interior. On the opposite side of the fort, an offset or bastion was made round the block gate, which being open on the outside was also taken possession of by the Indians, who with the axes which lay scattered about immediately began to cut down the gate. There was a large body of Indians, though they probably did not exceed 400. Our people seemed to sustain the attack with undaunted spirit. They took possession of the port holes in the other lines of the fort and fired on the Indians who remained in the field. Some of the Indians got on the block house, at one of the corners; but after firing a good deal down upon the people they were dislodged. They succeeded however in setting fire to a house near the pickets from which it was communicated to the kitchen and from thence to the main dwelling house. They attempted to do it by burning arrows, but failed. When the people in the fort saw the Indians retained full possession of the outer court, that the gate continued open, that their men fell very fast, and that their houses were in flames, they began to despond. Some determined to cut their way through the pickets and escape.—Of the whole number of whitemen and half-breeds in the fort, it is supposed that not more than 25 or 30 escaped and of these many were wounded. The rest and almost all the women and children fell a sacrifice either to the arms of the Indians or to the flames. The battle terminated about an hour or an hour and a half before sunset.

The information thus far, was given to me by a person of character and credibility, who was present during the whole scene, and who escaped through the opening made in the pickets: The women and children took refuge in an upper story of the dwelling house: and it is said that the Indians when the building were in flames, danced round them with savage delight. The helpless victims perished in the flames. It is also reported, that when the buildings were burning and the few who remained were exposed to the heavy fire of the enemy, they collected as many as they could of the guns of the deceased, and threw both them and the remaining stock of ammunition into the flames, to prevent their becoming subservient in the hands of the Indians, to the destruction of their fellow citizens. Surely this was an instance of determined resolution and benevolent foresight of which there are not many examples.

But notwithstanding the bravery of our fellow-citizens, the Indians carried all before them, and murdered the armed and the helpless without discrimination. Our loss is 7 commissioned officers and about 100 non-commissioned officers and privates, of the first regiment of Mississippi Territory volunteers. There were about 24 families of men, women and children in the fort, of whom almost all have perished, amounting to about 160 souls. I reckon, however, among them about six families of half-breeds, and seven Indians. There were also about 150 negroes, of whom a large proportion were killed. The half-breeds have uniformly done there-selves honor, and those who survive will afford great assistance in the prosecution of the war. Some of the most respectable among them were at Pierce's fort, and are ready with all their dexterity and all their courage, to avenge the death of their friends, and the destruction of their property. It was principally through them that we learnt that the real object of the Indians, in obtaining ammunition at Pensacola, was to make immediate war on the white people, and that the idea entertained in the eastern part of the Creek Nation, that this was only a secondary and remote object, was not founded in fact, and was probably suggested for the purpose of putting us off our guard, and keeping out of sight the real intention of their revolt against the constituted authorities of their nation.

The mournful tale of the disaster at Mims' reached the cantonment near Fort Stoddert, a distance of 16 miles, not until about 10 o'clock on Tuesday night. This cantonment (called Mount Vernon) was very ill calculated for defence, and was like the fort on Pensaw, wonderfully encumbered by helpless families. It had been suggested in the morning of that day, that the removal of the helpless to a place of security, would be highly expedient: but the difficulties of removal and of support when removed, presented themselves more forcibly to the minds of many, than the danger of delay; and even those who saw the propriety of the measure, could not reconcile themselves to the idea of abandoning their fellow citizens.

When, however, the news of the massacre at Fort Mims arrived, there was no longer any hesitation; and such was the hurry of a flight conducted almost at midnight, that few took any thing with them, even to support themselves on their way to Mobile. Some pushed off by water, others fled by land in the darkness of the night, and the whole face of the country exhibited a scene of consternation and distress—Widows fled for the preservation of their own lives, whilst tortured by a belief in the dreadful death of their husbands or friends—and some escaped from fort Stoddert, lamenting in the bitterness of agonized grief the murder of mothers, fathers, sisters and brothers—The river was strewed with boats from fort Stoddert to Mobile; and here many have no shelter and no means of support, unless the commanding officer of the troops, impressed by a view of the distressing urgency of their situation, should afford them assistance out of the public stores.

What attacks have been made on the upper forts at St. Stephens, and in the forks, which are now reduced to two, I do not know—I fear however the same result was at Mims; and all which the survivors can hope for, is that some little respite may be afforded to the straggling inhabitants, and to the town of Mobile, after the forts are demolished, and that the necessity of taking care of their wounded and carrying home their plunder may induce the Indians to delay for a few weeks an attack on the town of Mobile, and on the military station near fort Stoddert.

But at all events, I think it probable that by the first quarter of the next moon, they will return in greater force; and as the Spaniards unquestionably encouraged them, it is possible that they may then be ready to support them.—Should no assistance come from the Mississippi, from Tennessee and from Georgia, the whole country from the Choctaws to the sea will be a desolate waste and a white man will not dare to raise his head out of the limits of a military garrison. As it is we have abandoned our houses, our crops and our herds, and wherever the Indians have appeared, they have involved the whole within their reach in one scene of desolation.

It is said that they have left their wives and children at a western frontier settlement of the Creeks on a branch of the Tom Bigby, called the Black Warrior, and should they be closely pressed, (of which however I see no probability) they will decamp with the whole and join the western tribes.

Had the Choctaws been engaged in our service, they would have given them a check: but as it is, our only hope for aid, or rather for revenge at some distant day, rests on the energy of our fellow citizens of the United States.

I am dear sir, yours very sincerely and respectfully.

OUTRAGES AT HAMPTON.

Extract of a letter from general Taylor to admiral Warren, dated head-quarters, Norfolk, 29th June, 1813.

"I have heard with grief and astonishment of the excess, both to property and persons, committed by the land troops, who took possession of Hampton. The respect I entertain for your personal character leads me to make known these excesses. It would not become me to suggest what course of enquiry and punishment is due to the honor of your arms. But the world will suppose those acts to have been approved, if not excused, which are passed over with impunity. I do not however deprecate any measures which you may think necessary or proper—but am prepared for any species of warfare, which you may be disposed to prosecute. It is for the sake of humanity I enter this protest.

"We are in this part of the country merely in the novice of our warfare. The character it will hereafter assume, whether of mildness or ferocity, will materially depend on the first operations of our arms and on the personal character and dispositions of the respective commanders. For myself, I assure you most solemnly, that I neither have authorized, nor will sanction any outrage on humanity or the laws of civilized warfare. On the contrary, I think it due no less to my personal honor, than to that of my country, to repress and punish every excess: I hope that these sentiments will be reciprocated. It will depend on you whether the evils inseparable from a state of war, shall in our operations, be tempered by the mildness of civilized life, or under your authority be aggravated by all the fiercest passions which can be instilled into them."

ADMIRAL WARREN TO GENERAL TAYLOR.

His Britannic Majesty's ship San Domingo, Hampton Roads, Chesapeake Bay, June 24, 1813.

SIR,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this day, stating that you had communicated to your government the proposal of an exchange of prisoners, and also that some excesses had been committed by the troops in the late affair at Hampton. I have communicated to my friend, Sir Sidney Buxwith, the command of his majesty's forces on shore, this part of your letter, and he will have the honor of writing to you upon the points to which it alludes.

I beg I have to assure you that it is my wish to alleviate the misfortunes of the war commenced against my country, by every means in my power at the same time I am prepared to meet any result that may ensue between the two nations.

I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) Admiral of the Blue, and commander in chief
Brigadier general Taylor,
Commanding the United States forces at Hampton.

JAMES MACRICE, major, acting assistant adjutant general
SIR SIDNEY BUXWITH TO GENERAL TAYLOR.

His Majesty's ship San Domingo, June 29, 1813.

SIR,—Admiral Sir John Warren having communicated to me the contents of your letter, I lose no time in assuring you, that your wish cannot exceed that to carry on war with every attention to the humanity of individuals, in whose immediate vicinity military operations may take place. In this spirit I shall vie with you to the utmost. At the same time I ought to state to you, that the excesses of which your complaints at Hampton were occasioned by a proceeding of so extraordinary a nature, that if I had not been an eye witness, I could not have credited it. At the recent attempt on Craney island, the troops in a large sunk by the fire of your guns clung to the wreck of the boat. Several Americans, I assure you most solemnly, waded off from the island, and in the presence of all, engaged, fired upon, and shot the poor fellows. With a feeling natural to such a proceeding the men of that vessel landed at Hampton.

That occurrences of the kind may never occur again, and that the troops of each nation may be guided by sentiments of honor and humanity is the earnest wish of yours, &c.

(Signed) SIDNEY BECKWITH, quarter-master general, Brigadier general Taylor, Commanding the United States troops at Norfolk.

A true copy—JAMES MAURICE, major,
Aging assistant adjutant general.

Head-Quarters, Norfolk, July 14, 1813.

STR—It affords me the highest satisfaction to receive your assurance that you wish to carry on war with every attention to the unfortunate individuals in whose immediate vicinity military operations may take place. Such sentiments alone give splendor, courage, and confer honor on military skill. Worthless is the laurel wreath in which it is, and joyless the conquests which have inflicted needless wounds on the peaceful and merciful. The fradulness with which you dated the excesses at Hampton is a guarantee against the repetition.

I cannot doubt, sir, your conviction that the scene described by you at Craney Island was really acted. But by the very reason it appeared to you inexcusable and inhuman, it should have been unauthorised. Your own perception of propriety shall direct, if it is should not have been asserted and redress demanded, before retaliation was sort of, a retaliation too extravagant in its measure, applying not to the perpetrators of the ill-acted offence on their conduct, but to the innocent and helpless. I have reason to think that you are indebted to your troops for the reason to think that you are indebted to your troops for the conduct of our troops at Craney Island, that they would do the water, on the sinking of their boats, and assist in the preservation of some persons, perhaps more, was shot, but it was only for a continued effort to escape, and repeated offers of safety on several occasions, such at least as their presentation made to me. If however your young troops have been killed, it is due to the honor of our arms to discipline, and punish the enormity. The fame of my country shall never be tarnished by such conduct in the troops, and I may command. I have already ordered an enquiry into the facts by a board of field officers, proper assurances shall be taken to punish whatsoever of impropriety may have been committed. I flatter myself if you will perceive in these measures a disposition to afford a course of reformation in any future conduct. When we meet, let us conduct as soldiers, in a display of the honor of our respective countries, anxious to surpass each other as well in magnanimity as in courage.

A true copy, the assurance of my high consideration and respect.
(Signed) ROBERT B. TAYLOR, Brig. genl. commandant,
To Sir Sidney Beckwith, Q. M. general,
Commanding the land forces of H. B. M.
Hampton Roads.

A copy—JOHN MYERS, Aid-de-camp.

Extract of a letter from brigadier general Taylor to the secretary of war, dated 8th of July, 1813.

I enclose you my present statement, copy of the latter is written to Admiral Warren and General B. M. I wish you would send the latter to my friend, I thought back at it from a general war, of which a copy is enclosed, and has had a statement of what occurred in his conduct, and with the result.

The latter of the admiral, though politics is certainly not responsible to a thing which has occurred, and the conversation with the general, though equally civil, is obviously designed to prevent any further discussion of the subject. From the report of prisoners, and as it is, there is too much reason to believe, that before the attack on Craney Island, the humanity of the troops had been excited by a promise of the aid of Norfolk, to fill the present state of affairs, and to keep the troops in the hope of a return to Norfolk, it is much to be regretted that our troops have committed a crime, of which a copy is enclosed at Craney Island, and that under a pretence of the necessity of an immediate retreat, I have ordered the troops to the justification of the honor and magnanimity of our troops, and a report of the conduct of officers, I do not mean to the only of which I shall, I am convinced, the report, I shall have the honor to examine, and the latter, either of admitting similar measures to his own, or of punishing under the supposition of having excited the troops to commit those excesses. Our troops are highly disciplined.

Notes for General Myers in his interview with Admiral Warren.
A detail as well as a sister town has been given up to ladies, and a town, though every day of war to rest this only as to fortified places, and by assault and surrenders.

Individuals have been stripped naked, a sick man stabbed twelve in the hospital, a sick man shot at Pembroke in his bed, and in the arms of his wife, and the death of the troops—his wife also shot at and wounded, a Mr. and Mrs. Kirby.

Females have been not only assaulted and personally abused and struck, but even violated.

It occasions little notice may be incidentally made of the information given by prisoners and deserters of the promise to plunder at Norfolk.

As to the imputation on our troops at Craney Island, if Admiral Warren should mention it, deny the fact and state the actual conduct of our troops, in going into the water to assist their men, and in bringing them on shore as soon as they entered the fort. Refer to the conduct of all our prisoners, particularly those taken from the boat of the Victorious.

JNO MYERS, capt. and aid-de-camp,
Head-Quarters, Norfolk, July 24, 1813.

SIR—In obedience to your orders, I proceeded yesterday with a flag of truce to Admiral Warren in Hampton Roads, to whom I handed both the dispatch by his excellency, and that of Sir Sidney Beckwith. The admiral received me with civility, and with many acknowledgments for the terms of your letters. Sir Sidney was on shore at Old Point Comfort. Feeling some difficulty about the propriety of delaying on board for his arrival, I was about to depart but Admiral Warren expressed a wish that I would remain, saying that he would desire, no doubt, to give a reply.

Sir Sidney did not arrive till eight o'clock. He expressed great respect for the motives that had actuated you, sir, in the invasion of Craney Island, but he was more than he desired—it was not your fault, he said, if your own mind was satisfied. He expressed regret that the trouble you had taken, and much distress, for your character, with a resolution to vie with you in efforts to confine your operations within the bounds of humanity and the usages of war. He said, in allusion to the pretended conduct of our men at Craney Island, that it proceeded not from a few of the most disorderly. I denied the charge altogether, as I had done in my previous interview, when it was made the justification of their outrages at Hampton on the ground of retaliation.

I found that it was not his intention to give to your dispatch a written reply. By the lighter manner in which he glanced at the subject of your investigation, I could perceive that it was pressed further than was desirable to him. It was my wish however, to be able to report to you the probability of a like course of enquiry on his part, and I endeavored to catalogue of abuses and violence at Hampton. I mentioned the pillage of the town and the want of structure of medicine. That individuals had been stripped naked. A sick man stabbed twice, who was in the hospital. A sick man shot in his bed at Pembroke, and in the arms of his wife, who was also shot, and wounded, a boy and a girl, the death of the troops, a Mr. and Mrs. Kirby—and finally the assault on females, their being stripped, and personally abused and even violated.

At the mention of the murder of Kirby and the wound given to his wife, Sir Sidney distinctly admitted it. The others he appeared not to be acquainted with the particulars, and he expressed some concern at it. He said that he had long been conversant with a knowledge of their conduct, from that of the embarkation of the troops that were concerned, with a determination that they should not again land, and that which was unable to control a party, but the responsibility of our conduct should be confined to his part. That the troops under his command were strangers to him, or his rival her, and appealing to my knowledge of the nature of the war in Spain, in which the British (meaning the French corps) he said had been treated, I told me they could not be surprised.

This far he thought he could not give a more convincing proof of the sincerity of his protestations than in the withdrawal of those troops, and that he had never since been employed in finding a new watering place on the banks of the river in order to move from Hampton.

I assured him of my making such a pledge, as he was doing it, should not be likely to regard it, that he would himself do every thing in his power to prevent the arrival of ours for war operations. He concluded by saying, that he was not willing to continue the war, and that he would not consent to any subject of war, but that he should be satisfied to see us with a due regard to the liberty of your conduct. He proposed that the subject was at rest. I took my leave. I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHNS MYERS, captain and aid-de-camp,
Brig. genl. Robert B. Taylor, Norfolk.

Extract of a letter from general Taylor to Sir Sidney Beckwith, quarter-master general, commanding the land force of H. B. M. at Hampton Roads, dated Head-Quarters, July 24th, 1813.

"I have now the honor to transmit to you the proceedings of the board of officers convened to enquire into the transactions at Craney Island. They would seem to convince you that in that affair, the Americans treated us with humanity and magnanimity; and that the distance to which you were moved from the scene, by rendering it impossible that you could be informed of the motives of their conduct, has not only led you to draw conclusions equally mistaken and unjust."

"You have done me the justice to declare, that the measures pursued by me, since a disposition to permit in my troops no delays on humanity or the laws of civilized war. I have a right to expect on your part measures equally decisive and unambiguous. If I had deemed it useful to furnish openly to my whole army all acts of impropriety; and to direct a public investigation, of charges I had to be mentioned, but having the sanction of your imputation, I put to your candor to determine, if excesses by your troops, admitted by yourself, and some of them of the most atrocious character, should pass unnoted. My conduct and your deliberations give me a claim to ask that these excesses be punished. Your army will then learn the abhorrence you feel for such acts, and be strengthened by the fear of your indignation from similar outrages. But if these admitted excesses are passed by, the impunity of the past will be construed by your troops into an encouragement of future outrages, and your own humane intentions will be completely defeated; neither can you be considered of the propriety of taking from my army the pretext for impropriety by a knowledge of a federal restraint on yours."

"I am fully impressed with the liberality of your conduct in promising to remove the troops who committed the outrages at Hampton from the opportunity of repeating these enormities. But, besides that my confidence in the gallantry of the American troops forbids me to desire any diminution of your force, such a measure, being liable to misconception by our own troops, might not attain your object. The rank and file of an army seldom reason very profoundly, and, however erroneously, might ascribe their withdrawal to the desertions which have on every opportunity taken place in that corps, and in their unwillingness, if any should have been displayed, to fire on the American troops. If this should unfortunately be the case, your force will be diminished, without securing the great ends of discipline and humanity, for which you had with so much liberality made the sacrifice. I am the more pressing on this subject, because I have reason to believe, that, even since your assurances, though unquestionably against your good wishes, very improper acts have been committed or

James' river. The domestic property of private citizens is respected by all civilized nations, and has been pillaged, and what is fiercest of all merit to captivity, has been wantonly dissected and destroyed.

If such acts are either direct or sanctioned, it is important to us to draw the world to know what savages of war, the arms of Great Britain, mean to wage. It is authorized, it will be of little practical avail to know that the directors of this course intend that the most liberal personal dispositions while these dispositions remain dormant and unoperative.

If I can trouble some on this subject, charge it to my anxious desire that nothing shall occur to sully our own flags and those of our respective nations. To the press is of the way, charges of inhumanity have a capacity to be printed and circulated. I do not intend to do this, when such a charge lies on the officer, who either encourages or permits it. I derive the highest satisfaction from the assurance you have given of a similar attitude. We have, sir, a common duty by the sacred obligations we owe our respective countries. But on the great and expanded subject of human happiness, we should be firm by the sympathy of our respective Governments, and existing and existing, we go to our warfare a character of magnanimity, conferring equal honor on ourselves and on our countries."

EXTRACT FROM GENERAL ORDERS.

Ast. Adjt. Gen's Office, Norfolk, July 1, 1813.

The general command of us has been directed to reconstitute against the late services committed by the British troops, who took possession of Hampton. It has been authorized to justify or palliate these excesses, on the ground of inhumanity in some of the troops at Craney Island, who were charged with having waded into the river and shot at the crew and yielding to, who clung to the wreck of a boat, which had been sunk by the fire of our guns. Inhumanity and cruelty are inseparable from true courage, and the general orders for the conduct of the troops under his command, to doubt that he regarded any towards an enemy, but to be equally due to the honor of the troops engaged, and to the highest unquestioned fame of the American arms for honor and gallantry, that the indignation should be investigated.

If the charge be well founded, the army must be purified by punishment for this abandonment. It is as the command I hope and believes, the conduct of our troops, has been unbecomingly, the world should have an authentic record to repel the imputation.

If therefore it be the fact that a band of officers, to consist of Colonel Freemon, president, lieutenant-colonel B. Boykin, Major and Aid. Major, do convene, the day after tomorrow, at a place to be appointed by the president for the purpose of investigating these charges and report accordingly. JAMES MAURICE, Major, Ast. Adjt. Gen'l.

REPORT OF THE BOARD.

The evidence having been gone through, the board, after deliberate and mature consideration, do pronounce the following opinion:—

That it appears from the testimony produced that on the 23d of last month, in the action at Craney Island, two of the enemy's boats in front of their line were sunk by the fire of our batteries; the soldiers and sailors who were in these boats were, in great quantity, and in danger of drowning, and being in front of the boats, which were sunk, to assist in these men, who were nearly fire in the air, to the aid of the water, but with no intention what ever to do them further harm; at the contrary, and to be given to prevent this by causing the grape and shot to be found shot, it also is substantiated that one of the enemy who had apparently surrendered, advanced towards the shore, about one hundred yards, when he suddenly turned to his right, and endeavored to make his escape to a hole of the enemy who had found above the island and who were then in view; that in not that time was he brought back, which had the desired effect, and he was taken unhurt to the shore.

It further appears that the troops on the island exerted themselves, in acts of hospitality and kindness to the unwilling and promising.

Therefore the board, with great satisfaction and cheer, as their unanimous opinion, that the charge alleged against the troops is unsupported; and that the character of the American soldiers for humanity and magnanimity has not been committed; but on the contrary, is evinced.

A true and correct copy. J. MAURICE, Major, acting adjt. gen'l. Copy of a note from Sir Sidney, relative to general Taylor, dated H. M. ship San Domingo, July 6, 1813.

Quart. Master General Sir Sydney B. Clark begs leave to return his best acknowledgments to General Taylor for his politeness and communication, and to express his earnest wish that military operations should be carried on with all the liberality and humanity which becomes the respective nations. Any infringement of the established usages of war will be stoutly and justly punished. Extract of a letter from brigadier-general Taylor to the secretary of war, dated Norfolk, 7th July, 1813.

The board of officers convened to examine the charge brought against our troops, in the affair at Craney Island, have made such a report as an American could desire. I enclosed a copy yesterday to the British command with a letter of which a copy is enclosed. The bearer of my despatch was met by a flag, the officer of which received the despatch, and a few hours after it returned with an answer, of which a copy is also enclosed. I fear, from the generality of its terms, that little amelioration of the system hitherto practised is to be expected; but something is gained by placing it in any so decidedly in the wrong, that the world cannot doubt that whom it is to be ascribed any excess which hereafter may be committed on either side."

Extract from an official letter, addressed by major Crutchfield to governor Barbours, dated Norfolk, July 1, 1813.

"To give you, sir, an idea of the savage disposition of the enemy, on their first possession of the island, would be but a vain attempt. Although sir Sidney B. Clark assured me that no treachery might be felt in relation to the unfortunate Americans, the fact is, that on yesterday the general and aid-bolies firing against it, and the wound of our own assisted into town, although it is said to be crawling towards a solid and impregnable protection. The uniformed Band of Hampton, who could not leave the town, were surprised to be wounded in the most shameful manner, not only by the usual savagery, but by the uniformed and infuriated blacks who were encouraged by them in their excesses. They pillaged and encouraged every act of murder and rapine—killing a poor man by the name of Kirby who had been lying on his bed at the point of death for more than six weeks, shot his wife in the hip at the same time, and killing his faithful dog while lying under his feet. The murdered Kirby was lying, last night, with his eyes in his hands."

[These being the letters of captain Cooper; the article signed P. attributed to colonel R. E. Parker, and the reports of Messrs. Griffin and Lively, inserted in vol. IV. page 331, of R. G. Astor's history of "The State of Hampton."] Extract from a report made to major Crutchfield by Thomas Griffin and Robert Lively, capt. det. Co. 4th July, 1813.

"Upon reaching Hampton, a scene of desolation and destruction presented itself—the British inhabitants of Craney Island, seemed not to have recovered from the effects of our arms and constant ammunition. A very quiet notice in Paris had reached us of the violence and uncontrolled fury of the enemy, after they obtained possession of the place—their conduct in some cases being represented as would have disgraced the days of Vandiver—our feelings were much excited, and we deemed it our duty to pursue the enquiry as far as practicable, and as sorry to say, that from all the information we could procure, from sources so respectable to permit us to doubt, we are compelled to believe that acts of violence have been perpetrated, which have disgraced the age in which we live. The soldiers who guarded by the soldiers' honor, escaped not the hundreds of superior forces, nor could disseminate the loss of his loyalty. The apology that the savages were committed by the British soldiers attached to the British forces, now in our waters, appeared to us no justification of those who employed them, believing, as we do, that an officer is, or should be, ever responsible for the conduct of the troops under his command." Admiral Cockburn's Despatches.

[FROM A LONDON PAPER.]

The following abstract of the pompous details of admiral Cockburn, might well make us laugh, if his savage outrages could inspire any thing else than horror. The infamous wretch claims brilliant achievement, in actions that would have been disdained by a one gun privateer. EN. REG.

His first report to admiral Warren, April 29, states, that a detachment of marines and artillery, consisting of 155 men, proceeded with the boats of the squadron, under the direction of lieutenant Westphal, first of the Marlborough, to Frenchtown on the Elk, "where, after a short resistance, they obliged the American to abandon that place, and their depots of stores, flour, cavalry equipments, &c. &c. They likewise destroyed 5 vessels near that place. This service was performed with great gallantry, and only one seaman was wounded."

Admiral Cockburn's second report, dated off Turkey Point, May 3, gives an account of the attack upon Havre-de-Grace, at the entrance of the Susquehanna. This place (says the account) had acquired importance from the American colors being hoisted on a lately erected battery. The attack was made in two divisions; one under the command of lieutenant Westphal, and the other under captain Lawrence of the Pantome. A warm fire was opened on the place at day-light by captain L's division, which was smartly returned from the battery for a short time, but which soon slackened, when captain L. effected a landing with the marines; the Americans withdrew from the battery, and took shelter in the town. Lieutenant W. got possession of the battery, and turned the guns against the enemy, and thereby forced them to retreat with their whole force to the farthest extremity of the town, where they were pursued, and at length forced to take shelter in the woods.

The gallant lieutenant received a shot through the hand in the pursuit, but notwithstanding succeeded with the other in taking prisoner a captain of militia; an ensign and a few armed individuals were also taken, but the rest having penetrated the woods it was not deemed prudent to pursue farther, and, therefore, adds admiral Cockburn, "after setting fire to some of the houses, to cause the proprietors (who had deserted them, and formed part of the militia who had fled to the woods) to understand and feel what they were liable to bring upon themselves by building batteries and acting towards us with so much useless rancour, I embarked in the boats the guns from the battery, and having also taken and destroyed about one hundred and thirty stand of small arms, I detached a small division of boats up the Susquehanna, to take and destroy whatever they might meet with in it, and proceeded myself with the remaining boats under captain Lawrence, in search of a cannon foundry, which I had gained intelligence of, whilst on shore in Havre, as being situated about three or four miles to the northward, where we found it accordingly, and getting possession of it without difficulty, commenced instantly its destruction, and that of the guns and other materials we found there, to complete which, occupied us during the remainder of the day, as there were several buildings, and much complicated heavy machinery attached to it. It was known by the name of the Cecil, or Principio foundry, and was one of the most valuable works of the kind in America; the destruction of it, therefore, at this moment, will, I trust, prove of much national importance.—We have been on shore in the heart of the enemy's country and on his high road between Baltimore and Philadelphia. The boats sent up the Susquehanna destroyed five vessels and a flour store."—Total taken and destroyed—50 guns and 130 stands of arms.

The third report of admiral Cockburn dates from Sassafras river, and in it mentions successful attacks on Georgetown, Fredericktown, and another town situated up that river. At the two former much resistance was made, and in consequence, the whole of the towns were destroyed, except the houses of those who had remained peaceably in them, and taken no part against us. The inhabitants of the other place met the admiral at landing, to say that they had not permitted either guns or militia to be stationed there; and that whilst there he should meet with no opposition. The admiral then entered the town with a small guard, and ascertaining that there was no public property of any kind, or warlike stores, re-embarked, leaving the people, well pleased with the wisdom of their determination in the mode of receiving him. The admiral adds, "I also had a deputation from Charles town, in the north east river, to assure me that that place is considered by them at your mercy, and that neither guns nor militia men shall be suffered there; and as I am assured that all the places in the upper part of the Chesapeake have adopted similar resolutions, and there is now neither public property, vessels, or warlike stores remaining in this neighborhood, I propose returning to you with the light squadron tomorrow morning."

AMERICAN NAVAL GLORY.

It is a fact worthy of everlasting remembrance, that the United States, with only 8 or 9 frigates, had their flag flying, at the same time, in the North Sea, in the middle of the Atlantic, and in the Pacific ocean, "the thousand" British ships of war "to the contrary notwithstanding." What a lesson is this to European nations!

Maryland—Election-Statistics.

The following table was compiled to shew the monstrous absurdity of the system by which the people of Maryland are supposed to be represented, which has regard neither to population or taxation, and partakes immediately of the shire and borough mockeries of England. Examination will preclude the necessity of comment—we are satisfied that it is generally correct:

* Baltimore city and county, taking Cecil, the most waronly contested county in the State, as the scale, might vote at least 12,000 votes—of which the Federal force exceed 2,500—we, however estimate the majority at only 6000; which, we think, all will agree that it is.

* Montgomery, like Baltimore, never having an opposition that holds forth the unanimous vote, compared with Cecil as aforesaid (and their white population is very nearly the same) has 2,000 votes, and may afford a Federal majority of from 5 to 600.

* Charles county, by the same rule of calculation, has 1,600 votes; of whom from 1,000 to 1,100 are Federalists—say the majority is 550.

* St. Mary's, as above, has about 1,500 votes—and 310 of a Federal majority.

* Somerset, by the like calculation, has 2,000 votes, and may have a Federal majority of 600.

* Dorchester has frequently sent "republican" members; but we are informed there was no opposition the present year. The "Federal" majority cannot be estimated at more than 250.

† The poll was small in Harford; and this majority might have been increased 500 votes. The opposition was disregarded.

‡ The real average majority in Anne Arundle is about 100 more. But we take the highest on each side.

Sugar planting in Georgia.

Being informed that some successful experiments had been made in the cultivation of sugar in Georgia, we took some pains to ascertain the progress made towards the attainment of an object so interesting. One of the gentlemen addressed on this subject was favored with the following statement, which he received of his friend, and politely forwarded for insertion in the REGISTER.

SAPELO, August 17, 1813.

Sir—Your letter on the subject of sugar planting, has come to hand, and in reply to your inquiries of my opinion of its probable success, I can only say, that my opinion is made up, on the experience of six or seven years planting, from one to five acres. I never made any sugar until two years ago, because, as you know, I have been uniformly in the legislature at that season of the year, when the cane is ripe. Two years ago, there was made twenty-five pounds of good sugar, and last year eighty-four, on my plantation, from two rows, of one hundred and five feet long, or something less than the fortieth part of an acre—this would be upwards of three thousand weight to the acre; but I would not expect a field of cane to be as good.

I had last year ten acres. I gave one acre away to a friend, and put up into stack, as they do in Louisiana, nine acres, intending to plant one hundred this season;—but the winter was so severe that my cane was injured in stack, and I could only plant forty odd acres. I am, however, erecting my sugar works, and shall plant extensively the coming year, meaning only to manufacture this season as much as will fully instruct my people.

For many years, the public opinion in this quarter, has run very much against the cultivation of the cane, and I was deterred (against the convictions of my own mind in its favor) from going to the expence of five thousand dollars in erecting sugar works. At present, every one, that has seen the sugar made at my place, and the cane growing, is anxious to go into the cultivation, and in two years some thousand acres will be planted.

I have thus confined my answer to your single enquiry as to the probable success of this article. Had I supposed, you wished for a more detailed account I would have given it. You will observe this sugar has been produced upon a Sea-Island, though I have no doubt the culture will extend some distance into the country, though if cultivated on swamp land, I suspect the sugar will not be of an equal quality.

And I remain, sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS SPALDING.

J. W. Devereaux, Esq.—Hilledgerville.

European Prospects.

We have before noticed the little dependence that is to be put in European advices, first distorted in the columns of the British ministerial papers, and then so garbled on this side of the Atlantic as to doubly obscure the weak rays of truth, that had forced their way through the mass of delusion—for the "well-inclined" in the United States only take such parts of the news as best suits their own purposes, to the great detriment of the public intelligence: and it unfortunately happens that the foreign gazettes very generally fall into the hands of persons capable of the thing here complained of.

The late intelligence from Europe of the rupture of the armistice and the new coalition of Russia, Austria, Prussia, Britain and Sweden against France, whether it be true to the amount as stated or not, has afforded infinite satisfaction to the enemies of the United States; who see, in the wonderful conjunction, many reasons to induce Great Britain to persist in her arrogant and inadmissible pretensions, so far as they concern our country—for this, and nothing else, is the cause of the exultation we see in many of our journals. Were not England concerned in those wars, they would feel as little interest for the "deliverance of Europe" as for the DELIVERANCE OF ASIA—and that "humanity," "liberty," or "religion" has no part in their feelings, is proved from their perfect insensibility to the oppressions of Ireland, the outrages in Sicily and worship of Juggernaut.

We sincerely regret the facts that have transpired, if true; and we shall consider them as such for the purpose of offering a few passing remarks. We regret them, first, as bolstering the pride of our enemy, and diverting the people of Great Britain from looking towards such measures as might lead to an honorable peace. Secondly, because of the torrents of blood that must flow and overwhelming desolation that will follow, this new and ill-advised confederacy—and, thirdly, as its object will entirely fail, that Napoleon's already mighty power may be increased, by the discomfiture of those who, with a short season of peace and a due attention to their resources, might have withstood his pretensions, in a quarrel of their own.

It appears probable that Bonaparte calculated the armistice would not terminate in peace, from the immense bodies of troops that have marched from France and Italy and the states of the confederation of the Rhine, to join his grand army near the line of demarkation. This force, at our last accounts, must have amounted to nearly 500,000 men, and that of the allies was, perhaps, as great, yet not so well disposed or concentrated. But what could have induced his father-in-law, the emperor of Austria, to join in this league against him, if he has really joined it, is incomprehensible; unless we attribute it to that infatuation, or rather insanity, that has for many years possessed the cabinets of Europe, leading directly to the establishment of the power they meant to destroy, and making their own territories the seat of the calamities they would have inflicted on others. And to those who have viewed the chain of events for twenty odd years past on that continent, it will, indeed, appear that, Quem Deus vult perdere prius dementat.

Six times has Napoleon placed his foot upon the neck of Austria—six times has he refrained to exercise the conqueror's right, and permitted a power to exist that fought unflinchingly for the annihilation of his own. He hoped to have bound the emperor to the happiness of his own people, by a marriage with his beloved daughter, and the birth of a grandson would have appeared to have consummated this desire. This wife, the child of the emperor of Austria, has been treated with the most marked tenderness and respect; and, in his absence, she directs, as the regent, the affairs of the empire. What else could he have done to shew his confidence in Austria—and what has Austria to prefer again him?—What had she not to hope from his friendship, and that of his wife and her son, the heir apparent of the most powerful state in the world? The declaration of war (if Austria has declared war) may give us some clue to the conduct of her ruler, when we receive it.

Moreau, it is also stated, has joined Bernadotte, who has a force of about 100,000 men, a medley of many nations, somewhere near the Elbe. We are yet doubtful of Bernadotte's real designs; but look upon him as a ruined man, if he has really and truly intended to earn the wages of England, and desert the friend who has made him what he is.

For many reasons too tedious to detail, we are clearly of opinion that this English coalition will be immediately dissolved. Bonaparte has taken his measures, and will command the peace of the continent.

We are pleased with these anticipations, though we sincerely deplore the causes that give birth to them; for we cannot, on any account, consider this war, but as the war of Great Britain; and we fervently wish that Great Britain may be discomfited every where and in every thing, until she does the just part to the United States, our country. May all the allies of the enemy, our enemy, fail; whether they be, the savages of America, the Moors of Africa, the Cossacks of Europe, or the murderous idolators of Asia!—May she be pinched on every side, and return to honesty through necessity, the only law she respects.

Always considering Bonaparte a bad man, and never being able to bring myself to forgive him for his assumption of the throne, I have no pleasure in his victories—but when I see in them the humiliation of the enemy of my own country, my feelings may be described by saying, I am glad that England is defeated, though I regret that Bonaparte has conquered; and so viewing it, as I have more regard to the peace and independence of the United States than for the “deliverance of Europe,” as the British wars are fancifully called, I am free to confess, that the sensation of pleasure far overbalances that of regret.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The conquest of Canada. When it is considered that the United States, from a long period of peace, were destitute of military means save what existed in the natural resources of the country, and had but few, very few, citizens acquainted with the multifarious business of war, a science that can only be learned with great application, and considerable experience—and when to the reflections immediately present with these facts, we add the difficulties cast in our way by the conduct of general Hull, so prolific of injury, we shall see the point of the remark made by that tough old patriot, major-general Putnam, who had fully participated in the labors and dangers of the conquest of Canada, then a very inconsiderable colony, by the British, the war for which ended by the capture of Quebec, September 13, 1759.

Being often questioned, at the first dawnings of our glorious revolution, by many of the royal officers of distinction, with whom he had served in Canada, as to the part he would take in the event of an open rupture, he said, “with his country.” When the “nakedness of the land” was pointed out to him, and the prowess of the British fleets and armies were enlarged upon, to shew the folly of resistance—he returned “that the event was with Providence”; but that he had calculated, if it required six years for the combined forces of England and the colonies, to conquer such a feeble country as Canada, it would, at least take a long time for England alone to overcome the colonies.” &c.

RETAIATION. Salem Oct. 9.—On Thursday last, ten English prisoners were selected from the prison ship in this town, and sent to Ipswich stone jail, to be kept in close confinement, as hostages in part for the sixteen unfortunate Americans confined in a dungeon at Halifax. We also learn that about one hundred English soldiers and seamen are to be detained in retaliation for those so unaccountably selected from the American prisoners at Halifax, and sent to England. This mode of retaliating upon the enemy has produced good effects on former occasions, and we trust that a speedy release of our unfortunate countrymen so cruelly and so unjustly confined by the enemy, will be the immediate result of this spirited measure of our government.

The Russian mediation. Our commissioners arrived at St. Petersburg on the 27th of July. Lords Aberdeen and Walpole have proceeded, or were about to proceed to the continent, as some suppose to meet Messrs. Gallatin and Bayard.

We are led to believe (says the New-York Gazette) from private advices per the Robert Burns, that although the British government had rejected the mediation of Russia, they had sent out lord Walpole and Mr. Moriere, to hear the propositions of Messrs

Bayard and Adams. Few, however, were so sanguine as to suppose, that a peace would grow out of this mission, as it was believed in England, that our commissioners were not clothed with any powers which were not dependent on the proffered mediation of Russia. We shall probably soon know more about the nature of the instructions given to our envoys. Our opinion is, that their powers are unlimited. In this case the result may be propitious to the friends of peace.

Exchange, &c. A letter from Liverpool, dated August 29, says—"I am sorry to inform you, that the exchange of prisoners as agreed upon by Colonel Barclay and general Mason has not been sanctioned by the British government."

The following letter from one of the British under secretaries of state, has been published as relating to the intercourse between the United States and Great Britain :

“WHITEHALL, Aug. 14, 1815.

“SIR—I am directed by lord Sidmouth to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 12th instant, stating the arrival of the Robert Burns cartel, at Liverpool, from New-York, and requesting permission for her return to America with passengers.

“You also state in your letter that the documents which accompany it will show on what ground the cartel was enabled to come to this country, from which you trust a similar indulgence will be granted to the ship on her return voyage, namely to take as passengers all Americans who may have regular passports: also any British subjects (except a mechanic) whose concerns may call them to the United States.

“In reply, I am to acquaint you, that permission will be given to the Robert Burns cartel to return to New-York, with such American prisoners as shall have been duly exchanged: but that the British government cannot consent to allow any American citizen resident here to proceed as passenger on board the cartel until some satisfactory explanation shall have been given of the detention of British subjects, resident in the United States.*

“For the same reason the British government cannot permit any British subjects to proceed in the cartel to the United States, as they may be thereby exposed to the same measures of severity.

I am, &c. (Signed) J. BUCKETT.”

“C. Sheels, Esq. St. Mildred's Court.”

An English paper, speaking of the ninth September, the day recommended by the President as a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer, had these words: “Let no man who wishes to continue the war by active means, by vote, or lending money, DARE TO PROSTRATE HIMSELF AT THE ALTAR, on the fast day; for these are virtually as much partakers in the war as the soldier who thrusts the bayonet; and although they may not be consumed at the altar, yet the judgments of the Almighty will await them!” Well—and on the tenth, the very next day, Perry “consumed” the enemy!—Miserable wretches!

The firings of the flotillas on lake Erie, were heard on the 10th ult. distinctly, by many persons down the lake, at the distance of one hundred and sixty miles.

* British subjects have not been detained. The order that certain of them should remove from the sea coast, the coast being threatened by the enemy, has probably given rise to the idea; we have not so far forgot what was due to humanity as first to do what the enemy has done; nor have any been made prisoners but such as were really captured as such

A bill is before the legislature of South Carolina, authorising the treasurer to borrow of the banks 150,000 dollars, at an interest not exceeding 7 per cent. to pay the state's quota of the direct tax.

British license.—On Saturday last, the hon. judge Story pronounced (before the circuit court now in session in Exeter, N. H.) sentence in the case of the ship St. Lawrence, sent into Portsmouth, (with a British license) by the privateer America, of Salem, condemning vessel and cargo to the captors, for a breach of the United States non-importation law.

[Dos. pap. 9th inst.]

In consequence of the late movements of our armies, there has been a levy en masse in Lower Canada, of all persons capable of bearing arms from 15 to 25 years of age.

CANADIAN PROCLAMATION.

By his excellency lieutenant-general sir George Prevost, governor-general and commander-in-chief in and over his majesty's North American provinces, A PROCLAMATION.

It having been represented to his excellency, the commander of the forces, that in consequence of the adoption by the government of the U. States, of the novel and unjustifiable principle, of making prisoners of war, and parolling, the unarmed and peaceable citizens of these provinces, several subjects of his majesty have, under such circumstances, been deterred from accepting employment in their different callings as mechanics or otherwise, or from aiding in any other manner the public service, under an apprehension of exposing themselves to the resentment of the enemy for having violated their parole, his excellency takes this public opportunity of declaring, that such a principle is not sanctioned by the usages of war amongst civilized nations, and that no parole thus extorted from peaceable citizens not taken in arms, can be considered as binding upon them, or as exempting them from any military or other duties which they may be called upon to perform.

The only legitimate objects of capture on land during war, as recognized by the laws of nations, are those who are actually engaged in military service, or who are found with arms in their hands; beyond these two descriptions of persons it has never been the practice of the modern nations of Europe to consider any other as liable to be carried away as prisoners of war, or as subjects to be paroled.

It was reserved for America, who has last assumed a rank among the nations, and for those acting under its authority, unnecessarily to increase the calamities of war, by making peaceable and unoffending citizens subject to its rigours, and by exacting from them engagements, the nature of which is to preclude them from gaining their subsistence by their honest and ordinary callings, if exercised in support of the government which protects them.—In order to remove from the minds of such persons, who, having fallen into the power of the enemy, have been obliged to enter into engagements of this nature, all apprehension with regard to the consequences of violating them, his excellency deems it necessary thus publicly to declare, that a parole, even lawfully taken, can only extend to the military service in arms, either in the garrison or the field, of the persons giving it, and cannot preclude them from performing their ordinary duties as subjects, or from the exercise of their usual civil occupations.

And his excellency here further declares, that should the enemy still persist to act upon the unjust principle beforementioned, and should any persons (who having been paroled as aforesaid, shall again fall into the hands of the enemy,) be treated with severity in consequence of their having been employed in the public service in any other manner, he will not fail, immediately to avail himself of the means within his power, of removing from the American frontiers such of their citizens as shall be within his reach, and of retaliating upon them all the severity and rigor which shall have been practised towards any of his majesty's subjects under the foregoing circumstances.

His excellency at the same time feels it incumbent upon him further to declare, that as he has strong reasons to believe that in several instances the paroles thus taken have been sought for by the persons as giving them the means of evading the performance of their militia and other duties, and as others, notwithstanding the present declaration, may, from similar or worse motives, be induced still to withhold their aid in carrying on public works, his excellency will feel himself compelled forthwith to send all such useless and disaffected characters out of the country to the enemy, to whom they consider themselves as belonging, as prisoners of war, there to remain as such until regularly exchanged. Given under my hand and seal of arms at Kingston, this fourth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen.

GEORGE PREVOST,
Commander of the forces.

By his excellency's command,

E. B. BRENTON.

MILITARY.

From Ontario.—By the statements published in our last, an universal anxiety was excited, whetted not a little by the apparently incomprehensible want of intelligence,* as to the result of the contest between the hostile squadrons on Ontario. It was not until Wednesday, almost a week after we first heard of the battle, we learned that Chauncey, if not entirely victorious, had at least obtained a signal triumph over his arrogant foe,—to the great distress of the enemies of the United States.

We have not yet received official details: indeed the accounts we have are extremely desultory, but they all agree in this, that Yeo was beaten; and that Chauncey returned to Sackett's Harbor after capturing four of his schooners, filled with troops.

The facts are briefly as follows:—The action took place as stated in page 101—but the battle was not general; for the enemy avoided it, and so far succeeded, that the Pike alone for more than half an hour fought his whole fleet!—Yeo got so near the land off Burlington heights, the better to be protected by the land batteries, that the Wolfe grounded, and the other vessels were compelled to surround her to save her from the terrible fire of our frigate. Chauncey maintained the fight for about an hour longer, when, (as it seems, for we are not informed how it happened) finding he could not effect the destruction of the enemy, after Perry's excellent manner, and, perhaps, having some other important object in view, he left the "knight of the rueful countenance" and proceeded down the lake, capturing on his way four of the enemy's schooners, (two of them being those they took from us some time ago) having on board about 280 German troops, and left the Lady of the Lake and the Salp in chase of a fifth vessel, which they have probably taken. This sketch may suffice until we are better informed of particulars. In the affair, the Pike had fifteen or twenty killed and wounded; and the enemy is supposed to have suffered very considerably.

* Several express mails arrived at Washington city, without a single letter from the lines—supposed by military orders.

The northern armies, are probably, this day, entirely in Canada. Major-general Hampton, with 4000 choice troop, whose number was considerably increased immediately on his arrival, reached Ogdensburg, (on the St. Lawrence, about 130 miles west of Montreal) on the 4th inst. His object was known only to himself and his superiors; but as his troops had left behind them all their baggage except what was necessary for their immediate wants, a sudden attack on the enemy was fairly expected. It seems as if he were to cross the river and take a position to stop the communication between Kingston and Lower Canada. Major-general Wilkinson left Fort George on the 20th ultimo, and with many boats, carrying about 4000 of the best troops, arrived at Sackett's Harbor on the 2d or 3d inst. at which place the most extensive preparations had been made for a grand secret expedition. We are not yet informed if the expedition has sailed, but suppose it did about the 7th, and Chauncey doubtless came there to do his part in it. Yeo, it appears, had went up to the head of the lake to bring down the British troops; and that he partially succeeded in getting them off is to be inferred from the capture of some parties of them; but his main object was defeated. Fort George is left under the command of colonel Scott, with 700 regulars and 500 New-York militia; but the whole of that frontier is in the charge of brigadier-general McClure, of New-York, with a force altogether of 3 or 4000 men, including 5 or 600 Indians. The patriotism of the New-York militia surpasses all praise; they have flocked to the frontier with all possible alacrity, and have no scruples of conscience about entering the enemy's country. When general McClure arrived at Leruston, the British, from Queenston, opened a fire upon him; but they were soon silenced by a couple of pieces of cannon brought from Fort George and many of their buildings laid in ashes by hot shot. We sustained no injury. Every thing in this quarter is full of life and spirit, and has a prospect of glorious success.

From the north western army we have nothing further than is stated below; save only that a letter to the editor of the Register says, generally, that every possible preparation had been made and was making to pursue the white and red enemy in all directions.

On the whole, we indulge the hope that the entire enemy force west of Montreal will be in our possession in a few days, if it has not already happened. The address and united talents of the secretary at war and general Wilkinson, assisted by the excellent Chauncey, appear to have completely outgeneralled the enemy on the lower lake, and Perry's mighty deed opened the way for all sorts of successful operation in the upper country.

Additional.—Since the above written we have an account to which we attach full credit, that a part of the N. W. army, probably colonel Johnson's mounted men, had entered Detroit on the 28th ult. without opposition. The enemy had evacuated and burnt the fort and citadel and all the public buildings. Our Indians had captured and brought in 13 or 14 of the enemy Indians.

It is stated that general Darborn has been ordered to take the command at New York for a short time; after which he will proceed to the frontiers.

The states of New York and Vermont are pouring forth their patriotic spirits to the lines—from whence we hope and believe they may soon return to their homes, conscious of having "done the state some service."

Col. Constant, of the 3d reg. U. S. infantry, has resigned his command, in consequence of the appointment of colonels Pike, Winder, and Lizard, to be brigadier generals in the army of the United States, considering himself injured by the violation of his grade. His resignation has been accepted by the President.

For prisoners in Canada, see page 109.

Many letters from the Creek country confirm the horrid account of the fight and massacre at Tensaw, or Tensaw, as noticed in page 77, with additional particulars. There were 398 souls, in all, in the fort, of whom only 17 or 18 escaped. The Indian force was about 700 warriors; who, after the massacre, ravaged all the adjacent country, burnt the houses, and killed or carried off the negroes and stock. It is thought they lost nearly 200, for our people, seeing no hope of escape, fought desperately. There appears a disposition to blame col. Hawkins for giving a false security; and for restraining the military movements for the defence of the country. A considerable number of gen. Jackson's mounted volunteers were to have rendezvous'd near Nashville on the 26th ult. to go against the savages.—For some interesting particulars, see page 105—6.

The garrison at Norfolk is kept up by fresh troops from the interior. Among them is a company of riflemen, completely equipped, of whom it is said every one can bring down his man at the distance of 200 yards.

Extract of a letter from maj. gen. Harrison to the Secretary of war, dated head quarters, Bass Island, 22nd Sept. 1813.

"The greater part of the troops are here with me, and the whole will, I believe, be up by 12 o'clock. I shall proceed as far as the Middle Sister, in the course of to night and to-morrow, and in the following night get so near the enemy's coast as to land two or three miles below Malden by eight o'clock in the morning. These prospects may, however, be retarded by adverse winds.—Com. Perry gives me every assistance in his power."

THE CAPTURE OF MALDEN.

Copy of a letter from maj. gen. Harrison to the war department.

Head-Quarters, Amherstburg, Sept. 23, 1813.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you that I landed the army under my command about three miles below this place at 3 o'clock this evening, without opposition, and took possession of the town in an hour after. General Proctor has retreated to Sandwich with his regular troops and Indians, having previously burned the fort, navy-yard, barracks and public store houses—the two latter were very extensive, covering several acres of ground. I will pursue the enemy to-morrow, although there is no probability of my overtaking him, as he has upwards of one thousand horses, and we have not one in the army. I shall think myself fortunate to be able to collect a sufficiency to mount the general officers. It is supposed here that general Proctor intends to establish himself upon the river French, forty miles from Malden. I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. HARRISON.

Copy of a letter from commodore Perry to the secretary of the Navy.

U. S. schooner Arcid, Malden Harbor,
23d September, 1813, 5 P. M.

SIR—I have the honor to acquaint you that the army under major-general Harrison, have this moment marched into Malden, without opposition and that the squadron are now at anchor off the town.

I have the honor to be, &c. O. H. PERRY.

Extract of a letter from colonel Smith of the rifle regiment, to colonel A. F. Nicholl, inspector-general, dated Lower Sandusky, October 4, 1813.

"I have already collected 520 of my regiment.—The last accounts from the general state that he was in pursuit of Proctor who had evacuated Malden, a few hours before he landed, I fear he will make his escape. I leave here immediately for Portage, and probably head quarters to procure transport for my detachment."

Copy of a letter from major-general Harrison to governor Meigs, dated head quarters, Amherstburg, 27th of September, 1813, 10 o'clock, P. M.

DEAR SIR,—The enemy have given up this important place without opposition; having destroyed the fort and all the public buildings, which were immensely extensive and valuable, particularly the navy-yard.

Proctor was yesterday at Sandwich, with his regulars and Indians. It is supposed he is bending his course to the river French, there to fortify and make a stand. I shall follow him as soon as I collect a few horses to mount the general officers and some of the staff.

A miserable French poney upon which the venerable and patriotic governor of Kentucky was mounted, is the only one in the army.

We landed three miles below the town. I wish your troops to remain at one of the Sandusky's for orders. Your friend,

WM. H. HARRISON.

NAVAL.

For a British account of the proceedings of admiral Cochran, at the head of the Chesapeake, see page 110.

The sloops of war, Frolic, Wasp and Peacock, lately launched, are of the burthen of 509 tons, have 26 ports, and will carry 20 32 lbs. carronades and 2 long 9's, and 196 men.

Capt. Gordon has taken the command of the Constellation, lying at Norfolk.

A captain of one of the 74's that was sent after com. Rodgers, writing to his friend, says "tell Mr. — that he will have the pleasure of seeing com. Rodgers bye and bye in Edinburgh;"—and adds "we expect to have a tough contest with him."

British naval appointment.—Captain S. Popham, to the command of the Æolus frigate, under orders to join sir J. L. Yoe, on the lake service in America.

Below will be found the British accounts of the capture of the U. S. brig Argus, with the death of lieutenant com. Allen, late of the frigate United States, and highly approved by Decatur for his conduct in the battle with the Macedonian. We have contented ourselves with saying that these accounts are "essentially false;" and shall be much disappointed if it does not appear, that the force of the Pelican was really in weight of metal as well as in men, nearly double that of our brig. Previous to her capture the Argus had destroyed twenty-one vessels of the enemy:—see prize lists. We have lost another hero, and a fine little brig—but the enemy has gained no honor.

A vessel that has arrived at New-York from North Carolina, off Currituck picked up two barges in which were cutlasses, an 18 pounder and other warlike implements.

The president of the United States having considered the late British brig Bowyer as of equal force with the Enterprise, has ordered her to be delivered up for the benefit of the captors.

The British privateer Dart had committed great depredations on the eastern coast. Lieutenant Nicholson, commanding at Rhode-Island, had the revenue cutter manned with about 20 men, all volunteers, and she went out and took the privateer—see official account. The Dart had robbed a vessel that had been released at Bermuda of $500; which was recovered, and given by the owners to the crew of the cutter in compliment to their conduct. Ros., the captain of the privateer, appears a finished villain.

A battle off Portsmouth, between the U. S. brig Rattlesnake, capt. Creighton, and the British brig Young Emulous, captain Godfrey, is expected. The latter has 16 guns and 128 men, and was formerly the U. S. brig Nautilus. The latter is of 14 guns and 120 or 130 men.

Yarmouth, (Nova Scotia) Sept. 10.—The late Liverpool Packet, now called (as they say) the Young Teazer's Ghost, has been off this place for the last four days.

CAPTURE OF THE U. S. BRIG ARGUS.

The following, from a London paper of Aug. 25, is essentially false so far as the statement regards the force of the respective vessels. But as an account of the affair may soon be expected, through the navy department, we offer no further remarks upon the British tale, at present.

London, Aug. 25.—"The Americans wanted another proof of British superiority on the ocean. The Pelican has afforded it, in the capture of the Argus. On the 14th instant, at a quarter past 6, A. M. the Pelican descried a vessel on fire, between Milford Haven and Saltees, and a brig in company; on approaching nearer, the brig stood away under easy sail from the vessel on fire, when the Pelican crowded all sail in pursuit of her. The brig continued her course for some time, until being ready for action, she took in her royals, and hove to the wind on the larboard tack. When close enough, the brig gave three cheers and a broadside. Soon afterwards, the Pelican being also prepared for action returned the salute of three cheers, and a broadside with a similar complement. The opponents closed, and after a contest of 40 minutes, in which the brig was raked five times, capt. Maples gave directions for boarding on her starboard bow, and she was instantly carried, the Americans making no resistance whatever, and running below. In the act of boarding, the American ensign was lowered, and after the brig had struck, Mr. Young, the master's mate, received his death wound by a ball from the fore top. The Argus fought well while the cannonading continued; but her guns were not levelled with precision, and many shots passed through the Pelican's royals. The Argus's hammocks were cut away fore and aft, and her sides shew evident tokens of the dexterity of her antagonist. The Pelican's sides are also full of grape shot, but her rigging and sails are injured the most. Two shots, however, found their way through the boatswain's and carpenter's cabins. The British, though justly irritated with American braggadoos, were cool and steady, and their enthusiasm was regulated by the most attentive discipline. A spent ball, after passing through the hammocks, struck one of capt. Maples's buttocks, and fell on the deck. Lieut. Walsh, and Mr. Granville, master, highly distinguished themselves; but it is, perhaps, invidious to select any names where one and all performed their duty. The Argus carries 18 24 pounders and 2 long 12's formerly belonging to the Macedonian, and had 130 men at the commencement of the action; of whom six men were killed and sixteen wounded, besides her captain. The Pelican mounts 16 32 pounders and 4 long 6's, and began the battle with only 113 men, (Mr. Peane and five men being absent in a prize) of whom two were killed and three wounded. Capt. Allen, the commander of the Argus, lost his leg at the second broadside; but did not leave the deck, until from his fainting away through the loss of blood it became absolutely necessary to remove him below."

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, August 24.

Extract of a letter from capt. Maples of his majesty's sloop Pelican, to vice-admiral Thornborough, and transmitted by the latter officer to J. W. Croker, Esq?

His Majesty's sloop Pelican, St. David's Head,
East five leagues, August 14

I have the honor to inform you, that in obedience to your orders to me of the 12th instant, to cruise in St. George's channel for the protection of the trade, and to obtain information of the American sloop of war, I had the good fortune to board a brig, the master of which informed me that he had seen a vessel apparently a man of war steering to the N. E.; at 4 this morning I saw a vessel on fire, and a brig standing from her, which I soon made out to be a cruiser; made all sail in chase, and at half past five we came alongside of her (she having shortened sail, and made herself clear for an obstinate resistance) when after giving her three cheers our action commenced, which was kept up with great spirit on both sides 43 minutes, when we lay her alongside, and were in the act of boarding when she struck her colors. She proved to be the U. States' sloop of war Argus, of 360 tons, 18 twenty-four pound carronades, and 2 long 12 pounders; had on board when sailed from America, (two months since) a complement of 140 men, but in the action 127, commanded by lieutenant-commandant W. H. Allen, who, I regret to say, was wounded in the early part of the action, and has since suffered the amputation of his left thigh.

No eulogium I could use would do sufficient justice to the merits of my gallant officers and crew (which consisted of 116;) the cool courage they displayed, and the precision of their fire, could only be equalled by their zeal to distinguish themselves; but I must beg leave to call your attention to the conduct of my first lieutenant, Thomas Welsh; of Mr. Gauville, acting master; Mr. Wm. Ingram, the purser, who volunteered his services on deck; and Mr. Richard Scott, the boatswain.

Our loss, I am happy to say, is small;—one master's mate, Mr. William Young, slain in the moment of victory, while animating, by his courage and example, all round him; one able seaman, John Kitey; besides five seamen wounded, who are doing well; that of the enemy I have not been able to ascertain, but it is considerable; her officers say, about forty killed and wounded. I have the honor to be, &c. J. F. MAPLES, Commander.

PLYMOUTH, August 24

On Saturday last, the 21st was interred with military honors, William Henry Allen, Esq. late commander of the United States sloop of war Argus, who lost his left leg in an action with his majesty's sloop of war Pelican, J. F. Maples, Esq. captain, in St. George's channel, the 14th inst. whereof he died in Mill Prison Hospital, on the 15th following.

PROCESSION.

Guard of Honor.

Lieutenant-Colonel of Royal Marines,

With two companies of that corps.

The Captain, Subalterns and Field-Adjutant

(officers with hat-bands and scarfs)

Royal Marine Band.

Vicar and Curate of St. Andrew's.

Clerk of dioc.

THE HEARSE.

With the Corps of the dead, led Captain,

Attended by eight Serjeants, late of the Argus, with crape round their arms, tied with white crape ribbon.

Also, Eight British Captains of the Royal Navy, as Pall-Bearers with hat-bands and scarfs,

Captain Allen's Servants in Mourning.

The Officers late of the Argus, in uniform, with crape sashes and hat-bands, two and two.

John Hawker, Esq. late American Vice-Consul, and his Clerks, Captain Fellow,

Commissioner for Prisoners of War.

Dr. McGrath, Chief Medical Officer at Mill

Prison & port.

Captains of the Royal Navy, in port, two and two.

Followed by a very numerous and respectable retinue of inhabitants.

The procession left Mill Prison at 12 o'clock.—The coffin was covered with a velvet pall, on which was spread the American ensign, under which the action was fought, and on that the hat and sword of the deceased were laid. On the coffin being removed to the hearse, the guard saluted; and when deposited in the hearse, the procession moved forward, the band played the "Dead March in Saul." On their arrival near the church, the guard halted and clubbed arms, single files inward, through which the procession passed to the church, into which the corpse was carried, and deposited in the centre aisle, whilst the funeral service was read by the Rev. Vicar, after which it was removed and interred in the south yard (passing through the guard the same order front as to the church) on the right of Mr. Delphy, midshipman of the Argus, who lost both his legs in the same action, and was buried the preceding evening.

U. S. Frigate President, Patuxet, Oct. 7th.

SIR—Enclosed I have the honor of transmitting you a letter this moment received from lieutenant Nicholson, commanding the gun boats at Newport, informing me of the capture of the British private armed sloop D.r.t.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN RODGERS.

Hon. William Jones, Secretary of the Navy.

Copy of a letter from lieutenant Nicholson to commodore Rodgers.

Newport, October 5th, 1813.

SIR—I have the pleasure to inform you of the capture of the British private armed sloop "Dart," by the revenue cutter of this place last evening.—She appeared off the harbor before sun set; the captain of the cutter offered his services to go out; I put on board three sailing masters and about 20 men; she immediately made sail and laid aboard the Dart, and carried her by boarding; her first officer was killed; two of our own men were wounded slightly. The prisoners I send for your disposal.

Very respectfully, your most obedient humble servant,

JOSEPH NICHOLSON.

Commodore John Rodgers, U. S. frigate President.

Copy of a letter from Commodore Campbell to the Secretary of the Navy, dated St. Mary's, Sept. 18, 1813.

SIR—We had yesterday morning and night preceding one of the most severe gales I have ever witnessed. It commenced about 6 P. M. at N. N. E. and veered to N. by W. when it blew with the greatest force, and continued until about 1 A. M. at which time the tide, which had risen to an uncommon height, ceased to flow, and for about one hour we were favored with a calm. About 2 o'clock the gale re-commenced at S. W. and blew until day-break with equal, indeed, I think, increased violence. Here the destruction commenced; every vessel in harbor drove on shore or sunk at their moorings. Gun vessel No. 164, John R. Grayson, commander, that had just returned from conveying troops to Beaufort, upset at anchor, and of 26 souls on board at the time she went down only six were saved. Mr. Grayson and two men reached the marsh on the Florida side, and with great difficulty supported themselves through the night and until 11 o'clock next day, when they were discovered and taken off. Mr. Lecompf, midshipman on board, and two men, were taken off from an old wreck about two and a quarter miles down the river between this place and Point Peter, to which place they were taken. No. 161, in ordinary, lies sunk with above the harbor. I am in hopes she will be got up. No. 62, the same which was reported as condemnable, which lay off the town, having on board the men attached to vessels in ordinary, sunk at her anchors, but fortunately no lives were lost. No. 160, 158, 63 and 165 are on shore above high water mark—they will be got off with little damage. The two former are in ordinary. No. 3, hospital vessel, parted her cables and drifted over a body of marsh about 3 miles, and is now on the Florida shore; I have sent her assistance, and hope she will be got off. No. 168, John Hullburd, commander, lying off the south end of Cumberland, not being able to fetch into this river above Point Peter, run for the harbor of Fernandina, and anchored above the town, from which situation he was driven some miles over a marsh, and is now on shore about 6 or 7 miles from this place with the loss of his mainmast. The Saucy Jack privateer, of Charleston, lying ready to sail, is now lying high and dry on a marsh that must be at least 5 feet above the level of low tide. She draws 14 feet, seven feet being the common rise.

This town has suffered much: seven inhabited houses blown down, and several in frame—but no lives lost; much more fortunate than its neighboring town Fernandina, where, I am told by a gentleman just from that place, that 20 houses are blown down, every vessel in port drove on shore, except a Swedish brig, and a considerable amount of mercantile property destroyed. I have the honor to be, &c.

HUGH G. CAMPBELL.

Two gun-boats were launched at Plattsburg, on the 6th inst. Every thing for their equipment was so far prepared, that they would be immediately ready for service.

Midshipman Claxton, of the Lawrence, has died of the wounds he received in the battle on Erie. He was 19 years old, had been several years in the navy, and was a youth of great promise.

BLOCKADE OF NEW-LONDON.

The people of Killingworth had a fifth skirmish with some of the British barges on the 3rd inst.—They were beaten off, as it is supposed with considerable loss.

BLOCKADE OF THE CHESAPEAKE.

There is a manifest disposition in the British officers to convert their vessels of war into slave ships. The trade in negroes has been brisk, though several times checked and punished; and measures have been taken to stop it in future. Five or six of these deluded and unfortunate creatures were shot by a party of militia, attempting their escape to the enemy in Lynhaven bay.

On the 16th inst. some of the enemy's barges were in the Patuxet, apparently sounding the channel. After which they went down the bay.

604. British privateer sloop Dart, six 9 lb. carronades and six swivels, captured by the U. S. revenue cutter Vigilant, capt. Cabonne and carried into Newport, off which she had been committing many depredations.

The following list of prizes made by the late U. S. brig Argus, is copied from a Plymouth (E.) paper. It shews the efficiency of that kind of warfare we have often recommended in the REGISTER, to wit, the fitting out of a number of small vessels to destroy the trade of the enemy: who she did be bound never to attempt to send in a prize, or fight a battle with a vessel of war, if it could possibly be avoided. The Belford (see No. 623) is said to have been worth 10,000*l.* sterling

605. Schr. Salamanca, of Poole, from Oporto to Newfoundland, destroyed.

606. Brig Susannah, from Madeira, to London, cargo destroyed; vessel sent to England with prisoners.

— Schr. Matilda, an American privateer, captured by the Lion privateer, and since recaptured and sent to England.

607. Brig Richard, from Gibraltar to London, destroyed.

608. Brig Fowey, from Limerick with provisions, destroyed.

609. Sloop Lady Francis, from Limerick with provisions, destroyed.

610. Ship Barbadoes, a transport from Cork to Limerick, in ballast destroyed.

611. Brig Alliance, transport, from Cork to Limerick, in ballast, destroyed.

612. Schr. Cordelia, from Antigua to Bristol, destroyed.

613. Ship Betsey, of Bristol, sent to France; recaptured and brought to Plymouth.

614. Ship Mariner, of Bristol, destroyed.

615. Sloop, name unknown, from Poole to Liverpool, with clay, destroyed.

616. Brig Helena, with clay, sent to England with prisoners.

617. Brig, name unknown, from Wales to London, with slates: this brig was quite new, being her first voyage, destroyed.

618. Cutter Diana and Betty, from Ireland to Ilfracombe, with bullocks, destroyed.

619. Ship Defiance, from Greenock to Newfoundland, destroyed.

620. Brig Baltic, from Barbadoes to Dublin, destroyed.

621. Sloop, name unknown, with slates, iron, &c. cargo destroyed, vessel sent as a cartel.

622. Brig Belford, from Dublin to London, cargo 16,500 pieces of linen, destroyed.

623. A pilot-boat belonging to Bristol, liberated.

624. Another vessel destroyed, particulars not known.

THE CHRONICLE.

By a cartel ship that has arrived at New York, in 35 days from Liverpool, with 15 passengers, papers as late as the 27th Aug. have been received—from which it appears—

That the armistice was broken on the 10th of August, the six days notice for the renewal of hostilities being given, the determination of Austria to join the allies being at the same time declared, with 150,000 men. The aggregate of the allied forces of Russia, Austria and Prussia is given at 477,000 men. The crown-prince of Sweden is near the Elbe with 80,000 men.—9,000 British troops arrived at Stralsund on the 6th August. Every thing is busy, and mighty events may be expected, as the opposing forces are each ready to act. Indeed, from a firing heard along the French coast, it was supposed that Bonaparte had already gained a victory. Morcan had arrived in Russia, and it is said, will probably have a high command in the army. In Spain, the affairs of the British are rather unfavorable. Hellington appears to have been pretty severely defeated near Pamplona. Another account, however, is the very reverse of this; and a New-York paper says "WE are now relieved from the apprehension" of Wellington's defeat, &c. The truth will out by and bye. It is stated that all the French prisoners in Russia have been marched to Siberia!

The elections in Maryland have terminated in a considerable "republican" gain—see page III. As the senate of 15 members, is wholly "republican," and the governor is elected by a joint ballot, the political character of the executive will be changed.

Though a majority of the votes in Alleghany county were in favor of the "republican" candidates, the judges of the election, it is stated, have undertaken to return the "federalists;" thereby exactly reversing the strength of the parties in joint ballot. The cause given is, that one of the judges being a justice of the peace, and from his oath of office supposed qualified to act, was not sworn to that special duty, as his two colleagues were, for which, all the judges of the county assembled, rejected the votes of that district. To decide upon this, does not appear the province of the judges; but it will, if admitted, completely effect the purpose. Had they returned those highest in voice, and left the legality of the election to be decided by the legislature to whom it is thought to belong, whether the members were retained or rejected there had been a majority of 3 or 1, as the case might be, in joint ballot, for governor.

The elections in Pennsylvania, so far as we have heard of them, have ended with increased majorities for the "republican" tickets.

POSTSCRIPT.

WARREN, (O.) Oct. 5.

By the express.—We announce the glorious intelligence that Michigan territory is once more ours.—Our army took possession of Detroit on the 28th of Sept. The British retreated from Malden at the first appearance of our fleet. They burnt up all the public buildings and stores, both at Malden and Detroit. The army landed without opposition, and pursued its course up Detroit river to Sandwich; the fleet sailed at the same time for Detroit. The British have retreated for lake Ontario, by the river De Trench. The Indians, with Tecumseh at their head, have turned upon their allies, and are harassing their retreat. A flag has been sent in by the Indians soliciting peace. The British, when they began their retreat, had but three days provisions.

British Representation.

The persons named below were the late great leaders of the British government in 1807. They were elected from the rotten boroughs to serve in Parliament by the number of votes affixed to their honorable names—

Mr. Canning,	36	Returned for N. Town.
Lord Castlereagh,	32	Plympton.
Mr. Rose,	24	Christchurch.
Mr. Long,	55	Hessemere.
Mr. Huskisson,	80	Liskeard.
Mr. S. Bourne,	24	Christchurch.
Sir A. Warlesley,	42	St. Michaels.
Sir J. Pulteney,	95	Melcomb Regis.

The British House of Commons consists of about 700 member, almost as multitudinous as the legislature of Massachusetts has ever been!—of these, less than 200, and often 120 or 150, do the business of the nation. Such is the boasted "check" on monarchy.

The U. States Navy List, &c.

Inserted in our last, we exceedingly regret to say, has several errors. A moment's recollection would have pointed them out; but confiding in a partial statement furnished by a friend with a view to a complete list, we did not so carefully examine the facts as we ought, or are accustomed to do in things of the kind. The errors, so far as we are informed of them, are these—the frigates Boston, Constitution, Congress, Essex, John Adams, President, and United States, were "built" before the year "1800," as stated—say in 1798—and the Hornet in 1804 or 1805. Mast. Com. Charles G. Ridgley, is in Baltimore, and to command the sloop of war first to be launched here. The Sven, we believe, is under charge of Mast. Com. Parker.

Transmission of the Register.

The numerous complaints that have reached me from the state of Virginia, within a few weeks past, of the detention of the WEEKLY REGISTER, almost leads me to suspect what I would not willingly believe, that I am not fairly dealt with; but by whom, or where, I cannot form an idea. I have lost fifty subscribers in Virginia, because the REGISTER is often detained 3 or 4 weeks on the road to places where it ought to arrive in from 3 to 8 days. This is too serious a matter to be lightly dealt with; and nothing shall be left undone to effect a discovery of the cause.

The editor has only to repeat what he has so often declared, that the Register is so strongly packed, that it cannot honestly fail of reaching its destination uninjured, unless by getting wet in the mail. I have numbers sent from this office a 1000 miles and upwards, which were returned in the same envelope, unruined. And such things happen frequently:—the papers detained—are supposed lost and supplied,—then arrive and are politely sent back to keep up any files, by those who are anxious to preserve their own. And all the packages (again made up in strong bundles and addressed to the several states and territories) go into the Post-Office here on the day of publication, the packages for Tennessee excepted, which I prefer to retain until the Tuesday following, that they may proceed directly on; the mail for that state carrying papers but once in a week. From frequent observation (as well as from the great accuracy of the gentlemen in our Post-office) I am convinced that they go hence as regularly; and here all the charge I can have of them ends.

To ascertain the causes of detention, generally, and particularly that at this time complained of, the editor earnestly solicits the scrutiny with the advice of his friends.

Legislature of Connecticut.

GOVERNOR'S SPEECH:

Gentlemen of the Council, Mr. Speaker, and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives,

The severe pressure of the war upon the people of this state, gives unusual importance to the present session of the general assembly.

As I have conceived necessary for the public safety, to avail myself of the enlarged powers delegated to the executive by the resolutions of the last legislature, it is proper that I submit to your consideration a brief statement of the circumstances under which those powers were exercised.

When the United States' squadron took refuge in the harbor of New-London, it was at one perceived that the decayed and feeble state of the fortifications afforded a precarious defence. The menacing appearance of the hostile squadron at the entrance of the harbor, and the strong probability that the town would be destroyed in the conflict which was hourly expected, produced amongst the inhabitants the greatest consternation. In this moment of alarm the major-general of the 3d division, and the brigadier-general of the 3d brigade considered themselves justified, at the earnest entreaty of the citizens, in summoning the militia to their assistance. Having issued orders for that purpose, they immediately dispatched an express to me with intelligence of these transactions. On this occasion I could not hesitate as to the course which it became my duty to pursue. The government of Connecticut, the last to invite hostilities, should be the first to repel aggression. In my view it was not a time to enquire into the character of the enemy or the causes which made him such, when our territory was invaded and our citizens were demanding protection; and when no inconsiderable portion of our gallant navy was exposed within our own waters, to instant capture or destruction. I made no delay therefore in signifying to those officers my entire approbation of their conduct. The necessary supplies were immediately forwarded, and generally such measures of defence were adopted as the emergency evidently required. Information of these proceedings, and of subsequent operations at New-London, was duly transmitted to the general government, and the instructions of the president, in relation to this important subject, were requested. I received assurances from the national executive that measures would be taken to put the fortifications, on the eastern side of the harbor of New-London, into a respectable state of defence: that the wages of the militia thus called into service under the authority of the state, should be paid from the national treasury; and that provision would be made for liquidating and discharging the accounts of the commissary and quarter master departments.

The causes which first occasioned the array of a military force at New-London has not ceased to operate. Accordingly at the request of the general government, a considerable body of troops has been kept at that station. I have endeavored, conformably to the advice of the council, to divide the duty between the militia and the military corps, and to spread detachments of the former over the several brigades. To men, however, who are accustomed to different pursuits, the service could not be otherwise than burdensome. The remark is particularly applicable to the regiments in the neighborhood of New-London. From their proximity to the scene of action they were of course first brought into the field; and although they were first dismissed as speedily as circumstances would permit, yet the figquent alarms produced by sudden augmentations of the enemy's force as frequently compelled them to return. They have therefore suffered losses and privations which could be equalled only by the patience and magnanimity with which they were endured. Their hardships were unappreciated by an occurrence, which as it is intimately connected with these events, ought not to pass unnoticed.—An order from the war department for the dismissal of all the militia, then on duty, arrived at the moment a detachment from the distant brigades was on the march to relieve those who had been so repeatedly called into service. Believing the general government had the right of determining what degree of force would suffice to protect the national property, and unwilling to obtrude the services of our citizens upon the public when they were not desired, especially in a season so very important to our husbandmen, I issued instructions giving full effect to the order. Scarcely however had the disbanded troops reached their several homes, before a request for the militia was renewed, enforced by an urgent petition from the principal inhabitants of New-London and Groton. This combined application I felt no disposition to refuse. The requisite aid was immediately ordered; but from the necessity of the case, men who had been just discharged, were obliged to repair again to the post of danger, and to remain until a new detachment could be levied and brought to their relief. The ground of this procedure is hitherto unexplained.

The patriotism displayed by the officers and privates both of the military corps and of the militia during the whole of this anxious period, merits the highest commendation. Whilst their ready obedience to the first summons of their government has shown them to be the best of citizens, their strict attention to every part of military duty has proved them to be the best of soldiers. They have given the state indisputable evidence of their attachment to its constitutions, and of their ability to defend them.

The British force stationed in our waters having occasioned great inquietude along the whole of our maritime frontier, every precaution, consistent with a due regard to the general safety, has been adopted for its protection. Guards are placed at the points most exposed. In many towns on the coast the citizens exempt by law from military service, animated by a laudable zeal, have formed volunteer companies of artillery pursuant to the act, and the quarter-master general has received directions to supply them with ordnance. The resident militia whether infantry, cavalry or artillery have been excused from other duty, and are allowed to remain as a local defence; and sufficient quantities of ammunition are distributed, suited to the various descriptions of force. In our present state of preparedness, it is believed a descent upon our coast will not be attempted, a well grounded hope is entertained that it will be attended with little success. Unfortunately we have not the means of rendering our navigation equally secure. Serious depredations have been committed even in our harbors, and to such an extent that the usual communication through the Sound is almost wholly interrupted. Thus while anxiously engaged in protecting our public ships, we are doomed to witness the unrestrained capture of our private vessels, and the consequent suspension of commercial pursuits. These, it must be admitted, are necessary effects of a state of war, but they are not the less to be deplored.

In obedience to a resolution of the assembly passed at the last session, I made immediate application to the government of the United States, for the proportion of arms to which the militia of this state are entitled, under the act of congress making appropriations for that object, and I have the satisfaction to inform you that two thousand stands are received. By the act just mentioned it is made the duty of the legislature to provide by law for their distribution.

The various military supplies authorised by the resolves of the last session, are for the most part procured. The wisdom of the legislature in these preparatory measures became sufficiently evident from the events which soon after followed. As the United States were not in a condition to provide tents, camp equipage, or the suitable ammunition, our troops were furnished in these respects, and for a considerable time with subsistence also, by the quarter-master general and commissary general of the state.

You will perceive the expediency, gentlemen, of carefully reviewing the "Act for forming and conducting the military force of this state." Several obvious amendments are suggested by the present situation of our country. Amongst others it is desirable that the penalty for refusing or neglecting to perform a tour of duty, agreeably to the provisions of this act, should be rendered more definite, if not more efficient. You will also consider the propriety of prescribing rules for the government of the militia whilst in actual service, under the authority of the state. Although recent experience may have shewn that an habitual love of order and subordination supersedes, in a great measure, the necessity for any new restraints, still you will reflect whether it is either prudent or safe to remain in this respect wholly destitute of some positive regulations.

I will not be expected, gentlemen, that I should particularly recommend to your notice the various subjects which may properly occupy the deliberations of the assembly. They are confined principally to affairs of a local nature and will not escape your observation. Our political system calls for no theoretical reforms; nor does our happy state of society depend on a multiplication of laws. I should rejoice in being permitted to announce to you that our prospects abroad correspond with that degree of quiet and security to be found at home.

Gentlemen—The progress of the war affords little hope that its calamities will soon come to an end. The characteristic bravery of our seamen, in whatever service they are engaged, is indeed a just theme of national exultation; and it is devoutly to be wished that our naval triumphs may produce an auspicious effect upon this unhappy contest, the evils of which are seen and felt in whatever concerns the real prosperity of the country. To mitigate these evils, you will be disposed to employ every faculty which the structure of our government allows you to exercise; and if any constitutional effort on your part may contribute to remove them, I am persuaded it will not be withheld. The sentiments of the people of Connecticut upon this momentous subject cannot be misunderstood. Their disapprobation of the war was publicly declared through the proper organ, shortly after hostilities commenced; accompanied with an assurance that the obligations imposed by the constitution should nevertheless be strictly fulfilled. If no event has occurred to vary their opinion, the highest evidence is furnished of fidelity to their engagements. They have pursued that honorable course which regards equally the legitimate claims of the confederacy, and the rights and dignity of their own government.

It is with peculiar satisfaction, gentlemen, that I direct you in general assembly at this interesting pe-

Mod. I freely submit to your examination those measures which the crisis seemed to demand and which my best judgment led me to adopt; and I shall cheerfully accept your counsel and direction, relative to that line of conduct which the executive ought to observe, as well under the circumstances which now exist, as in those emergencies which will probably arise.

While we implore the smiles of Divine Providence upon our endeavors to promote the public welfare, let us be thankful that amidst the distresses of war, so much internal tranquility has prevailed, and that notwithstanding the revolutions which agitate the world, we still enjoy the privileges of freedom, with dispositions to defend and perpetuate these inestimable blessings.

Message and burning of American prisoners surrendered to officers of Great-Britain, by Indians in the British service. Abandonment of the remains of Americans killed in battle or murdered after the surrender to the British. The pillage and shooting of American citizens and the burning of their houses after surrendering to the British, under the guarantee of their captors.

Extract of a letter from Augustus B. Woodward, esq., to Gen. Proctor, Detroit, February 2d, 1813.

"They [the inhabitants of Michigan] have entertained a constant apprehension that when the American forces approach the territory, and when an engagement had taken place, the fury of the savage mind at the sight of blood, and in reflecting on the dead they lose, and perhaps on the retaliatory treatment of prisoners, or of the dead, which their cruel mode of warfare is always likely to produce, might drive them to an ignoble revenge on the prisoners they find in the country, and the inhabitants of it, who are American citizens. They therefore pressed this subject on your attention previous to the battle of the 22d of January, 1813; and felt satisfied with your assurance that you considered your own honor pledged for their effectual protection.

"Since the result of that battle, facts are before their faces which they cannot shut their eyes upon. Some of them are perhaps unknown to yourself. I will enumerate some which I believe there will be no difficulty in establishing beyond the reach of contradiction.

"First.—Some of the prisoners after the capitulation of the 22d of January, 1813, have been tomahawked by the savages.

"Second.—Some of the prisoners after that capitulation, have been shot by the savages.

"Third.—Some of the prisoners after that capitulation have been burnt by the savages.

"Fourth.—Some of the inhabitants of the territory of Michigan, citizens of the United States of America, after the capitulation, have been shot by the savages.

"Fifth.—The houses of some of the inhabitants of the territory, American citizens, after the capitulation, have been burnt by the savages.

"Sixth.—Some of the inhabitants, American citizens, after the capitulation, have been pillaged by the savages."

A. W. McLEAN, ESQUIRE, TO MR. WOODWARD.

Sandwich, 9th February, 1813.

SIR—You will have the goodness to appoint a day for the purpose of addressing before colonel Proctor such proof as you may have, to substantiate the assertions in your letter to him, relative to the slaughter of the enemy's sick and wounded, on the 22d of January last. I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) A. W. McLEAN, Aid-de-camp.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Woodward to general Proctor. Sandwich, February 10th, 1813.—I had the honor to receive, on the third day of this month, a verbal message from you, communicated to me by major Blair, requesting me to procure some evidence of the massacre of the American prisoners, on the 22d day of January last.

"I met with only a few persons at Detroit who are inhabitants of the river Raisin, nor was it altogether a pleasant task to those, to relate, in these times, the scenes they have beheld. Some of them, however, appeared before a magistrate, and I send you copies of what they have stated. It will occur to you, sir, immediately, that what any of them state on the information of others, though not direct evidence in itself, leads to the source where it may be obtained. In communicating your message, major Blair added something to the oath to American citizens, who might be willing to take

"It will be obvious to you, sir, that in a state of open and declared war, a subject or citizen of one party cannot transfer his allegiance to the other party, without incurring the penalties of treason; and, while nothing can excuse his guilt, so neither are those interested who lay temptation before them.

"The principles adopted by the United States on the subject of expatriation, are liberal, but are perfectly inapplicable to a public enemy in time of war.

"Some of the French inhabitants of the territory of Michigan, citizens of the United States of America, have been much urged on this subject, and are apprehensive of being further troubled.

"I had the further honor of receiving, on the 8th instant, your verbal message by your aid-de-camp, Mr. McLean, acquainting me that there was no capitulation on the 22d of January, and that the prisoners surrendered at discretion.

"I, therefore, beg pardon for that mistake.

"The principles, however, of the law of nations, impose an obligation almost equally strong."

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, one of the justices of the peace in the district of Detroit, Joseph Roberts, an inhabitant on river aux Raisins, who being duly sworn by the Holy Evangelists, deposes and says; that on the next day after the battle on the said river Raisins, a short time after sunrise, he saw the Indians kill the American prisoners, with their tomahawks, and that they shot several, to wit, three, that the Indians set the house on fire, and that in going out, the prisoners were massacred and killed as aforesaid, that is to say; three were shot, the others were killed in the houses, and burnt with the houses. The Indians burnt first the house of Jean Baptiste Joreaux, and afterwards that of Gabriel Godfrey, junior. The deponent has been informed that there were about forty-eight or forty-nine prisoners in the two houses. The deponent has seen dead bodies on the high way, which the boys were tearing and eating. Mr. Brunot told the deponent that the Indians had killed those of the prisoners who were least wounded and that the others were burnt alive.

Antoine C. Lefebvre and Alexis Salliot, inhabitants of the river Ecoteurs, told the deponent that two prisoners had been burnt in the house of Grandon on the river aux Sables. The deponent has heard that the Indians had torn out the hearts of the prisoners, and had brought them still smoking into the houses, but did not recollect the names of the informants; he believes, however, they were men worthy of credit.

The deponent says further, that after the first action on the river Raisin, the Indians fired on one named Solo, son-in-law to Stephen Labean, an inhabitant on the river aux Sables, when returning from the house of Grandon to his father-in-law; on his arrival, he hallooed to his father-in-law to open the door, saying that he was mortally wounded; Stephen Labean opened the door and told his son-in-law to throw himself on his bed, but that in trying to move he fell dead. An Indian knocked at the door, and Labean having opened it, received a ball in his breast, and fell dead. The son of Labean made his escape; the Indians shot several shots at him which did not reach him.

The deponent says further, that Baptiste Couture was killed near the house of the deponent, on the day of the second battle on the river Raisin, a day after sunrise.

The deponent says further, that the Indians have often threatened to burn his house and barn, if he did not march with them against the Americans. The deponent says he is an American citizen.

The deponent says that several of his neighbors have told him that they had received the same threat. Other settlements have been threatened with fire. The mills and houses on the river aux Roches were burnt in the month of September last, after the capitulation of Detroit. And further this deponent said not.

Be it remembered, that on this day, February the fourth, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, personally came before me the undersigned, a justice of the peace for the district aforesaid, viz. John McDowell, an inhabitant of the city of Detroit, who after being duly sworn upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, deposes and saith that a few days after the battle (of the 22d) January last, (that is the river Raisin) he was personally present at the house of James May, esq. when he heard the same James May, esq. Mr. William Jones, the acting agent for the Indian department, if there would be any inappropriety in purchasing the prisoners from the Indians; and that he heard the said William Jones say, that he thought there would be no inappropriety in purchasing them, but would not undertake to authorize any person to do so; that in consequence of which this deponent purchased three or four of the prisoners, amongst the number was one by the name of — Hamilton, a private in the Kentucky volunteers, who declared to this deponent, that on the first or second day after the battle at river Raisin, on the 22d January last, as he and some of his fellow-prisoners were marching with the Indians between this place and river Raisin, they came up to where one of the prisoners was burnt, the life just expiring, and an Indian kicking the ashes of his back, saying 'damned son of a bitch.'

This deponent also further deposes as aforesaid, that doctor Bowers, a surgeon's mate of the Kentucky volunteers, who was purchased by him and some other gentlemen, stated to this deponent that he went in to take care of the wounded after the battle, but did rather trust on account of the savages, but that he received such assurance from captain or colonel Elliott, of the safety of him as well as the remaining prisoners, he concluded to stay, as drags were promised to be sent to fetch them away the next morning; that near about daylight of the morning following the day of the battle, the Indians came into the house where said Bowers was with the other prisoners, and proceeded to plunder and tomahawk such as could not walk; and stripping the said Bowers and the wounded prisoners of all their clothes; that while the said Bowers and two other prisoners, named Sears and Bradford

As near as this deponent can recollect, were sitting by the fire in the Indian camp, an Indian came up who appeared to be drunk, and called the said Savaris as a name the deponent can recollect, and Madison of Washington, then took up a tomahawk and struck the said Savaris on the forehead; that the said Savaris caught hold of the tomahawk and held it for some time; that the said Savaris advised the said Savaris to submit to his fate; with that, the Indian gave him a blow on the head, killed, scalped and stripped him; during this time the said Bowers and Bradford were personally present, and being apprehensive for their own safety, that he, Bowers, ran and came up to the old chief (who sold him to this deponent and other) who took him in his protection, and was very kind to him. This deponent further depose, that he has reason to believe the aforesaid Bowers and Bradford are now at Sandwich, and if applied to, they could give more ample information relative to the particulars aforesaid. *And further this deponent sayeth not.

No. 1. Note from Mr. John McDonnell to James May, Esquire.

Detroit, February 4, 1813.

Dear Sir,—I had a conversation with Mr. Saurat, after leaving your house to-day, who had a conversation with Bowers and Bradford. He observes that I have made several material errors in my affidavit before you this day. He says the prisoner killed was of the name of Bly, instead of Savaris; and that some of the names that differ widely from what I have sworn to, so that I think it is a pity that Bowers and Bradford's own affidavit could not be had instead of mine. Yours, J. McDONNELL.

Note from Mr. McDonnell to Mr. Lyons, his clerk.

I wish you to mention to Judge Woodward, that application is made for a writ, to be returned on the other side, to remain till the navigation opens. On that account I hope that he will keep the deposition that I have made regarding the murders committed by the savages on the river Raisin. He has made a written testimony to substantiate facts that I have sworn to on his say; and as I am sure, if the Colonel was even disposed to hear my application, that affidavit will be enough to send me off, or that I was allowed to remain, Elliott would set the Indians on fire.

Territory of Michigan. District of Detroit. Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, one of the justices of the peace in the district of Detroit, Antoine Boudard, of the river aux Raisins, who being sworn on the Holy Evangelists, deposed that he saw the act of the last battle on the river aux Raisins. He saw the Indians kill the secretary of the American garrison, who was on the horse of the Indian who had taken an prisoner, with a rifle-shot; that the prisoner fell on one side, and an Indian came forward with a sabre, finished him, scalped him, stript him and carried away his cloth. The body remained two days on the high-way, before the dose of the deponent was put out up by him. Afterwards, the deponent, together with Francois Lasselle, Hubert Lacroix, Chs. Choin, and Louis Lajoye, took up the corpse at dusk of the evening, and carried it into a field near the woods, where the hogs did not go. They dared not to bury it for fear of being surprized by the Indians. And further it is deponent saith not.

I hereby certify, that the next day after the last battle on the river aux Raisins, the secretary of the American general was taken near the door of the deponent; was wounded and placed on a horse; that seven or eight Indians were near the house, one of whom shot him in the head with a rifle; that he did not fall till his horse had been killed, drawing a sabre, struck him on the head several times, and then he fell to the ground; was scalped and stript of his clothes, and left on the road, where he remained one day and a half; I, the deponent, with Francois Lasselle, Hubert Lacroix, Louis Choin, on the evening of the second day, took up the body, carried it in the skirts of the woods, and covered it with a few branches, but could not stay to bury it, for fear of the Indians that were in the neighborhood; and on the next day after the last battle I was near the house of Gabriel Godfrey junior, and the house of Jean Baptiste Jeanvau, where a great number of prisoners were collected; and that I heard the screaming of the prisoners whom the Indians were tomahawking; that the savages set the houses on fire and went off.

I certify, that the bodies of the Americans killed at the battle of la Riviere aux Raisins, and that the bodies of many last, remained unburied; and that I have seen the hogs and dogs eating them.

That he appeared to be rendered mad, by so profuse a diet of Christian's blood.

I saw the hogs of Mr. Gerome and Mr. Grolroy on fire, and have heard that they were prisoners in them.

The inhabitants did not dare to bury the dead on account of the Indians.

The inhabitants have been threatened by the Indians, if they did not take to arms against the Americans.

This is to certify, that on or about the twenty-seventh day of January last, a certain Indian woman came to my dwelling house, on the river Raisin, and informed that on the morning of that day an American prisoner had been killed in the Indian camp, and the reason assigned for killing him was, because he had expressed a hatred for the Indians.

Theurons, and the other tribes of Indians, assembled at the Miami Rapids, to the inhabitants of the river Raisin.

FRIENDS! LISTEN!

You have always told us you would give us any assistance in your power.

We, therefore, as the enemy is approaching us, within twenty-five miles, call upon you all to rise up and come here immediately, bringing your arms, along with you.

Should you fail at this time, we will not consider you in future as friends, and the consequences may be very unpleasant.

We are well convinced you have no writings forbidding you to assist us. We are your friends at present.

To the honorable John P. Woodford, Detroit, Riviere aux Raisins, the 13th November, 1812.

SIR,—In the embarrassment to which we find ourselves at present, on the subject of a letter addressed to colonel Noyes, and the part of the Huron's and other savage tribes, we depute him to you to represent to you the situation of the inhabitants of the river Raisin, praying you to assist him with your advice in so delicate a matter, having at all times had great confidence in your great knowledge.

Extract from the report of captain Isaac L. Baker, agent for the prisoners taken after the battle of Frenchtown, January 20th, 1813, to brigadier-general B. Wellesley, dated at British Niagara, February 20th, 1813.

"For the greatest number of our unfortunate fellow-soldiers being sent from Detroit, we are indebted to the exertions of one prisoner of low-citizens there, who with unexampled generosity when they saw their countrymen driven through the streets like sheep to a market, lavished their wealth for their ransom. Nor was the procurement of our forty all. We had been almost entirely stript by the Indians. Clothes, such as the exigency of the occasion permitted to be prepared, were furnished us.

"On the 8th instant colonel Proctor ordered me to make out a return of all the prisoners who were killed by the Indians subsequent to the battle, agreeable to the best information I could collect. The enclosed return marked B, was procured by this mode. I might have added the gallant captain Nathaniel Gray; S. Reed, d. m. y. inspector-general; captain Virgil McCrackin, of colonel Abis's regiment; captain John H. Woodford, your secretary; captain Levi Wells, of the 7th United States Infantry, and a number of privates, whom I find by subsequent information, have been massacred.

"The memory of past services rendered me by captain Hart's family, made me particularly anxious to ascertain his fate. I interrogated him if he was alive, and every information I could get for some time flattered my hopes. But one of the last prisoners who was brought in, told me that the captain was certainly massacred. He was so badly wounded as to prevent him from walking. The Indians took him some distance on a horse, but at length took him off and tomahawked him.

"About the 10th instant, an Indian brought captain McCrackin's commission to Sandwich—the paper was bloody. The fellow said he took the captain's shirt, but some time after, when stripping and examining him, he found an Indian scrip in his bosom, which induced him to kill him. This, you cannot but be sensible is a knowledge of the fellow's own motives, to screen himself from the odium of barbarity. The captain's character, and the danger of attending his carrying such munitions in a disastrous battle give it the lie.

"Captain Woolfolk, after having been wounded in two places, by some means had got refuge in one of the French houses on the Raisin. He was discovered next day and dragged from his asylum. He was taken to the house of a Mr. Lavelle, where he said he would give 1500 dollars to any one who would purchase him. Mr. Lavelle said it was out of his power, but he had no doubt his brother would do it, who lived at land. He directed his owners to the house of his brother, but, as they were on their way, an Indian from a waste house shot him through the head.

"Ensign Wells was taken by my side inmate. I considered him as alive until my arrival at this place. Captain Nagels tells me he was killed by a Pottawatomie Indian, not long after he was taken.

"Many fresh scalps have been brought in since the hostilities, and have been killed in the country, which proves that officers and privates of all those reported to colonel Proctor.

"This list is all the information I have been able to collect, concerning those who are massacred. The fifteen or eighteen mentioned in the Remarks to the return, made to colonel Proctor, whose names do not appear, were not known by those who saw them killed.

"Major Graves of the 5th regiment of Kentucky volunteers, I have been able to get no information of, further than that he was brought to the river Rouge, on the 25th or 26th of January in a sleigh. I fear, from our having heard nothing of him since, that he is no more, and that valuable officer forever lost to his country.

"The dead of our army are still in the rites of sepulture. At the time I left Sandwich, I was told the hogs were eating them. A gentleman told me he had seen them running about with skulls, legs and other parts of the human system in their mouths. The French people on the Raisin treated the captives Hart, Woolfolk, and some others, out it was more than their mouths. Woolfolk, to have been caught again in this last accustomed trifle to mortality. I have several names mentioned the subject of burying the dead, when in company with the British officers, but they always answered that the Indians would not suffer it."

In addition to the above number, I saw two others tomalawked at Sandy creek, myself, and find that the prisoners now in the hospital in Sandwich say, say fifteen or eighteen others, treated in the same manner. Two men told me they saw one who had the appearance of having been buried to death. These men who saw Henry Downy and William Butler killed, tell me that the Indians left them without seeing.

ISAAC L. BAKER, Ensign 2d U. S. Infantry.

Colonel H. Proctor.

Extract of a letter from major-general Harrison to the secretary at war, dated at the Miami Rapids, February 11, 1813.

"I have the honor to enclose to you the deposition of Medard Labadie. Who was at the river Raisin on the 22d ultimo, and remained there till the 6th instant. His account of the loss of the enemy in action, is corroborated by several others, nor is there the least reason to doubt his statement, in as regards the horrible fate of our wounded men. There is another circumstance which plainly shows that the British have no intention to conduct the war (at least in this quarter) upon those principles which have been held sacred by all civilized nations. On the 30th ultimo I dispatched doctor McKeehan, a surgeon-inmate in the militia, with a flag, to ascertain the situation of our wounded. He was attended by one of our militia-men and a Frenchman. On the night after their departure, they halted near this place for the purpose of taking a few hours' sleep, in a vacant cabin upon the bank of the river. The canoe in which they travelled was lit at the door with the flag set up in it. They were discovered by a party of Indians (as mentioned in the deposition) and attacked in the manner described in the deposition. The militia-man was killed and scalped, the doctor and the Frenchman taken. Doctor McKeehan was furnished with a letter addressed to any British officer whom he might meet, describing the character in which he went, and the object for which he was sent, an open letter to general Winchester, and written instructions to himself, all of which he was directed to shew to the first officer he met with. He was also supplied with one hundred dollars to procure necessaries for the prisoners."

"The affidavit of Medard Labadie, late resident near the river Raisin, in the Michigan territory. He being sworn, said he was in his house when he heard the guns at the commencement of the action at the river Raisin, on the 22d January, 1813, between the American forces under general Winchester, and the British Canadian and Indian forces, and he was commanded by colonel Proctor, after some little time, he heard that the Indians were killing the inhabitants as well as the American soldiers, upon which he went towards the scene of action in order to save his family. As he went on, he was with one other inhabitant taken prisoner by two Wyandot Indians, and carried prisoner to the Indian lines, from which he saw great part of the action. The night wing of the Americans had given way before he got sight of the action. It terminated after the sun was some hours high, not far from 11 o'clock, A. M. by the surrender of the American forces, that then remained on the ground.

I saw the flag hoisted by the British sent to the American forces, and saw it pass three times to the Americans before the surrender. It could not maintain its girth, but understood that general Winchester was taken prisoner before he got to the lines of his own men; that he was obliged to carry the flag to his own forces after he was taken; that he understood the reason of the flag passing so often was, that the Americans refused to surrender upon any other terms than that the wounded should be taken near the dead buried, and the inhabitants protected in their property. That the British first refused to agree to these terms, but finally did agree to them. He also understood that the loss of the British and Indians in the action was about 400 killed. He also understood that the loss of the Americans in the action was about 130 killed.

"He says that on the day of the action all the prisoners who were able to march were marched off towards Malden; the wounded, about 60 or 80 in number, left in two boats without any of their friends or a physician to take care of them, and without any British officer or men. About ten Indians remained behind upon the ground; the balance of the Indians went off with the British, and he was told by some of the Canadian militia that the British had promised the Indians a block that night at Stony creek, about six miles from the river Raisin.

"He says that about the line of March was found far Malden. The next morning he was in the houses where the wounded were. That morning about fifty Indians entered the houses which brought whiskey with them; they drank some and gave some to the Indians there, and between 9 and 10 o'clock, A. M. commenced killing the wounded, then set fire to the houses the wounded were in, and consumed them. He was at his brother's, on this side of the Detroit river, about seven days after the action, and saw across the river the prisoners marched off for Niagara from Malden.

"He says that he saw taken by his house, by captain Elliot, and nine Wyandot Indians, two men that he understood had been sent by general Harrison with a flag to the British. One of the men (Mr. Tessier) he knew, the other he did not know, but understood he was a doctor. He had not an opportunity of conversing with them, but understood from an inhabitant to whom Mr. Tessier communicated it, that they stopped for the night and left the flag hoisted on the canoe, and that the flag was taken away unknown to them, and that the Indians fired on them; that he, Tessier, told them they were Frenchmen, and surrendered, upon which the Indians ceased firing and took them. They then mentioned they were sent with a flag. The Indians said they were hirs and took them off.

"Mr. Tessier was set at liberty at the river Raisin, and remained two days expecting the doctor to return, at the end of which time Tessier was sent for by the British and taken to Malden. He understood that the doctor was sent off immediately to Niagara; the doctor was wounded in the ankle. He understood the British charged the doctor and Tessier with being spies, and further he said not.

"The friends of the Navy."

It is not among the least of passing wonders, that certain men calling themselves a "peace party," and using every possible means, honorable or dishonorable, to bring defeat and disgrace on all the warlike operations of the United States, should claim for themselves the whole glory of the mighty deeds performed by our little navy, and give to the heroes that achieved them a political designation as opposite to their own conduct as the antipodes. It is of no consequence to the public what a man has been; it is sufficient that "he is honest, that he is capable, that he is faithful to the constitution." And any one may hold what private opinion he pleases, on religion or politics, without cause of offence, provided he performs what is due to society and is true to his country. The liberal-minded pay little regard to names; they judge the actions of a man. But the language of our naval heroes exactly coincides with their actions; and it is an infamous libel upon them to suppose that they would sustain with their lives the principles of the war, if the war were "wicked and unjust."

It ever has been a favorite idea with the editor that the body of the people composing the two great parties of the United States, were equally zealous of the honor of their country—and if what Jackson says of the officers of the navy be true, as that they are "federalists,†" that idea is charmingly supported by their patriotic exertions to vindicate the rights we contend for—epitomized in com. Decatur's famous toast of "FREE TRADE AND NO IMPRESSMENT."

One of the differences of opinion in the two political sections of the people, regarded the naval establishment. The "federalists" were understood as wishing it more extensive than the "republicans" believed was consistent with sound policy. It is not our present purpose to examine the causes why those opinions were formed; we only notice their existence to shew, that without a political idea coming into the consideration, the officers of the navy naturally cleaved to that interest they believed most likely to subservise their own; for it is as reasonable that a navy officer should appropriate an increase of the navy establishment, as for a merchant or a mechanic to desire an extension of his business; and without it, he must have expected to remain nearly stationary, a condition most unsuitable to a generous spirit. They, therefore, in this respect, must needs have been "federalists." But there is something else that may have influenced them.

It will be recollected, that Mr. Jefferson, soon after he came into the presidency, sold, by public auction, many of the United States' vessels. This act must have checked the noble aspirations of many youthful officers, thirsting for promotion. They felt the effect as coming from the "republicans;" and it is the easiest thing in the world to transfer resentment from law itself to the execution of it. Besides, faction has so often presented the sale of those vessels as the act of the "republicans," and given it in evidence of their hostility to the navy, so many millions of times, with a hardihood in falshood unprecedented, that thousands believe the act for this sale was passed by Mr. Jefferson's political friends—though the statute books record it as the deed of a "federal" congress, approved by a "federal" president, Mr. John Adams. And the law was a good one. The vessels directed to be sold were purchased for a temporary purpose; and that purpose being answered, they were directed to be sold—for the very excellent reason, that they would require great repairs; and, when repaired, would never be worth much as ships of war, having been common merchantmen.

Like causes produce like effects. Who gave to Lawrence, to Jones and to Burrows, and even to Full and to Bainbridge, the opportunity to earn a name, and immortalize themselves? Who afforded to Champey the high renown of putting a superior British fleet, (commanded by one of the most experienced officers of their navy) to frequent flight, and blocking it up? Or, furnished the means by which heroic Perry had the great glory of capturing the first fleet the British ever lost? Rodgers and Decatur had already established a character; but the rest had not had the chance to signalize

† The officers of the navy are Americans. I do not admit that they are, or have been, "federalists;" nor do I claim them or any of them, as "republicans;" but shall reason on the matter as though they were of the former; which the reader will please to observe I consider as "essentially" different from those I call "factionists." This distinction may be more clearly shewn by noting the remark, which the candid politician of all parties will agree is correct—that "every Englishman is a federalist; but all federalists are not Englishmen"—meaning those Englishmen who reside in or frequent our sea-ports, and applying the observation to principles as well as men.

‡ As applied to the parties.

themselves, and must have remained in comparative obscurity but for the "events of the war." Honor and interest, then, as well as patriotism, direct the officers to support the government in the noble stand it has taken; and when the new frigates and sloops are afloat, we shall have a repetition of gallant feats performed by men now known to the people only by the roll of officers attached to the navy department. They have been patronized by the executive to the extent of their hopes, and their labors are richly rewarded in the gratitude of an admiring country. Can they be opposed to a war in which they fight so eagerly? Would they put down an administration that has so sincerely cherished them? We cannot believe either, unless we charge them with hypocrisy and ingratitude combined. This, at least, is very certain, that they do not consider the war as "unjust or unnecessary;" nor do they think it wrong to win a battle, though faction, through the senate of Massachusetts, has declared that a "moral and religious people" shall not rejoice at it!—It is also positive that they are not of the "PEACE-PARTY." They are not bound to the service—they entered it voluntarily, and may retire when they please. But, it may be said, it is their profession; the means by which they obtain a livelihood. Very well—but if money has been furnished to prevent the general marching of a certain militia to the lines at this important period (and it is confidently stated that great sums were in readiness to pay the fines of any that refused) can we believe that ways and means would be wanting to provide for officers of the navy thinking it wrong to contend with the "bulwark of the religion we profess," who should resign in disgust with "the wicked authors of this wicked war?" Certainly not. Such resignations would be trumpeted forth and supported by the whole power of faction and England, in the thousand wonderful ways that the distributors of the secret service money know of. § But the very heart and soul of our seamen is engaged in this war. The most of them had some vow of vengeance unfulfilled; for most of them had suffered by the insolence or tyranny of their present open enemy. They are all volunteers, officers and men—they go to battle of their own free will; and he is a base scoundrel that does of his free will what his conscience tells him is wrong. Who shall say that this is the character of our tars?

We might pursue this subject and from general remarks descend to individual cases, to expose the canting hypocrisy of those pretended "friends of the navy;" a set of strange and inconsistent beings tossed about by their passions, and continually involving themselves in some ridiculous absurdity. We shall merely and briefly notice—that these "friends of the navy" hate, most wickedly hate, com. Rodgers because he refused to strike his flag to the drunken captain of "the king's" sloop the Little Belt; and because he said that nearly one half of the crew of the President frigate had, at one time or other, been impressed by the British. These "friends of the navy" hold up com. Decatur to ridicule, by using his famous toast, (a sentiment that will be supported while the pine tree grows to bear our ensign) of "Free trade and no impressment," as a motto to announce the arrival of waggons, whether from the interior as heretofore, or to places where the intercourse was chiefly by water. A "friend of the navy," imported from Ireland, I believe was the father of this witty application. It may perhaps be well enough for him to support the cause of his master; by underrating the great principles for which both the army and navy contend; but that natives should so eagerly copy the libel on the gallant Decatur, has surprised me much. The brave Bainbridge has come in for his share of abuse—he offended the “friends of the navy” by saying in an official letter to the secretary of the navy, “that he had determined to maintain our belligerent rights, for that as neutrals no rights had been left us.” This was rank “jacobinism;” it denied the “magnanimity” of G. Britain, and has subjected him to many mean, but untangible insinuations. As to Chauncey, he ruined himself with these “friends of the navy” by putting the fact upon official record, that a human scalp was found in the legislative hall of Upper Canada, suspended near the mace. This was a dreadful stroke upon the “bulwark of our religion,” and all the English hate him of course. They have greatly libelled him latterly; they had not the hardihood to say that he was a coward, but they have constantly insinuated that he was afraid to meet the “gallant Perry.” As to Perry, at the instant he gained the victory on Erie, the faction claimed him as a “federalist.” Stunned by the splendor of the deed, its consequences were not discerned, and even the folks at Boston voted him a sword, for his valor in conducting the “wicked war upon the innocent Canadians.” But, now it appears, that that victory opened “the way to enter the heart of the country,” and backing out, they call the splendid illumination at Charleston a “mania.” And thus they go on through the whole list to shew themselves FRIENDS OF THE NAVY.

War Prospects.

Being, in sincerity and truth, a friend of peace with all nations, the editor heartily congratulates his readers on the prospect of speedily obtaining it, through the united exertions of the people to prosecute the war, and give it termination on honorable terms. The resistance of the inadmissible pretensions of the enemy daily becomes more popular, as is proved by the recent elections, and the increased facility with which the government obtains men and money.

There are no rules of policy or expediency that should lead a good citizen, or wise administration, into a quarrel; nor ought temporary convenience to permit the abandonment of a principle on which depends the future safety of individuals or states. A stand taken at the onset of injustice, very often interrupts its progress, and brings the matter back to its original condition. The love of peace may as easily grow into a fault as the spirit of war; yet the former is an amiable weakness, that like charity has its apology with it, and covers a multitude of errors. But the first, unfairly encouraged by an unholy desire for trade, was the great cause of the present war. When the first American was impressed, if by a special mission to the court of St. James, we had demanded his release, giving to the case all the consequence that the principle involved entitled it to, it now seems the unanimous opinion that that horrible practice (in every essential quality the same as Algerine slavery) would not have been persevered in. And so with the orders in council, which assumed the right to regulate our trade in all cases whatsoever, the coasting business excepted. If an end to these had been demanded instead of negotiated for, all had been well, and the present war avoided.

How powerfully do these remarks impress upon us the force of Franklin's celebrated saying, “that he who gives up essential liberty to purchase a temporary safety, deserves neither liberty nor safety.” But the spirit of trade—a spirit that has no country and regards no rights, crept in, and led us on step by step to the last stage of debasement—to the very threshold of the dungeon that tyranny had digged to immure our independence. Here to resist, or give up all hope of relief, were the only alternatives presented. Happily, we chose the former; and we venture to predict (from the facts that every moment accumulate to strengthen the opinion, in the opening resources of our country) that he who lives to see the end of this war, (and we believe it will not last long) will see the United States in a condition of prosperity and happiness that the most visionary theorist in government ever supposed was attainable. Among ourselves—in the production of the raw material in some places and its manufacture in others, will spring up a home trade that shall bind the states to each other, and slay the many-headed monster that has distracted the people, and divided them into parties almost as hostile as two nations at war; to the great dereliction of principle, with a denial of the enjoyments of social intercourse, and that confidence and good will that should exist in one people.

I know my disposition is sanguine; but I apprehend the time is at hand, when the party designations of “republicans” and “federalists” will fall into disuse, and the people have one proud American feeling. “A consummation devoutly to be wished.”

Too great a portion of every community measures the merits of a cause by the success that attends it. And the late successes of the army and navy, with the hope of a speedy accomplishment of all we expected of them, has, no doubt, had great influence with many. It is a happy combination of circumstances when those who deserve success command it.

As we never despaired of the republic, we may be permitted to rejoice in the prospects of the times; leading to all we ever desired, in an honest and honorable peace with Great Britain. If we had been united, the war never had been; if we are united, it will soon end.

North Western Indians.

By the despatches from generals Harrison and McArthur, and the natural sequence of events on the north western frontier, we have every reason to expect that the war of the allies is finished; the existence of the Indians, in the most significant meaning of the word, depending upon the mercy of the United States. Justice would say to the deluded creatures, you have murdered in the summer, starve in the winter. You have submitted only through necessity. With the fall of your friends, have perished your resources for food and clothing—had they been fortunate, you would yet have scalped. Away!—as “you have made your bed so you must lie.” We have nothing to fear from you; we cannot depend upon you; you have planned your own annihilation—look to yourselves, and so be it.” This is the language of a just resentment; and, on the instant, we felt willing they should be refused that protection their wants compelled them to ask; but charity interposed, and demanded that the race should be spared, if for no other purpose than to remain a monument of the humanity of the republic, whose policy and principle it is to spare the vanquished, whether white or red savages.

¶ “Once British always British”—the general sentiment of these “friends of the navy.”

In seaman's phrase, these poor people are completely "on their beam ends." The savage, at best, but scantily provides for his winter's subsistence—but these have been so fully engaged in the business of the Christian Englishmen, that time and opportunity was not allowed them to make preparation for the season that approaches; and they must be fed and clothed by the United States, or perish.

As it possible, they never again will have the means of committing such murders and assassinations as England dictated to them, occasionally, from the year 1776 to this time—as their fidelity may be secured by the hostages they must give as well as by their dependent condition, and as they may be useful to alarm the enemy with those horrors he actually inflicted upon us, philanthropy, as well as policy, approves the measures that general M. Arthur has pursued.

If the success attends our arms that present prospects lead us to calculate upon, a very considerable number of them may be brought down the lakes to assist in the operations against Lower Canada, and the provinces of Nova-Scotia and New-Brunswick, during the winter. Not that they should be let loose to kill and destroy; but, under proper regulations, assist the regular forces in harassing the enemy to a successful termination of the contest in arms, as to land operations. If the conquest of Quebec and Malifax should not be resolved upon, or cannot be accomplished, these indians will be of great use in rendering the possession of no value to the enemy, an object of considerable importance; and they will do this immediately. Besides, as we are fully satisfied that they can be restrained, their employment will be worth the cost of their maintenance, by the seal that their conduct shall give to the barbarity of Englishmen. It will be extremely useful to establish, by practice, the falsity of the enemy's plea respecting this people; that the present generation—as well as posterity, may duly esteem the character of the enemy, whose powerful influence in the United States we desire may be destroyed; for it is fatal to happiness and the cause of continual feuds.

"They have agreed (says M. Arthur) to take hold of the same tomahawk with us; and strike all who are or may be the enemies of the United States, British or indians." [How like British faith is this agreement, by turns fighting against or making peace with any people or any power, "legitimate" or illegitimate, that may serve the purposes of the moment!—] And with such guarantees for their good behavior as our good fortune and their necessities have put into our hands, we again say, let them be spared; and employed against those who put the tomahawk into their hands, provided they use it only to defeat men in arms. If otherwise, they will be punished and discharged, for our own honor; though the British and "innocent Canadians" would hardly dare to complain if they scalped their women and children.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ARMY ADDRESSES. The following excellent remarks are from the Kentucky Gazette:

"It has lately become very fashionable in the American army, for the officers every now and then to meet together and address some fulsome praise to the world concerning the commanding general.

The impropriety of this conduct must be evident to every military man.

A subaltern officer is prohibited by military law from censuring his superior. If then he cannot express his opinions freely so as to censure on suitable occasions—how is he competent to eulogize his commanding officer?

Suppose an officer refuses to sign one of these addresses—if the general be ambitious (as is frequently the case) he may report the non-subscribing officer to the secretary of war, as unfit for a military situation and have him stricken from the rolls.

It is said that sir James Craig, whilst governor-general of Canada, issued an order to the army, that inasmuch as no subaltern officer has a right to criticize on the conduct of his superiors, neither should he be permitted to compliment him by public addresses. This afterwards became a standing order in the whole British army.

Let the American government take advantage of the practice of other nations."

COCKBURN'S EXPEDITION. The following are extracts from the journal kept on board his late B. M. schooner High-Flyer, captured by com. Rodgers, furnished for publication to the editor of the Providence Patriot, by an officer of the frigate President. The High-Flyer was one of the "light squadron" mentioned by Cockburn in his despatch to admiral Warren, see page 110.

"Wednesday, April 28th—Moderate breezes and fine weather—at day light up anchor and anchored off Spesutia Island—p. m. fine weather—at 5 weighed and took the boats of the squadron in tow, with an expedition to attack Frenchtown, situated on the Elk river—at 12 anchored.

Thursday, April 29th—Light winds and fine—at 1 the expedition shoved off, weighed and followed up—at 3 got on shore, ran our anchor out and hauled her off—employed working up the river to cover the boats—at 8 anchored as near the town as the depth of water would permit—at 1 p. m. the expedition returned after having effected its purpose: carried a 5 gun battery and DESTROYED THE TOWN—weighed and stood down the river—at 4 anchored at the mouth of the river; landed the marines, and got a stock of bullocks off.

Friday, April 30th—moderate and fair weather—at daylight weighed and stood down to Spesutia Island—employed during the day taking bullocks down to the Maidstone (frigate.)

Saturday, May 1st—Moderate and fine weather—employed in carrying bullocks down to the Maidstone—p. m. fine weather, employed as above.

Monday, May 3d—Weighed and stood into Havre de Grace, a town in the mouth of Susquehannah river, to support the boats destined on the attack, under rear admiral Cockburn—at 4 anchored as near the town as depth of water would allow—at day light the boats carried the fort of 4 guns and town under a heavy fire of cannon and musquetry: burnt the town, and proceeded to destroy a cannon foundry on the adjacent coast, which was attended with every success: 50 pieces of cannon, and the foundry totally destroyed—at sunset boats returned with a GOOD SHARE OF PLUNDER—midnight fresh breezes and rainy weather.

Wednesday, 5th May—Moderate breezes and fine weather; employed drying the sails and cleaning the vessel—at sunset weighed and stood up the Sasfras river, to protect the boats on the attack of Georgetown and Fredericktown—midnight got on shore, and was not able to effect getting her off until next tide.

Thursday, 6th May—Light winds and fine weather—at 4 the expedition assembled alongside, and then shoved off for the attack of Frederick and Georgetown—9 got the vessel afloat and run up the river as far as possible—P. M. fine weather—at 2 the boats returned, after a TOTAL DESTRUCTION OF THE TWO ROWNS—Weighed and made sail out of the river; Dolphin and Lynx in company—at 5 anchored alongside the Maidstone."

It is stated that SAMUEL YORK, taken in arms against his country on board the British privateer Liverpool Packet, has been tried and cleared in Exeter, N. H.

The "Maryland Republican," printed at Annapolis, gives the names of eighteen citizens of this state, who having been enslaved by the European Algerines, had been released, and are detained as prisoners on board a single prison-ship, the St. Antonia!—"THE SILENCE OF AFFLICTED HUMANITY."

We are told (says the Albany Argus) that the British are equipping a ship of war of 144 guns.—What is that for, seeing that they have not sailors to man the vessels they already have? We know of no other object than that of challenging Commodore Rodgers, in the President frigate, to single combat.

It is said, that several curious persons intruded themselves upon the army commanded by Hampton, merely to know its force and destination, which had been kept so secret. The general, to gratify this thirst for information, freely told them they should go along with him and see every thing; and so detained them.

Commodore Rodgers (says a Providence paper) haunts the imaginations of the British officers.—When the commander of the High Flyer received his last instructions previous to his capture, com. Oliver said to him—"take care you are not outwitted by the d—d Yankees! and especially be careful of that Commodore Rodgers, if he comes across you, he will hoist you upon his jib-boom, and carry you into Boston!"

The First Baltimore Volunteers, who lately returned from Canada with the thanks of their country, for a faithful duty of 12 months duration, have reorganized themselves, and are attached to one of the militia regiments for the defence of their city. The greater part of these men are industrious mechanics; and we trust, they will be sought out and encouraged by a discerning public, as their avocations may be required. Mr. Thomas Warner, originally ensign of this company, has been appointed captain.

Harrison's victory has been celebrated at Washington, Alexandria, Wilmington (Del.) Philadelphia, and New-York by brilliant illuminations. In the two latter, by recommendation of the constituted authorities.

LIEUTENANT METCHINSON, who was taken in the High Flyer, by com. Rodgers, is one of the wretches who rifled that gallant hero's house at Havre de Grace; and has now in his possession a sword which he stole from him. This sword has been recognized by com. Rodgers, as well as by his steward. Yet this lieutenant has been parolled, and is now at liberty at Providence. Nat. Adv.

MILITARY.

We are much in the dark as to the movements on the northern frontier. It is stated that on the 9th inst. all the heavy ordnance and baggage was embarked in boats and scows at Sacketts Harbor, for a secret expedition.

There was a considerable fall of snow at Sacketts Harbor on the 10th.

Brigadier-general Izard has joined the army under general Hampton.

The army that entered the Creek country from Georgia, was near fort Hawkins about the 20th of September. It consisted of two regiments of infantry (United States' quota,) one battallion volunteer infantry, one company regular troops and six troops cavalry,—the regiments are commanded by colonel Jenkins of Greene county, and colonel Harris of Clarke—the whole consisting of 3,400 men.

A letter from the Choctaw agency, dated September 19, says—"The Choctaw nation are warmly attached to us, and have declared war against the Creeks."

It is also stated that the Cherokees have embodied 700 of their warriors, who are fully equipped, to act with us. A considerable number of hardy volunteers from Tennessee were on the Creek lands by the 29th ult. and it was thought they would amount to 5000 men by the 1st inst. The fate of the murderers is sealed; and their extermination will afford another proof of the folly of listening to merciless and unfeeling Englishmen.

That admirable partizan officer, colonel (late major) Chapin, of New-York, with a body of volunteers and Indians, had a pretty severe brush with the British pickets near fort George, on the 6th inst. and succeeded in driving them in with loss.

HARRISON'S VICTORY.

Extract of a letter from gen. Harrison to the Department of War—

Head-quarters, Sandwich, U. C. 30th Sept. 1813.

Sir—Gen. Proctor has with him 475 regulars of the 41st and Newfoundland regiments; 60 of the 10th regt. of veterans; 45 dragoons; and from 600 to 1000 Indians. Some deserters who left him the night before last, give the latter as the number.—The citizens of Detroit suppose the former to be correct.

The Ottawas and Chippewas have withdrawn from the British, and have sent in three of their warriors to beg for peace, promising to agree to any terms that I shall prescribe. I have agreed to receive them upon condition of their giving hostages for their fidelity, and immediately joining us with all their warriors. The Wyandots, Miamies, and the band of Delawares, which had joined the enemy, are also desirous to be received upon the same terms.

The celebrated chief Main Poek is at the head of the hostile band on the Detroit side of the Streight. Tecumseh heads that which remains with the British. The inhabitants of Detroit who were in daily communication with them, make the former from 1000 to 1200. Their object in dividing their force was to make a night attack upon the part of the army which crossed over to Detroit, or that which remained on this side, by a junction of their force some miles above.

A detachment of the army, and some of the vessels of war, will set out for the reduction of Mackinac and St. Joseph's, in a few days.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

WM. H. HARRISON.

Hon. John Armstrong, Sec'y of War.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Arthur to the Secretary of War.

DETROIT, Oct 6, 1813.

You have no doubt been advised by the commanding general, that Malden and this place were abandoned by the enemy previous to the arrival of our army, and that all the public buildings, &c. were destroyed. On our arrival at Sandwich, my brigade was ordered across the river to disperse some Indians, who were pillaging the town, and to take possession of this place. Information was received that several thousand Indians had retired a small distance into the woods, with intructions to attack gen. Harrison's army on its passage, for the purpose of retarding its progress, consequently my brigade was left to garrison this place.

Since gen. Harrison's departure, five nations of Indians, viz. the Ottoways, Chippeways, Pottawatemies, Miamies and Kickapoos, who were but a few miles back, have come in for peace, and I have agreed that hostilities should cease for the present on the following conditions: "They have agreed to take hold of the same tomahawk with us, and to strike all who are, or may be enemies to the United States, whether British or Indians." They are to bring in a number of their women and children, and leave them as hostages whilst they accompany us to war. Some of them have already brought in their women, and are drawing rations.

I have just received a note from gen. Harrison, advising that he had last evening overtaken gen. Proctor's force, and had gained a complete victory; that all the principal officers, gen. Proctor excepted, were in his possession, which no doubt ends the war in this quarter. I have the honor, &c.

DUNCAN M'ARTHUR

Brig. Gen. U. S. Army.

Copy of a letter from gen. Harrison to the Department of War.

Head-quarters, near Moravian Town, on the River Thames, 80 miles from Detroit, 5th October, 1813.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you, that by the blessing of Providence, the army under my command has this evening obtained a complete victory over the combined Indian and British forces under the command of general Proctor. I believe that nearly the whole of the enemy's regulars are taken or killed. Amongst the former are all the superior officers excepting gen. Proctor. My mounted men are now in pursuit of him. Our loss is very trifling. The brave col. R. M. Johnson is the only officer whom I have heard of that is wounded, he badly, but I hope not dangerously.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient humble servant,

WM. H. HARRISON.

The hon. John Armstrong, Sec'y at War.

Copy of a letter from major-general Harrison to the secretary of war.

Head-quarters, Detroit, 6th Oct. 1813.

SIR—In my letter from Sandwich of the 30th ultimo, I did myself the honor to inform you, that I was preparing to pursue the enemy the following day.—From various causes, however, I was unable to put the troops in motion until the morning of the 2nd inst. and then to take with me only about one hundred and forty of the regular troops, Johnson's mounted regiment and such of governor Shelby's volunteers as were fit for a rapid march, the whole amounting to about three thousand five hundred men. To gen. M'Arthur (with about 700 effectives) the protecting of this place and the sick was committed. Gen. Cass's brigade, and the corps of lieutenant-col. Ball were left at Sandwich, with orders to follow me as soon as the men received their knapsacks and blankets, which had been left on an island in Lake Erie.

The unavoidable delay at Sandwich was attended with no disadvantage to us. General Proctor had posted himself at Dalson's on the right bank of the Thames (or Trench) fifty six miles from this place, where I was informed he intended to fortify and wait to receive me. He must have believed, however, that I had no disposition to follow him, or that he had secured my continuance here, by the reports that were circulated that the Indians would attack and destroy this place upon the advance of the army; as he neglected to commence the breaking up the bridges until the night of the 2nd inst. On that night our army reached the river, which is twenty-five miles from Sandwich and is one of 4 streams crossing our route, over all of which are bridges, and being deep and muddy, are unforable for a considerable distance into the country—the bridge here was found entire, and in the morning I proceeded with Johnson's regiment to save, if possible, the others. At the second bridge over a branch of the river Thames, we were fortunate enough to capture a lieutenant of dragoons and eleven privates, who had been sent by gen. Proctor to destroy them. From the prisoners I learned that the third bridge was broken up and that the enemy had no certain information of our advance. The bridge having been imperfectly destroyed, was soon repaired and the army encamped at Drake's farm, four miles below Dalson's.

The river Thames, along the banks of which our route lay, is a fine deep stream, navigable for vessels of considerable burthen, after the passage of the bar at its mouth over which, there is six and a half feet water.

The baggage of the army was brought from Detroit in boats protected by three gun-boats, which com. Perry had furnished for the purpose, as well as to cover the passage of the army over the Thames itself, or the mouths of its tributary streams; the banks being low and the country generally open (prairies) as high as Dalson's, these vessels were well calculated for that purpose. Above Dalson's however, the character of the river and adjacent country is considerably changed.—The former, though still deep, is very narrow and its banks high and woody. The commodore and myself therefore agreed upon the propriety of leaving the boats under a guard of one hundred and fifty infantry, and I determined to trust to fortune and the bravery of my troops to effect the passage of the river. Below a place called Chatham and 4 miles above Dalson's is the third unfordable branch of the Thames; the bridge over its mouth had been taken up by the Indians, as well as that at M'Gregor's Mills, one mile above—several hundred of the Indians remained to dispute our passage, and upon the arrival of the advanced guard, commenced a heavy fire from the opposite bank of the creek as well as that of the river. Believing that the whole force of the enemy was there, I halted the army, formed in order of battle, and brought up our two six pounders to cover the party that were ordered to repair the bridge—a few shot from those pieces, soon drove off the Indians and enabled us, in two hours, to repair the bridge and cross the troops. Colonel Johnson's mounted regiment being upon the right of the army, had seized the remains of the bridge at the mills under a heavy fire from the Indians. Our loss upon this occasion, was two killed and three or four wounded, that of the enemy was ascertained to be considerably greater. A house near the bridge containing a very considerable number of muskets had been set on fire—but it was extinguished by our troops and the arms saved. At the first farm above the bridge, we found one of the enemy's vessels on fire, loaded with arms and ordnance stores, and learned that they were a few miles ahead of us, still on the right bank of the river with the great body of the Indians. At Bowles' farm, four miles from the bridge we halted for the night, found two other vessels and a large distillery filled with ordnance and other valuable stores to an immense amount in flames—it was impossible to put out the fire—two twenty-four pounders with their carriages were taken and a large quantity of ball and shells of various sizes. The army was put in motion early in the morning of the 5th, I pushed on in advance with the mounted regiment and requested gov. Shelby to follow as expeditionally as possible with the infantry, the governor's zeal and that of his men enabled them to keep up with the cavalry, and, by 9 o'clock, we were at Arnold's Mills having taken in the course of the morning two gun-boats and several batteaux loaded with provisions and ammunition.

A rapid at the river at Arnold's mills affords the only fording to be met with for a considerable distance, but, upon examination, it was found too deep for the infantry. Having, however, fortunately taken two or three boats and some Indian canoes on the spot, and obliging the horsemen to take a foot-man behind each, the whole were safely crossed by 12 o'clock. Eight miles from the crossing we passed a farm, where a part of the British troops had encamped the night before, under the command of col. Warburton. The detachment with gen. Proctor had arrived the day before at the Moravian towns, 4 miles higher up. Being now certainly near the enemy, I directed the advance of Johnson's regiment to accelerate their march for the purpose of procuring intelligence. The officer commanding it, in a short time, sent to inform me, that his progress was stopped by the enemy, who were formed across our line of march. One of the enemy's waggons being also taken prisoner, from the information received from him, and my own observation, assisted by some of my officers, I soon ascertained enough of their position and order of battle, to determine that, which it was proper for me to adopt.

I have the honor herewith to enclose you my general order, of the 27th ult. prescribing the order of march and of battle when the whole army should act together. But as the number and description of the troops had been essentially changed, since the issuing of the order, it became necessary to make a corresponding alteration in their disposition. From the place where our army was last halted, to the Moravian towns, a distance of about three and a half miles, the road passes through a beach forest without any clearing, and for the first two miles near to the bank of the river. At from two to three hundred yards from the river a swamp extends parallel to it, throughout the whole distance. The intermediate ground is dry, and although the trees are tolerably thick, it is in many places clear of underbrush.—Across this strip of land, its left appuyed upon the river, supported by artillery placed in the wood, their right in the swamp covered by the whole of their Indian force, the British troops were drawn up.

The troops at my disposal consisted of about one hundred and twenty regulars of the 27th regiment, five brigades of Kentucky volunteer militia infantry, under his excellency gov. Shelby, averaging less than five hundred men, and col. Johnson's regiment of mounted infantry, making in the whole an aggregate something above three thousand. No disposition of an army, opposed to an Indian force can be safe unless it is secured on the flanks and in the rear.—I had therefore no difficulty in arranging the infantry conformably to my general order of battle. General Trotter's brigade of 500 men, formed the front line, his right upon the road and his left upon the swamp. General King's brigade as a second line, 150 yards in the rear of Trotter's and Chiles's brigade as a corps of reserve in the rear of it. These three brigades formed the command of major-general Henry; the whole of gen. Desha's division, consisting of two brigades, were formed en potence upon the left of Trotter.

Whilst I was engaged in forming the infantry, I had directed col. Johnson's regiment, which was still in front, to be formed in two lines opposite to the enemy, and, upon the advance of the infantry, to take ground to the left and forming upon that flank to endeavor to turn the right of the Indians. A moment's reflection, however, convinced me that from the thickness of the woods and swampiness of the ground, they would be unable to do any thing on horseback, and there was no time to dismount them and place their horses in security; I therefore determined to refuse my left to the Indians, and to break the British lines at once by a charge of the mounted infantry; the measure was not sanctioned by any thing that I had seen or heard of, but I was fully convinced that it would succeed. The American backwoodsmen ride better in the woods than any other people. A musket or rifle is no impediment to them, being accustomed to carry them on horseback from their earliest youth. I was persuaded too that the enemy would be quite unprepared for the shock and that they could not resist it. Conformably to this idea, I directed the regiment to be drawn up in close column, with its right at the distance of fifty yards from the road, (that it might be in some measure protected by the trees from the artillery) its left upon the swamp, and to charge at full speed as soon as the enemy delivered their fire. The few regular troops of the 27th regt. under their col. (Paul) occupied, in column of sections of four, the small space between the road and the river, for the purpose of seizing the enemy's artillery, and some ten or twelve friendly Indians were directed to move under the bank. The crotchet formed by the front line and gen. Desha's division was an important point. At that place, the venerable governor of Kentucky was posted, who at the age of sixty-six preserves all the vigor of youth, the ardent zeal which distinguished him in the revolutionary war, and the undaunted bravery which he manifested at King's Mountain. With my aids-de-camp, the acting assist. adj. gen. capt. Butler, my gallant friend com. Perry who did me the honor to serve as my volunteer aid-de-camp, and brig. gen. Cass, who having no command tendered me his assistance. I placed myself at the head of the front line of infantry, to direct the movements of the cavalry and give them the necessary support. The army had moved on in this order but a short distance, when the mounted men received the fire of the British line and were ordered to charge; the horses in the front of the column recoiled from the fire; another was given by the enemy, and our column, at length getting in motion, broke through the enemy with irresistible force. In one minute, the contest in front was over; the British officers, seeing no hopes of reducing their disordered ranks to order, and our mounted men wheeling upon them and pouring in a destructive fire, immediately surrendered. It is certain that three only of our troops were wounded in this charge. Upon the left, however, the contest was more severe with the Indians. Col. Johnson, who commanded on that flank of his regiment, received a most galling fire from them, which was returned with great effect. The Indians still further to the right advanced and fell in with our front line of infantry, near its junction with Desha's division, and for a moment made an impression upon it. His excellency gov. Shelby however brought up a regiment to its support, and the enemy receiving a severe fire in front, and a part of Johnson's regiment having gained their rear, retreated with precipitation. Their loss was very considerable in the action, and many were killed in their retreat.

I can give no satisfactory information of the number of Indians that were in the action, but they must have been considerably upwards of one thousand. From the documents in my possession, (general Proctor's official letters, all of which were taken) and from the information of respectable inhabitants of this territory, the indians kept in pay by the British were much more numerous than has been generally supposed. In a letter to general de Bottenburg of the 27th instant, general Proctor speaks of having prevailed upon most of the indians to accompany him. Of these it is certain that fifty or sixty Wyandot warriors abandoned him.*

The number of our troops was certainly greater than that of the enemy, but when it is recollected, that they had chosen a position that effectually secured their flank, which it was impossible for us to turn, and that we could not present to them a line more extended than their own, it will not be considered arrogant to claim for my troops the palm of superior bravery.

In communicating to the president through you, sir, my opinion of the conduct of the officers who served under my command, I am at a loss how to mention that of governor Shelby, being convinced that no eulogium of mine can reach his merit. The governor of an independent state, greatly my superior in years, in experience and in military character, he placed himself under my command, and was not more remarkable for his zeal and activity, than for the promptitude and cheerfulness with which he obeyed my orders. The major-generals Henry and Desha, and the brigadiers Allen, Caldwell, King, Chiles and Trotter, all of the Kentucky volunteers, manifested great zeal and activity. Of governor Shelby's staff, his adjutant-general, colonel McDowell, and his quarter-master general, colonel Walker, rendered great service, as did his aids-de-camp, general Adair and majors Barry and Crittenden. The military skill of the former was of great service to us, and the activity of the two latter gentlemen could not be surpassed. Illness deprived me of the talents of my adjutant-general, colonel Gaines, who was left at Sandwich. His duties were however ably performed by the acting assistant adjutant general, captain Butler. My aids-de-camp, lieutenant O'Fallon and captain Todd, of the line, and my volunteer aids, John Speed Smith and John Chambers, esq. have rendered me the most important service from the opening of the campaign. I have already stated that general Cass and commodore Perry assisted me in forming the troops for action. The former is an officer of the highest merit and the appearance of the brave commodore cheered and animated every breast.

It would be useless, sir, after stating the circumstances of the action, to pass encomiums upon col. Johnson and his regiment. Veterans could not have manifested more firmness. The colonel's numerous wounds prove that he was in the post of danger. Lieutenant-colonel James Johnson and the majors Payne and Thompson were equally active, though more fortunate. Major Wood of the engineers, already distinguished by his conduct at fort Meigs, attended the army with two six pounders. Having no use for them in the action, he joined in the pursuit of the enemy and with major Payne of the mounted regiment, two of my aids-de-camp, Todd and Chambers, and three privates, continued it for several miles after the rest of the troops had halted, and made many prisoners.

I left the army before an official return of the prisoners, or that of the killed and wounded, was made out. It was however ascertained that the former amounts to six hundred and one regulars, including twenty-five officers. Our loss is seven killed and twenty-two wounded, five of which have since died. Of the British troops twelve were killed and twenty-two wounded. The indians suffered most—thirty-three of them having been found upon the ground, besides those killed on the retreat.

On the day of the action, six pieces of brass artillery were taken, and two iron twenty-four pounders the day before. Several others were discovered in the river and can be easily procured. Of the brass pieces, three are the trophies of our revolutionary war that were taken at Saratoga and York, and surrendered by general Hull. The number of small arms taken by us and destroyed by the enemy must amount to upwards of five thousand; most of them had been ours and taken by the enemy at the surrender of Detroit, at the river Raisin and colonel Dudley's defeat. I believe that the enemy retain no other military trophy of their victories than the standard of the 4th regiment—They were not magnanimous enough to bring that of the 41st regiment into the field, or it would have been taken.

You have been informed, sir, of the conduct of the troops under my command in action; it gives me great pleasure to inform you, that they merit also the approbation of their country for their conduct, in submitting to the greatest privations with the utmost cheerfulness.

The infantry were entirely without tents, and for several days, the whole army subsisted upon fresh beef without bread or salt.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM H. HARRISON.

GENERAL ORDERS—OF DEBARRICATION, OF MARCH,
AND OF BATTLE.

Head-quarters on board the U. S. schooner Ariel,
September 27th, 1813.

As it is the intention of the general to land the army on the enemy's coast, the following will be the order of debarkation, of march and of battle.

The right wing of the army will be composed of the Kentucky volunteers, under the command of his excellency gov. Shelby, acting as major general.—The left wing, of the light corps of lieutenant col. Ball and the brigades of general M'Arthur and Cass. This arrangement is made with a view to the localities of the ground upon which the troops are to act and the composition of the enemy's force, and is calculated in marching up the lake or strait to place our regular troops in the open ground on the lake, where they will probably be opposed by the British regulars, and the Kentucky volunteers in the woods, which it is presumed will be occupied by the enemy's militia and Indians. When the signal is given for putting to the shore, the corps of lieutenant colonel Ball will precede the left wing; the regiment of volunteer riflemen the right wing; these corps will land with the utmost celerity, consistent with the preservation of good order, and as soon as landed will seize the most favorable position for annoying the enemy and covering the disembarkation of the troops of the line. Gen. Cass's brigade will follow col. Ball's corps, and gen. Calme's the volunteer riflemen. The regiments will land and form in succession upon those which precede them. The right wing, with its left in front, displaying to the left. The brigades of generals King, Allen and Caldwell, will form successively to the right of gen. Calme's, gen. M'Arthur's and Childs' brigades will form the reserve. The general will command in person the brigades of gen. Cass and Calmes, assisted by major-general Henry. His excellency governor Shelby will have the immediate command of the three brigades on the right, assisted by major-general Desha. As soon as the troops are disembarked, the boats are to be immediately sent back to the fleet. It will be observed that the order of landing here prescribed, is somewhat that of direct echelons deployed into line upon the advanced corps of the right and left wing. It is the intention of the general, however, that all the troops which are provided with boats should land in as quick succession as possible; and the general officers commanding towards the extremities of the line are authorised to deviate from the arrangement to counteract any movement of the enemy, by landing any part of their commands, previous to the formation of the corps, which is herein directed to precede them. The corps of lieutenant-colonel Ball and the volunteer rifle regiment will maintain the position they occupy on landing until the troops of the line are formed to support them; they will then retire through the intervals of the line, or to the flanks, and form in the rear of the line.

A detachment of artillery, with a six, four and three pounder and howitzer, will land with the advanced light corps; the rest of the artillery will be held in reserve and landed at such points as major Wood may direct.

The point of landing for the reserve, under brigadier-general M^rArthur, cannot now be designated; it will be made to support any point of the line which may require aid, or be formed on the flanks as circumstances may render necessary. The arrangement for landing the troops will be made entirely under the direction of an officer of the navy, whom commodore Perry has been so obliging as to offer for that purpose. The embarkation of the troops will be covered by the cannon of the vessels. The troops being landed and the enemy driven off, or not opposing the landing, the army will change its front to the left, and form in order of battle in the following manner—The two brigades of regular troops and two of the volunteers to be formed in two lines at right angles to the shore of the lake. General M^rArthur's brigade and Calmes' to form the front of the line, and Cass and Childs' the second line; the regular troops still on the left; that flank of both lines resting on the shore, the distance between the two lines will be three hundred yards. The remaining three brigades of volunteers will be drawn up in a single line of two ranks, at right angles to the line of march, its head upon the right of the front line forming a crotchet (enpotence) with that line and extending beyond the second line. The corps of lieutenant-colonel Ball will form the advance of the left wing at the distance of three hundred yards, the regiment of rifle volunteers the advance of the right wing at the same distance.

Some pieces of light artillery will be placed in the road leading up the lake, and at such other points as major Wood may direct. When the order is given for marching, the first and second lines will advance by files from the heads of companies; in other words, these two lines will form two columns, marching by their flanks by companies at entire distances. The three brigades on the right flank will be faced to the left and marched forward—the head of this column still forming en potence with the front line. It is probable that the two brigades of the front line will extend from the lake, some distance into the woods, on the right flank, and it is desirable it should be so—but should it be otherwise, and the crotchet or angle be at any time on the open ground, his excellency, governor Shelby, will immediately prolong the front line to the right by adding to it as many companies of the leading brigade of the flank column as will bring the angle and consequently the flank column itself completely within the woods. It is to be presumed that the enemy will make their attack upon the army on its march, that their regular troops will form their right upon the lake, their militia occupy the ground between the regulars and the woods, and the indians the woods. The formation herein prescribed is intended to resist an arrangement of this kind. Should the general conjecture on that subject prove correct, as it must be evident that the right of the enemy cannot be turned, and on that wing his best troops must be placed, it will be proper to refuse him our left, and direct our principal effort to uncover the left flank of his regulars by driving off his militia. In the event here supposed, therefore, it will be proper to bring up a part or the whole of general Cass's brigade, to assist the charge made by general Calmes, or that the former should change positions with the brigade of volunteers in the second line.—Should the general think it safe to order the whole of Cass's brigade to the right, without replacing it with another, general Cass will march it, the right formed in oblique echelons of companies. It will be the business of general M^rArthur in the event of his wing being refused to watch the motion of the enemy (and with the assistance of the artillery) prevent his front line at least from interrupting the progress of our right. Should the enemy's militia be defeated, the brigade of ours in advance will immediately wheel upon the flank of the British regulars, and general M^rArthur will advance to attack them in front. In the mean time, his excellency governor Shelby can use the brigade in reserve of the second line to prolong the flank line from its front or left or to reinforce any weak part of the line. In all cases where troops in advance are obliged to retire through those who are advancing to support them, it will be done by companies in files, which will retire through the intervals of the advancing line, and will immediately form in the rear. The light troops will be particularly governed by this direction.

The disposition of the troops on the right flank is such as the commanding general thinks best calculated to resist an attack from indians which is only to be expected from that quarter. His excellency governor Shelby will, however, use his discretion in making any alteration which his experience and judgment may dictate. Lieutenant-colonel Ball, lieutenant-colonel Simral, and the general officers commanding on the flank line, are to send out small detachments in advance of the two former corps, and to the flank of the latter. Should they discover the enemy in face immediately notice will be sent to the lines. The general commanding on the spot will immediately order the signals for forming in order of battle which will be the beat "to arms."

All signals will be immediately repeated by all the drums of the line—the signal for the whole to halt is the retreat. Drums will be distributed along the heads of companies, and the taps occasionally given to regulate their march.

Lieutenant-colonels Ball and Simral are to keep the general constantly advised of the discoveries made by the advanced parties. Where it shall become necessary for the corps of Ball and Simral to retire, they will form on the flank or in the rear of M^rArthur's and Calmes' brigades, and receive the orders of the brigadiers respectively.

Brigadier-general Cass will designate such officers as he may deem proper, to assist captain Elliott, of the navy, in the arrangement of the boats and the debarcation of the troops. The general will be the signal for the whole to move. By command, (Signed) EDMUND P. GAINES,

Extract of a letter from brigadier-general M. Clowe, to his excellency governor Tompkins, dated "Fort George, half past 6 o'clock, P. M.
6th October, 1813."

"Since writing the above we have commenced offensive operations against the enemy. About 500 militia volunteers and about 150 Indians, commanded by col. Chapin, attacked the picket guard of the enemy about a mile and an half from Fort George, and drove them in upon the main body, when the enemy opened a fire from several field pieces. Our men retired in good order into the fort, with the loss of one man killed and two or three wounded. The enemy's loss was seven killed, many wounded and 4 prisoners. In a short time the enemy appeared in considerable force within 500 yards of the fort, at the edge of the woods; Chapin again sallied out with about 300 men and some Indian:—commenced a brisk fire on the whole of the enemy's line and drove them half a mile; but perceiving by the movements of the enemy that they would outflank us, I ordered 200 to reinforce him, and in two detachments to attack the enemy's flanks. We succeeded in driving the enemy into the woods, when night coming on put an end to the conflict. Our loss was trifling; I have not ascertained that of the enemy. Colonel Chapin is a brave man. Every officer and soldier did his duty."

Burlington, (Vermont) Oct. 15.—On the evening of the 11th instant, a detachment of the rifle corps, consisting of about 130 men, under the command of colonel Isaac Clark, embarked on board of batteaux at Chazy, N. Y. and proceeded to Caldwell's Manner, in the province of Lower Canada, and landed at the house of a Mr. Cook, where there was deposited about three thousand dollars worth of property recently smuggled from the states, consisting of leather, shoes, &c.; after taking and putting on board of the batteaux the above-mentioned property, they proceeded from thence and landed at Rock river, near the Canada lines, about break of day. The troops immediately formed and proceeded towards St. Armands, the expedition was so conducted that the enemy was not apprized of their approach, until the riflemen were within fifty rods of the British encampment; on hearing alarm guns fired, and the British drums beat to arms, the riflemen advanced precipitately upon them, so that they had not time even to form their troops, they however attempted to make a stand. Major Powell who commanded the British forces was immediately taken prisoner. The enemy commenced a fire upon our troops from behind houses, fences, &c.; a column advanced in front, but they were all soon compelled to lay down their arms. Several made their escape and secreted themselves in cellars, chambers, &c.

The loss on the side of the enemy is not exactly known: three were killed and a considerable number wounded; two were wounded of the rifle corps.—Colonel Clark has made ninety three prisoners, taken one hundred and twenty stand of arms, eight horses and seven oxen. The prisoners arrived at this post on the 13th instant.

NAVAL.

Comodore Decatur's squadron was prepared for an escape from New-London, the first opportunity. Those acquainted with the coast think the season has arrived when he will get past the British frigate-guards—as their ships of the line are now called.—The blockading squadron consisted of one 74, one razeed, two frigates, a sloop of war and a schooner.

It being reported at Halifax, that com. Rodgers had arrived on our coast, a whole FLEET was sent out to catch him.

A British frigate is cruising off Portland, to keep the Enterprise or Rattlesnake from interrupting the cruises of "his majesty's" brigs on that station.

Copy of a letter from com. Chauncey to the secretary of the navy, dated

United States' ship General Pike,
Off Niagara, 1st. Oct. 1813.

SIR—On the 26th ult. it was reported to me, that the enemy's fleet was in York—I immediately dispatched the Lady of the Lake to look into York, and ascertain the fact—she returned in the evening with the information that the enemy was in York bay. I immediately prepared to weigh, but owing to a strong wind from N. N. E. was not able to get out of the river until the evening of the 27th, and, owing to the extreme darkness of the night, a part of the squadron got separated and did not join before next morning at 8 A. M.—On the 28th, the General Pike, Madison and Sylph, each took a schooner in tow and made all sail for York. Soon after discovered the enemy's fleet under way in York bay, shaped our course for him and prepared for action—he perceived our intention of engaging him in his position, tacked and stood out of the bay, wind at east; I formed the line and run down for his centre. When we had approached within about 3 miles he made all sail to the southward—I wore in succession and stood on the same tack with him, edging down gradually in order to close—at 10 minutes past meridian, the enemy finding that we were closing fast with him, and that he must either risk an action or suffer his two rear vessels to be cut off, he tacked in succession, beginning at the van, hoisted his colors and commenced a well directed fire at this ship, for the purpose of covering his rear, and attacking our rear as he passed to leeward; perceiving his intention, I was determined to disappoint him; therefore as soon as the Wolf (the leading ship) passed the centre of his line and abeam of us, I bore up in succession (preserving our line) for the enemy's centre; this manœuvre not only covered our rear but drove him in confusion; he immediately bore away, we had however closed so near as to bring our guns to bear with effect, and in 20 minutes the main and mizen top mast and main-yard of the Wolf was shot away; he immediately put before the wind and set all sail upon his foremast; I made the signal for the fleet to make all sail; the enemy, however, keeping dead before the wind, was able to outvail most of our squadron. As it brought all the sail upon one mast, he did not feel the loss of his main and mizen top-mast—I continued the chase until near 3 o'clock, during which time I was enabled in this ship (with the Asp in tow) to keep within point blank shot of the enemy, and sustained the whole of his fire during the chase. Capt. Crane in the Madison, and lieutenant Brown in the Oneida, used every exertion to close with the enemy, but the Madison having a heavy schooner in tow and the Oneida sailing very dull before the wind, prevented those officers from closing near enough to do any execution with their carronades. The Governor Tompkins kept in her station, until her foremast was so badly wounded as to oblige her to shorten sail. Lieut. Finch of the Madison who commanded her for this cruise (owing to the indisposition of Lieut. Pettigrew) behaved with great gallantry and is an officer of much promise. Captain Woolsey in the Syph was kept astern by the Ontario, which he had in tow, but did considerable execution with his heavy guns.

At 15 minutes before 3 P. M. I very reluctantly relinquished the pursuit of a beaten enemy—the reasons that led to this determination were such as I flatter myself that you will approve—they were these: At the time I gave up the chase, this ship was making so much water, that it required all our pumps to keep her free (owing to our receiving several shot so much below the water edge, that we could not plug the holes from the outside) the Gov. Tompkins with her foremast gone, and the squadron within about six miles of the head of the lake, blowing a gale of wind from east and increasing with a heavy sea on, and every appearance of the Equinox. I considered that if I chased the enemy to his anchorage at the head of the lake, I should be obliged to anchor also, and although we might succeed in driving him on shore, the probability was that we should go on shore also—he amongst his friends, we amongst our enemies, and after the gale abated, if he could succeed in getting off one or two vessels out of the two fleets, it would give him as completely the command of the lake as if he had 20 vessels. Moreover he was covered at his anchorage by a part of his army, and several small batteries thrown up, for the purpose. Therefore, if we could have rode out the gale, we should have been cut up by their shot from the shore; under all these circumstances, and taking into view the consequences resulting from the loss of our superiority on the lakes at this time, I without hesitation relinquished the opportunity then presenting itself of acquiring individual reputation at the expense of my country.

The loss sustained by this ship was considerable, owing to her being so long exposed to the fire of the whole of the enemy's fleet, but our most serious loss was occasioned by the bursting of one of our guns, which killed and wounded 22 men and tore up the top-gallant fore-castle which rendered the gun upon that deck useless. We had four other guns cracked in the muzzle, which rendered their use extremely doubtful. Our main-top-gallant mast was shot away in the early part of the action, and the bow sprit, fore and main mast wounded, rigging and sails much cut up, and a number of shot in our hull, several of which were between wind and water, and 27 men killed and wounded, including those by the bursting of the gun. The Madison received a few shot, but no person hurt on board.—The Gov. Tompkins lost her foremast and the Oneida her main-top mast badly wounded. We have, however, repaired nearly all our damages, and are ready to meet the enemy. During our chase one, if not two, of the enemy's small vessels was completely in our power if I could have been satisfied with so partial a victory, but I was so sure of the whole that I passed them unnoticed, by which means they finally escaped.

The gale continued until last night, but the wind still blows from the eastward. I thought it important to communicate with general Wilkinson, to ascertain when he meant to move with the army. I therefore ran off this place for that purpose, and he thinks that the public service will be promoted by my watching sir James at the head of the lake, and if possible preventing his return to Kingston, while he proceeds with the army for Sackett's Harbor. I shall, therefore, proceed immediately in quest of the enemy.

I have great pleasure in acknowledging the assistance I received from captain Sinclair during our chase, in using his best exertions to bring this ship into close action. The other officers and men behaved to my perfect satisfaction, and were extremely anxious to close with the enemy even singly, and if he ever gives us an opportunity for close action, they will show that they are not inferior to any of their countrymen.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

ISAAC CHAUNCEY.

United States' ship General Pike,
Sackett's Harbor, 6th Oct. 1813.

SIR—I have the pleasure to inform you that I arrived here this morning, with five of the enemy's vessels, which I fell in with and captured last evening off the Ducks. They were part of a fleet of seven sail which left York on Sunday with 234 troops on board, bound to Kingston. Of this fleet five were captured, one burnt, and one escaped; the prisoners, amounting to nearly 300, besides having upwards of 300 of our troops on board from Niagara, induced me to run into port for the purpose of landing both.

I have an additional pleasure in informing you, that amongst the captured vessels are the late U. S. schooners Julia and Growler, the others are gun-vessels.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant. ISAAC CHAUNCEY.

Captain Allen.

Tate of the United States' sloop of war Argus.

William Henry Allen was an officer, no less distinguished by his bravery than the uniform courtesy and amenity of his manners. In ordinary life, we discover nothing of those high qualities, for which in the hour of danger he was found to be so pre-eminent. He relaxed into all the mildness of the polished and amiable gentleman, stated his opinions with modesty, and carefully abstained from irritating or insulting language. His conversation, although peculiarly unostentatious, was luminous and instructive, and combined the elegance of the scholar with the sound practical sense of a man of intercourse with the world. He studied naval tactics as a science, and labored to adorn and decorate the stern and masculine character of the sailor with the milder graces and softer embellishments. In this he succeeded completely, and was capable of turning to the view the stern and intrepid side of his character or the milder and more amiable, as occasion required. In his friendships he was ardent, constant and effective. All these advantages were rendered still more conspicuous by a noble masculine deportment, and the fine form which he inherited from nature. A stranger in his company and perfectly ignorant of his character, would find his heart drawn powerfully towards him, by the predominant and pervading sympathy, which such endearing qualities always excites. He would be disposed to converse more with him and to cultivate his friendship. Every hour he would feel this attachment growing stronger, as the varied beauties of the character were disclosed in succession. Such was Wm. Henry Allen. He had adorned his name by his bravery, which was so conspicuous in the affair of the Macedonian. This enlarged his ideas, and made him pant for fame, that last infirmity of noble minds. He has fallen, indeed—but to all the purposes of life he had lived long enough. He had enjoyed the confidence of his country, and died in the performance of his duty. This humble wreath is not less a tribute to individual friendship than to justice.

THE CHRONICLE.

New-Jersey election.—The political character of this state is completely changed by the late elections. The “republicans” have a majority in each branch of the legislature, and the executive will have the same designation.

The Pennsylvania returns shew a great increase of “republican” votes. The detail may be inserted as soon as the returns are complete. The whole representation in congress from this state is “republican,” and many counties have cast off their old members in the assembly. The district that elected Mr. Glovinger (a federalist) to congress last year (who has resigned his seat) has returned a republican by a majority of from 1500 to 2000 votes.

Maryland election.—Two returns have been made by the judges of Allegheny county, one from each district being convened to make the usual return. Four of the judges have returned four “federalists” with a note stating an “irregularity” in one of the districts; and two of the judges have absolutely returned three republicans and one federalist as the voice of the people directed. All the judges are “federalists.” From the information afforded, whether of the flimsy pretence to vitiate the election, or the public feeling respecting it, we give our opinion that those highest in vote will obtain their seats before the election of governor is attempted, in December next.

We have no European news since our last.

“England is a flogged nation.”—Cobbett.

Mr. W. Smith, on a recent debate on the cruelty of military officers, in the British house of commons, stated, that John O’Brien, a private soldier, was by the order of col. Orde, on the Halifax station, for a small offence, loaded with a heavy knapsack in hot weather and ordered to walk about all day, allowing him no rest, and made to take his dinner at the sundial, standing. He then deserted, but surrendered himself. For this he was tried, and sentenced a THOUSAND LASHES; but being recommended to mercy, he received only 500 of them!!! The honorable member stated a variety of other cases which appeared before a court martial, respecting officers and privates. In three years and a half, said he, ONE HUNDRED and THIRTY-TWO THOUSAND LASHES had been inflicted on a body of only 400 men, exclusive of garrison and drum head sentences. And yet such a cruel, wanton and wicked nation as England, is called the “bulwark of the religion we profess.”

British Parliament.

[The following debate is, in many respects, highly interesting to the people of the United States. If the representation of lord Cochrane be true, how humble is the state of the British sailor!—If what Mr. Croker advances is correct, how honorable to our own tars!—Little did Mr. C. apprehend the splendid eulogium he was passing on the American seamen, in the portrait he gave of the gallantry of those they so easily conquered.]

JULY, 1813.—STATE OF THE NAVY.

Lord Cochrane rose in pursuance of his notice, to call the attention of the house to the present state of the navy. He would not long trespass on the attention of the house. In order to place before them in a clear and perspicuous manner his sentiments upon this most important subject, he had embodied them in a resolution, which members would have an opportunity of perusing, and weighing with due deliberation during the period of adjournment, and the truth of which they would thus have an opportunity of ascertaining. He could only say, that to the correctness of the facts which he should state, he could most fully pledge himself. He would then content himself with reading his resolution, and should reserve whatever else he might have to offer to the house till he heard whether any objection should be made—an event which he did not anticipate, as he saw not upon what ground objection could rise. The noble lord then read the following resolution:

“That the honor of his majesty's crown, the glory and safety of the country, does in a great degree depend on the maintenance, especially in time of war, of an efficient naval establishment. That during the late and present war with France, splendid victories have been gained by his majesty's fleets and vessels of war, over a vast superiority in the number of guns and men, and in the weight of metal.—That these victories, gained under such circumstances, were obtained by the skill and intrepidity of the officers, and by the energy, zeal and valor of the crews. That during the present war with the United States of America, his majesty's naval service has, in several instances, experienced defeat, in a manner, and to a degree, unforeseen and unexpected by this house, by the admiralty, and by the country at large. That the cause of these lamentable defeats is not any superiority possessed by the enemy, either in skill or valor, nor the well known difference in the weight of metal, which heretofore has been deemed unimportant; but arises chiefly from the decayed and heartless state of the crews of his majesty's ships of war, compared with their former energy and zeal—and compared, on the other hand, with the freshness and vigor of the crews of the enemy. That it is an indisputable fact, that long and unmitigated confinement to a ship, as well as to any other particular spot, and especially when accompanied with the diet necessarily that of ships of war, and a deprivation of the usual recreations of man, seldom fails to produce a rapid decay of the physical powers—the natural parent, in such cases, of despondency of mind. That the late and present war against France (including a short interval of peace, in which the navy was not paid off) have lasted upwards of twenty years, and that a new naval war has recently commenced. That the duration of the term of service in his majesty's navy is absolutely without any limitation; and that there is no mode provided for by law, for the fair and impartial discharging of men therefrom; and that, according to the present practice, decay, disease, incurable wounds, or death, can alone procure the release of any seaman, of whatever age, or whatever length of service. That seamen who have become wholly unfit for active service, are, in place of being discharged and rewarded, according to their merits and their sufferings, transferred to ships on harbor duty, where they are placed under officers wholly unacquainted with their character and former conduct, who have no other means to estimate them, but on the scale of their remaining activity and bodily strength; where there is no distinction made between the former petty officer and the common seaman; between youth and age; and when those worn out and wounded seamen, who have spent the best part of their lives, or have lost their health in the service of their country, have to perform a duty more laborious than that of the convict felons in the dock yards; and with this remarkable distinction, that the labors of the latter have a known termination. That though the seamen, thus transferred, and thus employed, have all been invalided, they are permitted to re-enter ships of war on actual service: and that such is the nature of the harbor duty, that many, in order to escape from it, do so re-enter; there being no limitation as to the number of times of their being invalided, or that of their re-entering. That to obtain a discharge from the navy, by purchase, the sum of eighty pounds sterling is required by the admiralty, which together with other expenses, amount to twenty times the original bounty, and is equal to all that a seaman can save, with the most rigid economy, during the average period in which he is capable of service; that this sum is demanded alike from men of all ages and of all lengths of servitude; from those pensioned for wounds, and also from those invalided for harbor duty; thus converting the funds of Greenwich and the reward of former services into a means of recruiting the navy; that such is the horror which seamen have of this useless prolongation of their captivity, that those who are able, in order to escape from it, actually return into the hands of government all those fruits of their toil which formerly they looked to as the means of some little comfort in their old age. That besides these capital grievances, tending to perpetuate the impress service, there are others worthy the serious attention of this house. That the petty officers and seamen on board of his majesty's ships and vessels of war, though absent on foreign stations for many years, receive no wages until their return home, and are of course deprived of the comforts which these wages paid at short intervals, would procure them; that this is now more severely felt, owing to the recent practice of postponing declarations of war till long after the war has been actually begun; by which means the navy is deprived under the name of droits, of the first fruits and greatest proportion of the prize money to which they have heretofore been entitled; and thus, not by the examinations of the courts of admiralty, the proportion of captures which at last devolves to the navy is much too small to produce those effects which formerly were so beneficial to the country; that while their wages are withheld from them abroad, when paid at home, which, to prevent desertion, usually takes place on the day before they sail out again, having no opportunity to go on shore, they are compelled to buy slops of Jews on board, or receive them from government 15 per cent. higher than their acknowledged value; and being paid in bank notes, they are naturally inclined to exchange them for money current in other countries, and which it is notorious that they do at an enormous loss; that the recovery of the pay and prize money by the widows, children, or relatives of seamen, is rendered as difficult as possible; and finally, the regulations with regard to passing of the examination requisite, previous to an admission to the benefits of Greenwich hospital, subject the disabled seamen to so many difficulties, and to such long delays, that in numerous cases, he is compelled to beg his way in the pursuit of a boon, the amount of which, even in event of the loss of both eyes, or of both arms, does not equal that of the common board wages of a footman.—That one of the best and strongest motives to meritorious conduct in military and naval men, is the prospect of promotion, while such promotion is, at the same time, free of additional expense to the nation; but that in the British naval service, this powerful and honorable incitement has ceased to exist, seeing that the means of rewarding merit has been almost wholly withdrawn from naval commanders in chief, and whose inspection officers are performed; in fact it is a matter of perfect notoriety, that it has become next to impossible for a meritorious subordinate petty officer to advance to the rank of lieutenant; that in scarcely any instance promotion or employment is now to be obtained in the navy, through any other means than what is called parliamentary interest—what is, the corrupt influence of boroughs. That owing to these causes, chiefly, the crews of his majesty's ships of war have, in general, become in a very considerable degree worn out and disheartened, and inadequate to the performance, with their wonted energy and effect, of those arduous duties which belong to the naval service; and that hence has arisen by slow and imperceptible degrees, the enormous augmentation of our ships and men, while the naval force of our enemies is actually much less than in former years.—That, as a remedy for this alarming national evil, it is absolutely necessary that the grievances of the navy, some of which only have been recited above, should be redressed; that a limitation of the duration of service should be adopted, accompanied with the certainty of a suitable reward, not subject to any of the effects of partiality, and that measures should be taken to cause the comfortable situations in the ordinary of the dock yard,—the places of porters, messengers, &c. &c. in and about the offices belonging to the sea service, the under writers of the naval stores, &c.—to be bestowed on meritorious decayed petty officers and seamen, instead of being, as they now generally are, the wages of corruption by borough elections. That this house, convinced that a decrease of energy of character cannot be compensated by an augmentation of the number of ships, guns, and men, which is, at the same time, a grievous pecuniary burden to the country, will, at an early period next session, institute an enquiry by special committee, or otherwise, into the matters above stated, and particularly with a view to dispensing suitable rewards to seamen; that they will investigate the state of the fund of Greenwich hospital, and ascertain whether it is necessary to apply the droits of the admiralty, and droits of the crown, as the natural first means of compensation to those who have acquired them by their valour, their privations and their sufferings."

Mr. Francis Burdett seconded the resolution.

Mr. Croker said, he should think himself wanting in duty to the house, if he did not at once assure them, that except the very opening of the resolution which had just been read from the chair, there was not one statement which was not unfounded in fact, or exaggerated in the highest degree. (Hear, hear.) He had only to lament that the noble lord had not brought forward this subject at an earlier period of the session, so that his statements might have been refuted in a manner more decided, although perhaps not more satisfactorily than they would be on the present occasion. It was surprising that the noble lord should have ventured to submit to the house a resolution being upon its face such evident marks of its own falsehood—a resolution, so palpable as it was with the most unformed calumny, and with such distortion of facts—who but the noble lord would have ever dreamed of such an insinuation as that the late victories gained by the American navy over the British flag had been attributable, not to the inferiority of force, but to the misconduct and perfidy of our sailors? (Hear, hear.)—What! he would ask, was the crew of the Java dispirited when she was taken? (Hear.) When the M. caton was taken, was her crew sunk in apathy and broken-hearted? (Hear, hear.) So far from this being the case, he could state from his own knowledge, that in the latter part of the actions in which these vessels were engaged, and in which they had fought with so much honor to themselves, and so much glory to the British name, when almost all hopes had failed, their spirit and valor still remained unsubdued; and instead, as the noble lord would have the house to believe, of sinking amidst the weight of their misfortunes, they cheered each other, with reiterated shouts of encouragement; and those cheers invariably commenced amongst the wounded in the cockpit. Did this, he would demand of the noble lord, show any thing like a crew disheartened? Did this show a British sailor to be aught but what he had ever proved himself to be? Did this tend to tarnish, or to diminish the lustre which had ever attended the career of the British navy? (Hear, hear.) With these facts before the house and the country, was he not authorized to call upon the noble lord to state, how he could presume to ask the house to vote for his resolution? Another fact he would state, which he supposed the noble lord would construe into a new proof of the apathetic and disheartened state of our sailors.—That to which he alluded, was the conduct of John Hamble, the boatswain of the Java, who, it would be seen on his examination before a court martial, amongst other facts, stated, that having had his arm carried away, he went below to the surgeon, and, had his stump "put to rights," as he termed it, by having the tourniquet applied to it, returned to the deck and cheered the boarders with his pipe—(Hear, hear.) Was this a proof of any diminution of British valor, or of a falling off in the character and spirit of those brave men, who, until libelled and brow-beaten by the noble lord, had stood above the most distant imputation of misconduct? In the same degree as this part of the resolution of the noble lord was incorrect, so was all the rest. With respect to the fact stated, of 80*l.* being demanded for the discharge of every seaman from the navy, nothing could be more unfounded. The truth was, that 80*l.* certainly was demanded for the discharge of an able seaman; but in proportion as the ability and usefulness of the man diminished so did the sum required for his discharge. For instance, an ordinary seaman paid but 60*l.* and a landman but 40*l.*; and if these men became invalided, and were only employed in harbor duty, this demand was diminished one half. And again, where they were unfit for service, they were not alone discharged without fee, but received a pension for the remainder of their lives. (Hear.) If the sailors in his majesty's service were not heart broken before, the base libel which the noble lord had that day attempted to throw on their character and their honor, was sufficient to effect that object, had the noble lord maintained so much authority over them as he did at former times—a circumstance which, happily there was much reason to doubt. The noble lord had talked also of corruption, and had said, that promotions could only be obtained by means of corruption and parliamentary influence. He would ask the noble lord, if his promotion was the effect of corruption? (Hear, hear, hear.) Was the red ribbon which was given to him, for the first time to a man of his rank, the effect of parliamentary influence?—(hear, hear!)—And was the promotion of many other men whom he could name, if it would not be in some degree injurious, to be attributed to such an unworthy cause? It was easy, however, for the noble lord to talk in general, but let him name who has received the wages of corruption, or who had given them—(hear, hear!) The right honorable gentleman having made some further reproachful comments upon the resolution of the noble lord, concluded by expressing a hope, that if the noble lord dared to press it to a division, that the house would leave him in such a minority as would prove the indignation with which it was regarded by the house.

Mr. Lockheart entreated the noble lord to withdraw a resolution so inconsistent with the character which his lordship had always born, and so hostile to every feeling which the house had ever entertained towards the British navy.

Sir F. Burlett thought there was sufficient reason stated by the noble lord for an inquiry, and the very doubts which were urged by the right honorable gentleman (Mr. Croker) proved to him most strongly the necessity of that inquiry. He would agree that the period of the session at which the matter had been brought forward was too advanced, yet if the resolution was rejected now, he hoped the noble lord would renew the subject at an early part of the ensuing session. He would not, however, advise the noble lord to withdraw his resolution after the manner in which it had been stigmatized by the right honorable gentleman (Mr. Croker).

Mr. Rose in the fullest manner denied all that had been advanced by the noble lord, with respect either to the difficulty of sailors receiving their pay or the prize money.

Mr. Culcraft, in terms of great animation, complimented Mr. Croker on the speech which he had made, and observed, that the resolution of the noble lord was calculated to do more mischief in the British navy, than any other plan which could be devised. The honorable gentleman then defended the character of the British sailors with becoming zeal and energy, and concluded by expressing a hope, that the resolution would meet in that house the fate it so eminently deserved.

Mr. Wrottesley bore testimony to the facility in the naval public officers.

Mr. Stainforth opposed the resolution.

Lord Cochrane replied. He said he was not displeased at the warmth with which his disposition had been met. It certainly would be injurious to no one, except to the feeling of certain members of that house. The right honorable secretary had met his statements with individual instances of gallantry. The existence of these he did not deny; but he asserted, that the physical power of our seamen was decreasing, partly from the length of the war, and partly from the system of harbor duty, established in 1803. He had heard that the system was about to be changed; and he should be happy to hear from the right honorable secretary that such was the fact. The right honorable secretary had challenged him to show an instance of an officer having purchased his discharge from such service. He would name a Mr. Ford, who had served with him in the Impérieuse, who had done so; and Nelson, his cockswain of that vessel, had been placed in harbor service, and had returned to him; and another person of the name of Parley of the Leda, had three times left that degrading service, and had each time returned to him, and died with him, completely worn out in the service. These were facts which he was prepared to prove at the bar, as he was all those which had been denied with so much warmth by the right honorable secretary. To show further that the crews of British ships of war were unequal to themselves heretofore, he would relate what was the opinion of a person not at all likely to be disaffected to the order of things; he was then son of a ship; he had taken an American privateer, the crew of which consisted of only 130 men, and he had declared that he would rather have them than his own crew, consisting of 240. If the right honorable secretary doubted this fact, he might inquire, and he would easily verify it. The noble lord had heard that the sailors taken prisoners by the Americans, had been found running away in the back settlements; that forty of them had been brought back by force, and that of the manifestation of this propensity, the exchange of prisoners had been broken off. The lateness of the period at which he had brought forward his resolution had been complained of. He did intend to bring in a bill to limit the term of service, but circumstances had prevented him; but he would carry his intention into effect in the next session. With respect to parliamentary influence, the right honorable secretary had asked, whether he had found it of service to himself in his profession? He certainly had not, because he had never prostituted his vote for that purpose; but he had no doubt others had found that influence of great avail. When he again brought forward the subject, he should prove all the facts he had adduced, and he hoped so much ignorance of the subject would not then be found to prevail.

Mr. Croker replied to the questions put by Lord Cochrane, that the government had at all times been very watchful over the harbor duty, but that it had not taken any new steps since the suggestions of the noble lord. He had never heard that the sailors taken prisoners by the Americans, had been found running away to the back settlements; nor of forty men being brought back by force. The exchange of prisoners was broken off, in consequence of some wrong done to the British seamen, and not in consequence of any fault of theirs.

The resolution was then negatived without a division.

N. V. VIII.

Nich. Jansville, Kentucky, April 25th, 1813.

SIR,—Yours of the 23d inst., requesting me to give you a statement respecting the late disaster at Fort Mifflin, was duly received. Rest assured, sir, that it is with sensations the most unpleasant that I undertake to recount the inhuman and barbarous conduct of the British and Indians after the battle of the 23d of January. The blood runs cold in my veins when I think of it.

On the morning of the 23d, shortly after 8 o'clock, six or eight Indians came to the house of Jean Baptiste Jeanne, where I was in company with Major Grew, captain Hart and Hickman, doctor Todd, and fifteen or twenty private volunteers, belonging to different corps. They did not molest any person or thing on their first approach, but kept vomiting abuse both to me and to a large number collected (say one or two hundred) at which time they commenced plucking the noses of the militaries, and the massacre of the wounded prisoners. I was one amongst the first that was taken prisoner, and was taken to a house about twenty paces from the house after being divested of part of my clothing, and commanded by signs there to remain for further orders. Shortly after being there, I saw the Indians with captain Hickman at the door, together with a great number with whom I was not acquainted. Supposing a general massacre had commenced, I made an effort to get to a house about one hundred yards distant, which contained a number of wounded, but, on my reaching the house, to my great mortification, found it surrounded by Indians, which precluded the possibility of my giving notice to the unfortunate victims of savage barbarity. An Indian chief of the Tama tribe, by the name of McCarty, gave me possession of his horse and blanket, telling me by signs, to lead my horse to the house, which I had just before left. The man that first took me, by this time came up and manifested a hostile disposition towards me, seizing his tomahawk as if to give me the fatal blow, which was prevented by my very good friend McCarty. On my reaching the house, which I had first started from, I saw the Indians take off a great number of prisoners, whom I afterwards saw in a most wretched condition, and entire want of the necessaries of life.

Mrs. Blandford, Mrs. Turner and Bythe, were rescued from a narrow which contained articles taken by the Indians from the citizens. We had all been placed there by our respective captors, except Bythe, who came where we were, entering on her feet to convey him to Milled, and promising to give him forty or fifty dollars, but, whilst in the act of proceeding, she was seized and carried away, then the other stepped up, and finding him, took him, and scalped him. The next that attracted my attention, was the house on fire that contained several wounded whom I knew were not able to get out. After the houses were burnt, I considered myself obliged marching orders, and after arriving at Sandy creek, the Indians called a halt, and commenced collecting after plundering and cutting a little savannah grass. Mrs. Blandford, Mrs. Turner and myself received some, and were sitting when an Indian came up and proposed exchanging his tomahawk for Mr. Smith's shoes, which he readily complied with. They then exchanging shirts, after which the Indian inquired how many men Harris had with him, at the same time calling St. Louis Washington or Madison, then seized his tomahawk, and struck him on the forehead, which cut into the cavity of the body. Seeing that the English hold of the tomahawk and appeared to resist, and upon not being him cut his face was inevitable, he closed his eyes and received the savage blow which terminated his existence. I was near enough to him to receive the brains and blood, after the fatal blow, on my back. A short time after the death of St. Louis, I saw three others were a singular fate. We then set out for Boyntonville, which place we reached about twelve or one o'clock at night. After being exposed to several hours in the sun from a riding that place, we were put into the covered mass of the door of which was partly covered with water; at which place we remained until next morning, when we again received marching orders for the village on the river Rouge, which place we made that day, where I was kept six days, then taken to Detroit and sold for a more detailed account of the proceedings, I take the liberty of referring you to the publication which appeared in the public prints, signed by George J. L. Baker; and to the publication of Judge Woodward, both of which I have particularly examined and find them to be fully correct, so far as concerned my notice.

I am, sir, with the regard, your Fellow-citizen,
GUSTAVUS M. BOWER,
Sergeant's mate 5th Regt. Ky. Volunteers.

Jessamine county, to wit:
The day Gustavus M. Bower personally came before me, John B. Cantor, of the commonwealth's justice of the peace and for said county, and made oath to the truth of his above stated facts, as stated by the said Bower. Given under my hand this 23th day of April, 1813.
JOHN M'PICALF,
Jesse Bialor, esq. Lexington.

SIR,—I received your letter some time since, in reply to the distressing affair of Frenchtown, of the 23d and 24th of January last. For the particulars of the action, and the terms of capitulation, I refer you to the official report of general Winchester, which is correct as far as came within my knowledge. After the capitulation I was introduced to colonel Proctor, the commander of the British forces and Indians, as one of the surviving survivors, and by him was requested to attend to some wounded, who were left on the ground where the action was fought. I willingly acquiesced, and doctor Dewees, my mate, remained with me; at the same time I informed colonel Proctor of my apprehensions for the safety of the wounded, and the surgeons; he replied, be under no apprehensions, you will be perfectly safe; I will place you under the special care of the chief medical officer, and very early I will send conveyances for the wounded and yours I to Anbursburg. Shortly after, I was requested to ascertain the number and rank of the wounded, and in so doing, was assisted by a British officer (whose name I did not know) to whom I likewise communicated my apprehensions of safety; he manifested some irritation at my doubts of British honor and magnanimity, and assured me protection would be afforded me. While engaged in this business, one of the rooms occupied by the wounded was crowded with Indians who were peaceable, but one of them who could speak English, admonished the British officer of the propriety of stationing interpreters in the houses. Upon my return from this business to the room I occupied, and which was set apart for the wounded-officers, I met, and was made acquainted with, captain Elliott, at present a British officer, who had visited captain Hart, at his residence. Captain Hart was solicitous to be removed that evening, and captain Elliott replied, if it was possible (and every exertion should be made) he should, and if it could not be effected that evening, early in the morning he would call for him in his own train (to give) and convey him to his own house in Anbursburg, where he should remain until recovered, assuming him to be patently no danger was to be apprehended, and if possible he would remain with him that night. In the afternoon captain Elliott and every British officer left the encampment, leaving behind three interpreters. From the repeated assurances, my apprehensions were quieted; for who could doubt? About one hour before daylight (for my duty required my attention nearly all the night) the interpreters suddenly disappeared. About an hour after daylight, the Indians began to collect in the town, and commenced plundering the houses in which the wounded were placed, and they stripped them of all my clothing. At this time the room I had occupied was crowded with Indians, and captain Hart's wound, already painful, had been injured by them; I conveyed him to an adjoining house, which had been plundered and was empty, where I understood the Indians (who on the preceding day had requested that interpreters should be left) and he knew my rank. He inquired why the surgeons were left, and why the wounded were left? I replied it was the wish of colonel Proctor we should remain until he could send for us; and captain Hart informed him captain Elliott was a friend of his, and was in a cell for him that morning. He shook his head significantly, and pointed to some damaged barrels, or we would have been taken of the preceding day. The Indian informed me every individual would be killed, and requested me to be quiet, for the chief was there then in council, and may be only the wounded would be killed. Captain Hart offered him one hundred dollars to take him to Milled. He replied, you are too badly wounded. With me were conversing, one of the wounded was tomahawked at our feet. Shortly after, the Indian returned and told me I was prisoner, and must go. I was taken by the Indian to the house I had left, and there discovered that captain Hickman and two others had, in my absence, been tomahawked, scalped, and striped. I was tied and taken by the Indian towards Milled about midnight, and I learned the occupation of the British wounded, and that of the British officers of the surgeon of the 41st regiment. Captain Elliott immediately recognized me, and inquired the cause of my situation. I informed him what had taken place, and requested him to send me back immediately, that some who were badly wounded might be left, and could be saved, and particularly captain Elliott's party, for whom he manifested much friendship. Captain Elliott replied, it is now too late, you may rest assured that those who are taken by the Indians are safe, and will be taken to Milled, and those who are really wounded are killed on the spot. I replied, many are unable to walk, and will be killed after making an effort and walking several miles; who might be saved; to which he replied, charity begins at home, no one wounded are to be conveyed first, and if any sickness remain, they shall be sent back for your wounded. My anxiety to get permission to return, in hopes of saving some of the prisoners, induced me at length to make an appeal to their avarice. The surgical instruments of the detachment were left in the room I occupied, and I informed the surgeon of their value and importance at that time; he immediately despatched an interpreter for them, who returned with the information, they were destroyed in the burning of the house, and gave additional confirmation of the massacre of the wounded. I was released from the Indians by captain Elliott and the surgeon. At this time my brother, who was wounded, and several others were in possession of the Indians, who were taken to the town of Milled. I requested their release and permission for them to accompany me on foot, under British protection. Captain Elliott would not consent, and he would be under no pretence they were safe, for he knew the fidelity of the Indians both when they were. When the intelligence of the massacre was by one communicated to captain Elliott and the surgeon, they were amazed and much astonished, and declared it was impossible to restrain the savages. The cause he then assigned to me was, that when the Indians discovered their loss in killed and wounded, and that of the British, they started off towards our wounded, declaring they would have satisfaction, and he continued, I was fearful of the event. During the plunder and the massacre, our wounded conducted themselves with the utmost composure and resignation, and made no resistance, which they knew would be fruitless, and destruction to all.

It was asserted by colonel Proctor in a conversation at Anbursburg, that the Indians had got some whiskey in the house we were detained at, and had become intoxicated. That the Indians may have had some whiskey, I shall not deny, but I think I can safely say, that they did not procure it there, and that was not the cause of the massacre; for on the preceding days and I subsequent to the attack of the 18th, I wanted some spirits, and made application to the horsekeeper, who assured me there was none about the house.

far it was all consumed by the British and Indians who had quartered in the house prior to the action of the 18th. Not a single Indian shewed no manifestation of drunkenness; their dilberate pillaging and their orderly conduct throughout, was such as would not be expected from drunken Indians.

Upon my arrival at Malden I was again solicited to take charge of the wounded, the surgery was up and running and I had at my disposal the medicines and dressings necessary, and they had as comfortable rooms as could be procured. During our stay at Malden some eight or ten of the wounded were brought in by the Indians; several made their escape who were doomed to massacre and found protection with the inhabitants of the territory, and I brought them to Malden and several more, their escape was owing to the Indian's usual mode of fighting, and prior to our leaving Malden, one poor fellow was brought in scalped, by the Indians, and delivered up to the British, but before I reached him I stopped and sent him to his surgeon. Frequently, and every one was obliged to the British officers to exert themselves and procure the release of the wounded from the Indians, urging the necessity of having their wounds dressed. In a conversation on this subject with captain Elliott, and while urging it, he replied, the Indians are excellent surgeons. The prisoners were all marched off to Sandwich, after remaining a few days at Malden, and I was called upon to know how many from the Indians would be made to march; who had sleighs furnished them, and who were in need during the march to Fort George. While I conclude, I must say, to the terms of capitulation were violated in every particular by the enemy. The wounded were not protected, private property was not held sacred, and our soldiers were not spared. With a few exceptions, I was treated respectfully by the British, but I saw the abuse which was lavished on my government, and was by no means sparingly bestowed. I am, sir, respectfully,
JOHN TOWN, M. D.

And late extract to the 5th regt. Kent. vol. militia.
The hon. Gen. is Sir—

This day doctor John TOWN came to me, John H. Marton, a justice of the peace for said county, and made oath that the facts stated in the foregoing letter are substantially true to the best of his knowledge. Given under my hand this 31 day of May, 1813.
JOHN H. MARTON.

State of Kentucky, Pendleton county, in the town of Edinburgh.

On the 21st day of April, 1813, I John Dawson, do hereby certify in English, Glave's company of the first regiment Kentucky volunteer militia, being detained off at Malden to captain Wm L. Scott's company, and was in the latter part of 18th January, and did not receive a wound, but on the 22d, at about one o'clock, P. M. I did a shot and my right arm when killed between the hands. After the capitulation of our troops, they became a prisoner of the British army in the house where I was to take the number of wounded that was in the house; I refused to do so, and was taken to the rear of the house; I don't make you this as a pretense, that you shall be protected in this respect by a strong guard, which shall be with you. But to my satisfaction I found they were but three or four persons left, and in the night an officer took two of them away, and in the morning the other one was sent to take them. So when the Indians came in the morning, they broke open the doors of the house, began to make scalp and plunder, then they set fire to the house, which continued the prisoners; with this I got up, put on my great coat, put up my keapsack, and went out of doors. I had not been out more than one minute, before an Indian came up to me and took the coat off my back, so another Indian told me to put my keapsack on his side; I did so. At this time major Green and captain Hart were in the yard. Then an Indian told me to take a bargain with an Indian to take me to Malden, which the Indian agreed to do for the sum of one hundred dollars. I saw the Indian put a pair of socks on Hart and put him on a horse; this was the last I saw of Hart. I then saw a man riding, who I thought was a British officer. I tried to hear, but found that he was an Indian who was addressed to general Roundhead; he had with him when I was taken up twenty men. It was at the main of the water-fall over his head, where there were two Indians scalped; they were followed to them to give us their heads. At this time we went on and a Sandy creek, about three miles from the battle ground. I saw major Graves in an Indian's sleigh; this is the last account of him that I could ascertain. I was taken to an Indian's house, where I did the morning of the 24th, and then set out to work with the Indian prisoners, who was by the name of Dawsey. The Indians tomahawked him and then stripped him. We then march to Fort Drott on the 27th of May. I stay with them seven days, they then took me into Drott (leaving a young man in the camp by the name of John Davenport) and sold me to major Blair, who commands fort Drott. I then was sent over to Sandwich, where I stayed until the 8th of February; they marched on to Fort George, and I was released on the 19th of February, 1813. The above is a true statement as far as I saw, though I saw numbers massacred that I did not know.

During my confinement with the Indians, whilst at their camps, they shewed more humanity than the British.

On the 21st day of April, 1813, I, Thomas P. Dodd, a private of captain Glave's company, of the first regiment of Kentucky volunteer militia, was in battle, fought with the British and Indian army, on the 18th and 22d of January last, at the river Raisin, and after the surrender of our army as prisoners of war, on the 22d, upon the assurance of the British officer promising protection to my wounded fellow-soldiers, and that they would send carriers for them the next day; although I had received no injury in either of the actions fought on the 18th and 22d. I voluntarily stood to assist and comfort my fellow-soldiers, John Dawson and Albert A. Ammerman, and Jesse Gannon, all of whom had received wounds by battle.

I have first examined the statement of each and sworn to by John Dawson, then to mine, and witnessed by my friend justice Thomas P. Dodd, to be truly stated, with my own knowledge. The Indians then began to speak, and I then told them that I had been in the battle of Malden, and that I had received no injury, and that I had been on a horse, and that I had spoke good enough; the British judge for us to understand the contract.

I, William Mountray, one of the commonwealth's justices of the peace for the state of Kentucky, in and for said county, do certify that the foregoing certificate of Thomas P. Dodd, was written, subscribed and sworn to before me. Given under my hand this 21st day of April, 1813.

State of Kentucky, Pendleton county, in the town of Edinburgh.
On the 21st day of April, 1813, I, Albert A. Ammerman, a private of captain Glave's company of the first regiment of Kentucky volunteer militia, being wounded in the battle of the 18th January last, at the river Raisin, by a ball in the forehead of the thigh; and from the wound of the thigh, which was so ragged for an hour and a half, was written to the battle of the 22d of the same month, and after the surrender, being not slightly wounded, proposed remaining with the rest of the prisoners, and was prevented by the order of a British officer, who said to me a guard would be left to take care of the wounded, and when a soldier would be sent for them to send them to Malden on the next morning. But to my satisfaction no guard was left, and about sunrise on the morning of the 25th, a party of Indians (three) led to the hospital, and five Indian Indians then led to the room I was being in, and could speak the English language. He was asked by one of the wounded what was to be done with the wounded. He replied they appeared to be glad that could not work, and thereby all the injured and wounded were numbered. I instantly put on my keapsack and went out of the house; my keapsack was taken off by an Indian at the door, and I went away. He conducted me to a log cabin, built by some of the Indians, on which I sat down, where I was dressed by the order of many of my fellow-wounded, assisted by the Indian and English knifemen; to finish the scene, a fire to the house, occupied by the wounded prisoners, burnt through the roof, and the flames of death put their heads out of the windows. While a section of the smoke and flames. After this bloody work was finished, I was marched off on the direction to the British camp, by an Indian, and when two Indians who had taken Hart in custody, in order to get a horse. As to my appearance, nearly to me. I suffered in my speaking English, and I had a great deal of pain in my head, and my stomach, and I was in a great deal of distress; at that time, but think it is probable that the quarrel was occasioned by some other hundred dollars when I understood captain Hart had given to some of the Indians a hundred dollars to convey him to Fort Malden. The quarrel appeared to grow very warm, so that I saw that the Indians took me at each other with their guns, as if to kill me; the drum-beat appeared to cease; they had suddenly agreed to kill captain Hart and plunder him of the rest of his money and of his watch; they did by taking one of his horses, it knocked by a blow with a rifle club, scalped and to manhandle, men's of staid him naked, taking his body on the ground. I was greater in observing that, during this scene of death, captain Hart found a French application of mercury, but appeared perfectly calm and cool. He was not fit with that dress which was his particular characteristic. No other prisoner of our army of the United States was present to witness this, as he had been seen, the death of captain Hart. During my captivity with the Indians, five days only, I was treated with more hospitality than I had any reason to expect, and more so than I expect to be treated by the British; after I was ransomed at Drott, by Mr. Benjamin Chittenden, who will ever be entitled to my utmost gratitude; by him I was humanely treated, and also by some of the French officers.

SIR—You request of me a statement of facts which are my own knowledge, concerning the number of our men after the battle and surrendered at Frenchtown.

I was one of those who was taken by the Indians on the 18th, at about one and a half miles from where the action first commenced. Just before we were taken, with the assistance of Lieutenant Chittenden, he begged to the Indians, I formed between fifteen and twenty men; I then discovered the Indians running upon us, and each side, and in front, about sixty in number, with their arms at a trail; I discovered there was no chance to repel them. I ordered the men to ground their arms, which was done; the Indians then came up and seized the arms of our men, and shot them, including the lieutenant before mentioned. I was the only one saved. I was taken and delivered up to major Elliott, a British officer. As to the number of the wounded, I know nothing of my own knowledge. Your obedient servant,
A. GARRETT.

This day lieutenant Albert Garrett, of the 17th regiment U.

infantry, came before me, and made oath that the foregoing statement is just and true to the best of his knowledge and belief. Given and subscribed by hand this 13th day of April, 1813.

J. H. MORTON, J. P.

State of Kentucky, Fayette county, ss.

I usually appeared before you, a justice of the peace for the county aforesaid, Charles Bradford, an inhabitant of the town of Lexington, state of Kentucky, who being duly sworn on the 14th of February last, deposed and said that he was in the actions at the river Nelson, on the 23d and 24th of January last, that he was wounded in the right hip and arm, and at Fremontstown after the capture of Fort Mifflin, he saw capt. Wm. Elliott, with whom he had been formerly a prisoner of war, and whom he had just personally, which would be done with the wounded prisoners? Whether they would be taken to Mifflin that evening, but a strong guard would be left to protect the prisoners and the officers might be disposed to commit. Elliott had a singular conversation with major Graves, captains Hart and Hickman, and doctors Todd and Bowser, in the presence of this deponent. He, Elliott, further stated, that he might be sent to convey the wounded to Mifflin the next morning. This deponent further says, that the British marched away; no guard was left to protect the wounded, and that captain Elliott, when asked of the persons, observed that some of the prisoners were left whose influence among the Indians was great, and that they were not to be trusted as British guards. About two or three o'clock, in the morning of the 23d of January, this deponent observed that the British were not far from the house, to which he was, and he never saw them all afterwards; that between daylight and sunrise, on the 23d, he saw a large number of Indians come to the house, they burst open the door, and in a few minutes commenced plundering the prisoners, and took away those who were unable to walk. This deponent left the house as soon as possible and went into the yard, where a number of his fellow-prisoners had assembled; he was there claimed as a prisoner by an Indian, who gave him some articles to hold whilst he plundered more. At this time he was struggling with doctor Bowser and James E. Byrde, when an Indian without any provocation, tomahawked Byrde and scalped him. Shortly after, they (the Indians) set fire to the houses in which the wounded had been quartered, and burnt them down, with the loss of those whom they had murdered. This deponent was then taken by the Indians in company with doctor Bowser, Charles Scarle, John Turner, and several others to Sandy creek; that on the way he saw a number of the prisoners who had been tomahawked; that whilst at Sandy creek, they murdered Charles Senks, Thomas S. Crow, and four or five others; that this deponent was then packed with forty or fifty pounds weight and taken to the river Henry, where the Indians had assembled; that whilst he was there he was captured by an Indian who carried him to Mifflin, and he was then given to captain Elliott. The deponent said, captain Elliott told him to take care of himself, as he always did as he requested them. This deponent was so busy with the Indians here, they took him to Detroit, where he was purchased by St. John Mack and Oliver W. Miller, for a light dragoon; that the British officer commanding at Detroit (major Munn) again claimed him as a British prisoner, notwithstanding his having just been released from their alliance, by his own countrymen, and sent him to Sandy creek, where he remained until the 14th of February, when he was sent to Fort George, where he paroled. This deponent states, that whilst a prisoner at Sandy creek, he was several times treated insultingly by the British officers, and by one John McGregor, that the citizens generally treated the prisoners with kindness and attention, as far as was in their power.

This being the first opportunity the deponent has had of expressing his gratitude to the American citizens who treated the prisoners with so much kindness and humanity at Detroit, cannot refrain from so doing. And as long as he lives, the names of M. Mrs. Mack, Miller, Sargent, Woodward, Williams, McDonald, Hunt, Mays, &c. shall never be forgotten.

SIR—I have the honor to pers. to you, by the hands of lieutenant Dudi, of the British sloop-of-war, taken at York, on the 27th of April last, your appointment as surgeon, and wish it was but a human scalp.

These articles were taken from the purshouse, by one of my officers, and pers. to me. The scalp, I caused to be preserved to general Dudi, who I believe will best be fit in his possession. I also sent, by the same good man, one of the British flags taken at Fort George, on the 27th of May.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient humble servant.

SUPPLEMENTARY.

The following letters belong to the preceding series of documents, and are inserted in the volume published by order of the house of representatives of the United States, but omitted in the National Intelligencer, from which we copied, or neglected of ourselves. They are amongst the most interesting of all the papers exhibited to shew the barbarities of the enemy. For a comment on the infernal treatment the lamented Lawrence and his brave officers and crew experienced, the reader is requested to turn to page 103, of the 4th vol. of the Register, and see the public thanks of the first and second lieutenants, the master, surgeon and purser, formerly of the Peacock, published in the New-York papers, March 27. These Englishmen say, "we ceased to consider ourselves prisoners; and every thing that friendship could dictate was adopted by you [captain Lawrence] and the officers of the Hornet, to remedy the inconvenience we should otherwise have experienced from the loss of their property, clothes, &c. which they did not suppose would have been plundered, seeing they were freely clothed and bountifully fed by the generous tars of Columbia."

Truly, the heart sickens at these detested details—but every man should read them, and tear from his heart as he would a viper that was gnawing him, every prejudice he felt in favor of this most abandoned, most cruel, most haughty, and most unprincipled nation.

WASHINGTON CITY, July 30.

From William Berry, midshipman in the frigate Chesapeake.

SIR,—I consider myself bound to lay before you what came under my knowledge while on board the Chesapeake, as well as on board the Shannon.

After the enemy had complete possession of the ship, midshipmen Randolph and Flushman were ordered from the fore and main-top. In coming from the shrouds lieutenant F. Baker (the British officer) said to his men, kill those damned rascals. Then, and immediately, several muskets were discharged at them, but without effect. My station was in the mizen-top, where I had an opportunity of seeing their actions. I was looking on deck when I saw one of the Chesapeake's men crawling along, attempting to get below with one of his legs off. One of the enemy stepped up to him with his cutlass, and immediately put an end to his existence. Lieutenant Falkner looked up in the mizen-top; pointed at me, said to his men, go up three of you and throw that damned Yankee overboard. They immediately rushed up, seizing me by the collar, now, said they, you damned Yankee, you shall swim for it, attempting to throw me overboard; but I got within the rigging, when one of them kicked me in the breast, which was the cause of my falling; being stunned by the fall, I lay some time senseless, and when I came to, I was cut over the head with a cutlass, which nearly terminated my existence. Eleven of our midshipmen were confined in a small place, nine feet by six, with an old sea lion on, and a guard at the door, until a day or two before our arrival at Halifax; and likewise eleven of us upon five rations, and some days only one meal. Our clothes were taken on board of the Shannon; lieutenant Wallis, the commanding officer on board, would not let us take our clothes below with us, but pledged his word and honor as an officer, we should receive our clothes. But we discovered next morning that their midshipmen had on our clothes and side arms. We were conversing together respecting our clothes—one of their midshipmen overheard our conversation, and made a report to the lieutenant commanding. He then sent word to us, that if we said any thing more about the clothes, he would put us in the fore-hold with the men. We expected to receive our clothes when we arrived in port, but I assure you, sir, nothing was ever restored. Other rascally things occurred, which our officers will, when they return, make known to the public, disgraceful to a civilized nation. If your request could have been made sooner, I should have felt gratified in making a fuller statement.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect,
WILLIAM BERRY.

Hon. L. Condit, Washington.

Another circum-ance took place on board which entirely escaped my memory until this moment. Several of the officers had money taken from them which they received from the Chesapeake as prize money. Mr. Highbottom, as nearly as I can recollect, had upwards of 150 dollars.

Georgetown, July 30.

Sir—Having perused a letter of yours to Berry, requesting information respecting the treatment of the American officers and seamen of the late Chesapeake, I consider myself bound, sir, to lay before you what came under my knowledge. My having been wounded and remaining on board the Chesapeake, might not give me that scope for observation which others possess; but I am sorry to say many things transpired, disgraceful to the character of a brave enemy. Whilst unloading myself in the steerage, after the Americans were driven below or had surrendered, and after resistance had ceased, I received entirely, several muskets and pistols were at once ordered down the hatchway, and discharged in the direction of the cockpit; and as the steering and cockpit were filled with wounded, in all probability some of them were killed outright. It was midshipman Hopewell, and not Livingston, who was so inhumanly treated, as described in the public prints. It has been the custom in our navy, to take the side arms of officers (prisoners) but to restore them on their leaving the ship. Ours were taken, worn, and never restored, together with what nautical instruments they could by their hands on.—When spoken to by the American officers on the subject, the answer was, such things were fore-planned. A day or two after the action, I was conversing with Lieut. Bull and Mr. Nichols, near the Coffin, respecting the engagement, when it was observed some of the Shannon's men were listening to our conversation. Immediately after, Lieutenant Foulkner, the commanding officer, ordered handcuffs to be placed at the mizzen-mast. And, said he to them, if you see any of the Chesapeake's officers abaft the mizzen-mast, cut them down; if you see them conversing together, cut them down without hesitation.

It will be remembered the three officers who obeyed this order, were all severely wounded. We received no caution and overheard it by accident. Sergeant was the rage for plunder, that captain Lawrence, before his death, could not obtain a bottle of wine from his private sea stores, without a note from the doctor to the lieutenant commanding. I pass over the robbing of the midshipmen on board the Shannon, as it did not come under my immediate notice. If your request could have been made earlier, I should have felt gratified in making a fuller statement. Yours respectfully,

W. A. WEAVER.

Hon. LEWIS CONDIT, Washington.

Having now completed the publication of the documents respecting the barbarities of the enemy, we invite the American, the man, and the Christian, to review and ponder upon them. If, in either character, he can reconcile the conduct of the British with "the rule of right," we are grossly mistaken.

In our next number, or as soon thereafter as is convenient, we propose to present a very brief epitome of the facts sustained, with reference to the pages in which they are to be found at length, for common use.

This is an apt occasion to observe, that Mr. Adair, of Troy, N. Y. has notified his intention of publishing these documents, for more general cir-ulation. It is expected they will make 200 pages; and will be sold at 87 1/2 cents in boards, or 75 cents in pamphlet form. We wish he may meet the success he deserves.

Reasons against the War!

"Because it has rent asunder, perhaps forever, nations of the same language, laws and religion; nations connected by the same bonds of affinity and community of interest; and who are tied of struggling for the overthrow of each other should be commended in a holy league to defend their liberty and religion against the most unprincipled and dangerous tyrant who was ever permitted to scourge the earth."

If the war is ordered to make us a separate people, and we hope and believe that it will—if it is to "REND ASUNDER FOREVER" the very guilty ties which have fastened us to the Empire of the East and West, who fills remotest nations with her film and destiny, all that she touches, giving substance to facts—we say, in the sincerity of our heart, so mote it be! for then shall commence a golden age, and United America regard, as she ought, every people, as "enemies in war, in peace friends," present pretensions being repudiated and sold by the benefits that will follow our deliverance from foreign predilections; disgusting in prejudice and sustained by traffic, to the continual execution of petty broils, the consequent demoralization of the citizen and disgrace of the national character. That we do not so regard Great Britain, is seen in the article before us, copied from the leading faction prior in the United States; that eulogizes (as do many others) the enemy of our country; that palliates his enormities, though of a character that would have disgraced the barbarous ages, and extols him as the "bulwark" of all that is noble, magnificent and heroic; that has no sense of national glory; no sympathy but for those who have "filled in a civilized war the tomahawk and scalping knife;" that makes a subject of laughter of women violated and children mangled, and in the configuration and plumage of decaecious towns and villages, sees nothing to condemn! We hope and trust in God that this war is destined to make the "rule" the writer lives; and to ask that it will, though peace (comes by desired) shall be proclaimed to-morrow. We have seen the enemy in his true colors, and the horrible impression his conduct has made, will never be effaced; but more than this, the arrogant pretensions that preceded the war, gave birth to an interest which the war will mature into a zeal, and that will give the conf de grace to agonizing fiction, as annexed on the wheel, and in honor beheld by the Empire and to terminate its existence. This interest is in our man of clothes; it is they that shall finish the independence of the United States. The capital immediately appertaining to this interest amounts to some hundreds of millions of dollars, and is geographically increased. Pennsylvania and New-York have more than four millions of man of clothes of which are of the most valuable breeds. The hills of Ohio are covered with them, and in all of the states an extraordinary attention is paid to multiply the stock of this most profitable animal. There are large flocks of pure Merinos, and probably millions of a mixed blood. The value of the sheep in the United States may be safely estimated at between sixty and eighty millions of dollars. As to the manufacturing establishments, we have nothing whereby to form an opinion of their value; but the capital embarked in things of the kind, great and small, is immense.—As for instance, Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania, manufactures goods to the value of more than a million per annum, and it is calculated that the accumulated capital of that town is not less than $700,000 a year, from the various fabrications. There is one concern in a neighbouring state, that disburses at the rate of seventy-five thousand dollars a year in weekly wages, to employ the work, are little more than half-finished. In Baltimore will be sold, the present year, goods to the value of $500,000, chiefly made in the neighbourhood; and more extensive works than those in operation are erecting, the greater part of which will commence manufacturing before the next spring; and thus it is in very many other places—for you can seldom open a newspaper without seeing some new establishment announced, or new article of domestic workmanship offered for sale. All these are the growth or progress of five or six years; in the early part of which our enterprising citizens suffered exceedingly for the want of workmen, as well to make the machinery as to manage it. That difficulty exists no longer. All these strike powerfully at those goods we were accustomed to receive from England—the effort will be felt abroad; and at home will COMMAND a disavowance of the “strong boxes” that have united us to foreigners, and made it extremely difficult to ascertain the real difference between an American and an Englishman, in policy and conduct. May Heaven hasten the time!—we want no “axis” with any nation—we desire “peace, commerce and honest friendship with all; entangling alliances with none,” for “it is as easy for a camel to go through the eye of a needle,” as for a republic and a monarchy to have a “COMMUNITY OF INTEREST.”

Our “LANGUAGE” is, unfortunately, the same.—Happy would it be for America if this were not so, that we might know and always mark the hostile foreigner. But as it is, we find England and Englishmen, like the “frogs” that infested Egypt, (let loose upon us, perhaps, for our sins) even in our “kneading troughs”—insinuated into the deepest recesses of domestic life, by many mediums—polluting all things with anti-American ideas, and exciting the “very stones to rise in mutiny” against the genius of our government and the law of the land.

In many respects, our “Laws” have a close resemblance, or, indeed, are the same as those of England. But in many essential qualities—qualities that designate the freeman and the slave,—they differ. We shall mention only one case, from that depends a multitude of others, naturally presenting themselves. In the United States, it is the right of the citizen to charge his rulers—in England, it is high treason to imagine a charge!

We now come to the hobby that profligate politicians have ridden to death, so far as wicked men can destroy the ordinances of GOD;—we mean our “monitions,” the cant of the b s of all ages,—Cromwell, Bonaparte and the Goelphas. It is true, we have the major part of the sects that prevail in Great Britain, (as well as in other countries) but this is all. We have no church establishment—no ecclesiastical courts—no tithe—no parsons who travel about and exact a tenth of the whole produce of the farmer, of grain, grass, fruit, garden stuffs, cattle, poultry or pigs, whether the farmer be of his church or not. No—we have nothing like this! We have no state religion; and therefore fear knives at the altar or hypocrites in our churches, speaking comparatively. But, by this noisy “religion,” perhaps, is meant the Protestant religion, in general, embracing all the sects. What has Britain done for the Protestant cause? Why, she has persecuted a large majority of her own protestant subjects, dissenting from the dogmas of her national church, with inquisitorial cruelty, and yet persecutes them—and she makes war as cheerfully against Protestants as Catholics. Her present allies are understood to be Sweden, Prussia, Austria, Portugal, Spain, Sicily and Russia—the two first are Protestant—the four next Roman Catholic, and the last of the Greek church. She has also been allied with Turkey, and the cross and the crescent were united in a “HOLY LEAGUE” to put down the religion of France!—She is at war with the United States, Denmark, Saxony, Bavaria, Westphalia, France and Naples; the four first chiefly Protestant, and the two last Catholic. But enough of this—the Spirit of Avarice with a lust for domination, is the god of the British government; at whose altar they immolate millions of human beings without remorse, not caring of what sect or persuasion they are. This is literally proved, as to many cases, by the *revenues they derive from the temples of Juggernaut, for permission to sacrifice MEN to the idol.

There cannot be a “COMMUNITY OF INTEREST,” naturally or morally, between the governments of the United States and Great Britain, for there is nothing in the one like the other, in its constitution or objects; and as to trade, her interest is to obtain a monopoly of the commerce of the world; ours, that it should be free. Every thing on which her power depends is hostile to us, and there is a “community of interest” in nothing.

But we should be connected with England “IN A HOLY LEAGUE TO DEFEND LAW, LIBERTY AND RELIGION!”—GRACIOUS Providence! of what manner of stuff are we made! A “holy league” and with England, the common robber, the man-stealer, the scalper of women and children and prisoners, the incendiary and the ravisher. A “holy league” and with England, the enemy of our fathers, and our present unprincipled foe. A “holy league” and with England, the cause of every war that has afflicted the civilized world for fifty years past, the common pest of society and plague of the earth. A “holy league” and with England, the cold-calculating assassin of thirty millions of people in India, the ferocious murderer in Delaul, the minister of famine and pestilence in America.† A “holy league” and with England, the most profligate and corrupt government in the universe, administered by the most finished villains in the world, who make a boast of bribery, laugh at fraud, and cherish all sorts of whoredoms.

* The following is from a Boston paper, being part of an essay designed to prove the justice of government Strong’s asseveration, that “England is the bulwark of the religion we profess.”

“It must however be acknowledged, that England is not very particular about her alliances in this matter. While she is at war with Saxony, Denmark, Bavaria, &c. &c. she is allied to Spain, Portugal, Russia, &c. so that France may be considered nearly as favorable to the Protestants as the English, while it must be lamented that the nations appear at present to be leaving religion out of their calculations; such has been the progress of Deism and Atheism. Still all this does not alter what England has BEEN; she HAS BEEN for ages the bulwark of the Protestant religion; for no nation ever entered more lively into the Protestant interest than SHE DID!” [True;—that she might make bishops for herself, and have a state church of her own.]

† 11,500 men, perished on board the Jersey prison-ship, lying near New York, during the war, by famine and pestilence. Nearly the same infernal cruelty is now practiced upon such Americans as are unfortunate enough to fall into their hands.

A "holy league" and with England, a government so polluted, so engendered with every abomination, that it must perish of its own action, sooner or later.—A "holy league" and with England, to "DEFEND THE LAW" as laid down in the orders in council—"LIBERTY" as enjoyed under impressment, and "RELIGION"—What religion? Christian, Jew or Turk?—of the English church, the Scotch church, the various Dissenters, the Catholic, the Greek church, Mohometan or Pagan; for England as willingly "defends," or fights against, one of these as the other. NO—"a world of ourselves" we will have no "league" with any nation, much less with one red to her arm-pits in the blood of innocence; and we say "let him be accused of all the people" that proposes, much more that attempts to effect, a "connection" with either of the governments of Europe, further than the relations of amity and commerce require.

We have went into an examination of the infamous paragraph that heads this article, because it is the sentiment of the fiction that directs the movements of a very respectable party in the United States; and honest men may look at it and turn with disgust from traitors to their God and country. There is nothing very new in the matter quoted. The arch villain Arnold proposed just such things, and talked about "law, liberty, religion," and "France," in a proclamation to the people of the United States, after he had sold himself, body and soul, and received the wages of his infamy. He has had many followers; and his desire was once nearly accomplished, as President Adams has testified to the world. Since then, a legislative body went so far as to advise that we should "like protection under the British cannon, and under the republican banner against the imperial standard." These are the workings of a real British party—and now is the time that every man who loves his country should separate himself from it. It is sheer torquism, and has no attribute that belongs to an honest man or a good citizen.

The late Illuminations.

The earnestness with which I myself pour over a file of old newspapers, to fasten upon something to shew the character and manners of the people of my country in times that have past, has induced me to record many articles to gratify the same feeling in others a little while hence.

The late splendid illuminations at Charleston and Philadelphia, the first for Perry's and the latter for Harrison's victory, being handsomely described, become, as it were, a part of the history of the manners of our time, and should be preserved to remembrance. We have also added a notice of the proceedings at New York & Richmond.

ILLUMINATION AT CHARLESTON, S. C. Oct. 5. From the "Times" of the following day.—Last night, in conformity to the recommendation of the Intendant and Wardens, this city was most splendidly illuminated, in honor of the late glorious victory obtained over the enemy's fleet on lake Erie, by the gallant commodore PERRY. On this occasion some very elegant and appropriate transparencies were exhibited, with suitable devices and patriotic mottoes.—Among the most conspicuous were those exhibited at the houses of major Geddes, J. B. White, Esq. and John Everingham, Esq. Major Geddes' was a large transparency, executed with great taste and happiness of design, describing the action on Erie, just at the critical and important moment that commodore Perry was passing in his boat from his own crippled vessel, the Lawrence, which had borne the fire of the whole British force for two hours, and was no longer able to fire a gun, to being into close action the Niagara, which had suffered but little; and in which he achieved a victory unparalleled in naval history: on the upper part of the picture was inscribed, "The Almighty has granted another glorious victory:" on the left over the prostrate symbols of royalty, was the motto, "LIBERTY TRUMPHANT."

Mr. White's were five in number—we will endeavor, in a few words, to give a description of them: The centre transparency, which first attracted the attention, describes the deeply interesting period when Perry, the intrepid hero of the lake, swept through the line of the enemy, spreading destruction among their shipping, (thus, in fact, forming a continuation of major Geddes's piece, and completing the history of the action;) just above this soared the American Eagle, grasping a trident, which he poised over the scene, to be disposed of according as the event of the conflict may determine, which he seemed to be watching over with parental fondness. The all-seeing eye of fate overlooked the whole, scattering the rays of truth in all directions. At the base, the appropriate words of PERRY'S communication—"IT BATH PLEASED THE ALMIGHTY."

In the west window—The genius of America, in bold and brilliant colors, trampling a lion under her feet. Motto, "Crush the monster."

In the east window—A female figure, representing industry, and plenty, scattering her fruits. Motto, "penury shall abound."

In the windows of the upper story were two cherubs, wrapt in light clouds, supporting escutcheons, with the names of Lawrence, Ludlow, Burrows, and Sigourney. Motto—

"There's a sweet little Cherub that sits up aloft,
To take care of the life of poor Jack."

Mr. Everingham's transparency (which we understand was executed by Mr. Wightman, jun.) was highly appropriate; we will attempt to describe it:

On the right, a marble monument erected on a rock, on the base, "Departed heroes"—on the top, an urn, from which was suspended by a wreath of laurels, the names of Lawrence, Ludlow and Burrows—over the monument, an eagle, in her talons the shield of hope with an anchor—also, a trumpet; and in her bill the motto, "Free trade and sailor's rights." On the left, a naval column, rising from the ocean, with the names of "Rodgers, Decatur, Hull, Bainbridge, Jones, Chauncey and Power," entwined around it with laurels; on the top of which a bust of Perry, over which was an eagle, in the act of crowning the bust with a wreath of laurel—with the motto in her bill, of "Don't give up the ship." Between the monument and column, a view of the early part of the action on lake Erie, in which the Lawrence is seen in close combat with the Detroit, and the sloop Tripple coming round the naval column—above the naval engagement, is a likeness of Washington in a star, over which was Fame approaching the monument, and looking towards the bust of Perry sounding her trumpet.

The effect of these several pieces was very great, and attracted a vast concourse of people to the respective places; so much so, that a passage through the crowd was effected with difficulty.

The orphan-house made a brilliant appearance, from its extensive size, and the great number of windows which were liberally and tastefully lit up. The exchange, the banks, and other public buildings, attracted much attention. In the exchange, a superb band of music played during the evening.—We believe that the illumination of last night exceeded in brilliancy, that of March last; though much of its effect was lost by the brightness of the moon.

It is highly honorable to the city, that the greatest order and decorum was observed in the streets, though exceedingly crowded. At the appointed hour, 9 o'clock, the illumination ceased, and the inhabitants retired quietly and peaceably to their respective homes.

AT PHILADELPHIA.

Agreeably to permission granted by the mayor, the capture of general Proctor's army by the United States army under general Harrison, was celebrated in this city on the evening of the 21st Oct. by a balloon illumination—the suburbs also exhibited their usual degree of patriotic feeling, and even the town of Camden (opposite) was lit up.

The mass processions in different parts of the city were so numerous, that it would be a vain task to attempt a particular description of them—we shall therefore notice a few only, without any design however, to disparage others.

The most conspicuous we saw, were those of the house of Jacob G. Koch, corner of Ninth and Market streets—the Market street front presented five different transparencies, in front of as many large windows.

The basement story presented two: the western window contained a shaft of a fluted Doric column, round which was a scroll containing a phrase from general Harrison's official letter—"It has pleased Providence;" on the summit of the shaft was a bust, with a scroll above, inscribed "Harrison."

On the window adjacent was a similar shaft, with a scroll containing the sentence from com. Perry's letter—"It has pleased the Almighty;" and on the summit a bust presented by the scroll, inscribed "Perry."

On the middle story, west window, was a female figure, large as life, with the American shield, die stripes in the lower field, and the stars on a blue ground in the upper; beneath the feet of the figure, which represented America, was a lion crouching, with the foot of a figure on its neck; from the mouth of the figure issued a label inscribed "Virtue, Liberty, Independence?"

On the east window was a representation of an American general officer, and two Indian chiefs at his feet; the glittering tomahawk and scalping knife were on the ground; and from the mouth of one of the Indians issued a label with the words "Accept our submission."

In the attic window was a naval trophy; the ground work the American flag, over which appeared in relief, a peasant inscribed "Free trade and sailor's rights."

The west part of Mr. Kotch's house in Ninth street, was illuminated and decorated in another but elegant style: the numerous windows exhibited wax lights tastefully interspersed with bouquets and flower vases of a great variety of kinds, and wreaths, festoons, and garlands of laurel, myrtle, oak, palm and grape leaves.

The front of the house of Mr. Mills, architect, in George street, between Eight and Ninth, was beautifully illuminated; in the front there was a large transparency of military action, the flight of the enemy and the pursuit, in a very beautiful style.

At the corner of Eight and Race streets was erected a triumphal arch of about 40 feet elevation and diameter, illuminated; and bearing a portrait and emblems commemorative of the glorious events.

At the corner of Third and Chesnut, there was a very elegant transparency: a portrait of a general officer at full length, with military apparatus—this transparency was very well executed.

The theatre presented a variety of transparencies and an illumination of coloured lamps; the effect was beautiful; but only one transparency was new, the rest were from the painter's loft.

In several houses we could perceive transparencies of ships, and mottos, all significant of that event.

At the adjutant-general's office the British flag, on which was written in large characters "taken at Erie." The immense crowd which was collected to see the British flag "taken at Erie" is inconceivable; several bands of music and companies of ladies visited this spectacle so exhilarating.

It was observed by a lady in the group, "that a victory, like Perry's which gave security and repose to 200,000 families, who had a week before never went to sleep with the certainty of escaping conflagration or the tomahawk until morning, was a true occasion for rejoicing."

A tradesman's house between Third and Fourth, in Market street, displayed at every window a series of shields in transparent colors, on each of which was inscribed the names of some of our gallant countrymen—amongst whom were Pike, King, Christie, Woods, Croghan, Johnson-Rogers, Decatur, Hull, Lawrence, Perry, Jones, Bainbridge, Chauncey, Burroughs, Allen, Moffat, Wooster, Elliot.

Mr. Murray, engraver, had an exquisite transparency. And there were several which we should have wished to have staid and seen, but the current of beauty which swam along the streets, left little opportunity to dwell for any sufficient time on the transparencies generally.

The town at 10 o'clock, displayed a scene of silence and tranquility, such as no city or country in the universe could shew the like; it was not the sullen command of despotism or the agonizing confire, that made slaves retire to darkness and sorrow; but a free and happy people, elated by the glory and safety of their country, and the achievements of their gallant defenders, entering with the ardor of heroic virtue into the celebration of their happiness, and vindicating their claim to the eternal enjoyment of their liberties and right, by a reverence for social order. Philadelphia, at half an hour after exhibiting the streets crowded with beauty, in numbers equal at least to any city of the world, was as quiet and undisturbed by the footsteps of the passenger, as the priories of Louisiana—it was an exquisite sensation to view at half past nine o'clock, the gay, giddy, cheerful, happy, innocent crowd, pressing without rudeness or ill nature along the well paved footways—in an hour all disappeared—the windows, which were illuminated with joy, had discharged their tribute to public gladness—they were now dedicated to silence and repose—the streets presented their accustomed appearance, and the lamps seemed reluctant to show the passenger his way, jealous of the blaze that had consecrated their usefulness the preceding part of the evening. Aurora.

AT NEW-YORK.

On Saturday evening, October 23, pursuant to a resolution of the common council, the City Hall was illuminated in honor of the recent successes of the American arms in Upper Canada. That magnificent structure, by far the most splendid pile of architecture in America, and not exceeded by many in Europe, was lighted throughout its spacious front, (comprising upwards of fifty windows and divisions in the portico) to the tower or cupola on the centre, as well as in its extensive wings, containing about thirty windows. The transparent naval paintings used at the former celebrations in the city hotel were here displayed, with the addition of the dying injunction of the gallant Lawrence, "don't give up the ship."

Pammy Hall next claimed the attention of the thousands of admiring spectators. Over the principal entrance of this building was exhibited a well-executed emblematic transparency, painted by Mr. Holland, representing the Indian chiefs surrendering to general Harrison, soliciting peace, and delivering their women and children as hostages, with a view of the battle of Lake Erie, and Commodore Perry leaving his ship for the Niagara.

The Theatre presented a transparent painting, exhibiting the American eagle spreading over a considerable portion of the globe, and pointing with its beak to the motto from Perry's immortal despatch, "We have met the enemy, and they are ours." The front of this massy edifice was ornamented with variegated lamps.

The Naval Panorama, next adjoining, exhibited a mechanical transparency, representing, in continual and rapid motion, a Donnet striking a Peacock in its breast, with other figures and suitable devices and inscriptions.

At the Debtor's Prison, in letters of fire, appeared "We have met the enemy, &c." Go ye and do likewise.

Washington and Mechanics' Halls were illuminated. The custom-house also, and the different hotels, public houses, and markets, joined in the brilliant and gratifying display.

From the battery was seen two of Commodore Lewis's gun-boats, superbly decorated with lamps of various colors. The Commodore's barge was ornamented with patriotic transparencies, and in the course of the evening, a discharge of rockets from his boat enlivened the scene. [Columbian.]

AT RICHMOND

The illumination took place by recommendation of the mayor as follows—

FELLOW CITIZENS—Again "BY BLESSING OF PROVIDENCE," WE ARE VICTORIOUS. The complete victory obtained over the combined Latin and British forces, under the command of general Proctor, who has himself doubtless ere this graced the triumph of our most gallant general Harrison, will give us entire possession of the Canadas; and operate more powerfully to the restoration of peace, than the mediation of any power on earth. Give vent to your feelings; think of Perry who paved the way, of Harrison, whose intrepid valor has thus so nobly achieved the victory. Let an illumination generally take place throughout our city on the evening of tomorrow, under this restriction only; that by ten of the evening, they be all extinguished—the safety of our city requires, that I should urge this precaution—when it is most ardently wished, that every citizen will retire with grateful hearts to their respective abodes.

Doubtless every patriotic sentiment will lead our citizens to concur in this recommendation. But let the houses of absentees, of orphans, &c. which may not be lighted on this memorable occasion, be respected.

Mayor's office,

Sunday evening, 10 P. M.

ROBERT GREENHOW, Mayor.

The following account of it is from the "Virginia Patriot," a "federal" paper:—

The illumination, in this city, on Monday evening last, was by far the most splendid we have ever witnessed, and in every respect suited to the occasion. Before the sable clouds of night had enveloped the city in darkness, the illumination commenced, and the names of "Perry, Harrison, and Chauncey," soon shone with distinguished lustre in every quarter. Every thing like base, sordid avarice yielded to the finer feelings of patriotism; and with few exceptions, a just sensibility pervaded every bosom. Many transparent and appropriate paintings presented themselves to the view; but it would be invidious to notice the exertions of any particular individual, where all performed their duty. To crown the climax, and give a zest to joy, the ladies of Richmond, were seen descending in lovely groups from Shocke Hill to the main street, there to ornament and embellish the scene. The most perfect harmony and good order prevailed; and the ladies remained about in full security, free and undisturbed: In short, but one sentiment seemed to exist: the sunshine of joy and exultation illuminated every countenance, and none was found

"So lost to virtue, lost to manly thought," as to dare interrupt this delightful banquet of the mind, by the least improper conduct. To be sure, the civil authority, much to their credit, took every necessary step to prevent disorderly behaviour; but we rejoice to say, sensual pleasures were forgotten, while the names of "Perry, Harrison and Chauncey," dwelt on every tongue. At nine, the streets were generally clear of the crowd, and at ten o'clock, agreeably to the mayor's request, every light was extinguished.

Commodore Chauncey.

FROM THE NATIONAL ADVOCATE.

As this gallant and able officer has been subject to much criticism and some obloquy, we deem it but justice to give the following rapid and concise sketch, by which the importance of his services may be in some degree estimated.

On the 6th October, 1812, Commodore Chauncey arrived at Sackett's Harbor as commander of the United States' naval forces on the lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron, Michigan, &c. at which time the only vessel owned by the United States on the waters was the brig Onondaga. He immediately purchased all the merchant vessels, and fitted them as gun-boats, and on the 8th of November sailed in pursuit of the enemy with the Onondaga and six schooners, and having fallen in with the Royal George on the 9th, chased her into the bay of Quinte. In the night he lost sight of her, and the next day chased her into Kingston, and engaged her and the batteries for an hour and a half, and he was obliged to haul off by the violence of the wind. On the 12th he chased the Earl Moira into Kingston, and captured the transport sloop Elizabeth with captain Brock of the 49th British regiment, which was under convoy of the Earl Moira. On the 10th, he took off Kingston, the schooners Jane and Mary Hart, the former of which was burnt. The enemy were kept blockaded in Kingston until the 7th December, at which time Com. Chauncey returned into Sackett's Harbor, being no longer able to keep the lake on account of the ice. On the 26th of November, the ship Madison was launched, having been built in 45 working days. He then proceeded to Erie, and purchased all the private vessels on that lake, and made preparations for building two sloops of war. From thence he came to this city, made contracts for building on both lakes, and sent on the carpenters and other mechanics necessary for that purpose to Erie.

On the ninth of April, the keel of the General Pike was laid, and she was launched on the 12th June; during which time the Commodore had also sent carpenters to Black Rock, who fitted out and repaired five vessels at that place, which were sent to Erie. The General Pike sailed in 100 days from the time her keel was laid. On the 27th April our squadron captured at York the brig Duke of Gloucester and 20 boats, and destroyed a ship on the stocks which was intended to mount 23 guns, and carried away an immense quantity of shot, shells and other munitions of war. In June they also captured the transport schooner Lady Murray, laden with provisions and munitions of war, and several soldiers of the 8th British regiment.

When commodore Chauncey assumed this command, a year since, the enemy's force upon Lake Ontario consisted of six vessels, mounting 80 guns; upon Lake Erie five vessels, mounting 50 guns.—The guns, munitions, and every article for the armament and fitting our vessels, were transported from the city of Philadelphia, as well as the officers, seamen and marines.

Mark the result! On Erie the enemy's squadron has been all captured by an officer selected by commodore Chauncey. On Lake Ontario, he has recaptured the two vessels which were taken by the rashness of their commanding officers, and captured a flotilla of the enemy's transports with a large body of troops on board, and conveyed our troops from fort George to Sackett's Harbor, besides what we have before stated. He has endeavored by every means in his power to bring his vaporing adversary to battle—but the latter as constantly evaded the contest, which he has been enabled to decline by his vessels sailing better in squadron.

From a Baltimore paper of July 16, 1807.

A very short time since, capt. Chauncey returned from a voyage to the East Indies, which, under a furlough he had made as a private citizen. On the passage home in the Indian Ocean he was brought to by a British ship of war of 64 guns, and a lieutenant and 10 or 12 men sent on board his ship. The British officer, an impertinent puppy, without even saluting capt. C. as a person having any pretensions to gentility would have done, immediately ordered one of his men to stand by the helm. Capt. C. justly offended, told his sailor to knock any man down who attempted to take his place without his (Chauncey's) orders. The attempt was made, and the English sailor, by prostration, paid his tribute of veneration to the nerve of the yankee. The lieutenant rapped out as many handsome oaths and threats as a person could wish, and advanced to take the helm himself.—Chauncey stepped before him, and upon the Englishman's laying his hand upon it, seized him by the scruff of the neck and threw him overboard into the boat. Upon this the lieutenant and his men went off, and capt. C. was presently boarded by 60 or 70 men, among them the first officer of his majesty's ship, who abused capt. C. in words not a little, for his treatment to the lieutenant; who replied, I treated the puppy as he deserved. He either did not know his duty and the manners of a gentleman, or would not exercise them. You have now a superior force on board the ship—do what you please. Capt. C. then went on board the man of war, where he received some more compliments from the commodore, to which he replied in the same manner; without giving way one inch to that haughty spirit which characterises too many of the officers of the British navy. This spirit probably preserved him from the effects of their violence, and he was dismissed as the d—dest obstinate yankee rascal they had ever met with, without their knowing him as any thing else than the master of a common East Indiaman.

Previous to leaving the British ship, capt. C. very leisurely took a memorandum of the officer's names who had insulted him, saying, "perhaps I may come athwart you some day, when you shall know who and what I am."

Commodore Oliver Hazard Perry,

Who by his late brilliant achievement on Lake Erie, has secured to himself the proudest niche in the temple of Fame, is the eldest son of Captain Stephen Raymond Perry, esquire, formerly of Newport, Rhode-Island, but for some months past a resident of this town. He commenced his naval career about the year 1793, as a midshipman, and served in that capacity a considerable time on board the General Greene, of 32 guns, commanded by his father, and employed principally on the Havana station. On the reduction of the navy in 1801, many officers were thrown out of the service; but young PERRY, notwithstanding the comparative inactivity of peaceful times, perseveringly continued in the profession he had chosen, passing through the various grades of promotion until we find him in the winter of 1810-11, lieutenant and commander of the Revenge schooner, attached to commodore Rodgers' squadron, which wintered that season at New-London. Here he was continually under the eye of that able and accomplished officer, and received from him a full share of that confidence which he so eminently merited. A misfortune, however, overtook him while on this station. The Revenge, in returning from Newport to New-London, in thick weather, struck on Watch-hill reef, and went to pieces; but the crew were all saved, with most of her armament. As is usual on such occasions, a court of inquiry was instituted to investigate lieutenant Perry's conduct in that affair, and the result was a most honorable acquittal.

Lieutenant Perry was afterwards invested with the command of the United States' flotilla at Newport, where he continued until some months after the breaking out of the present war, when he was appointed, with the rank of master and commander, to the command of the naval forces on Lake Erie, which at that time consisted of a very few small vessels only. And here his astonishing assiduity and unconquerable perseverance shone forth with a splendor which fairly augured a brilliant result to all his complicated labors in the building and equipment of a force sufficient to cope with that of the enemy. Every nerve was strained for the purpose, artificers and sailors were sent from the Atlantic states, and we at length behold him sally forth to victory and to glory.

The importance of the late victory is immense, and the public joy on the occasion has been completely and unequivocally manifested by the sound of artillery, the chiming of bells, and brilliant illuminations from one extremity of the country to the other.

Commodore Perry has three brothers also in the navy, two of whom are lieutenants on board the President; and the other, the youngest, about thirteen years of age, was on board the Lawrence, serving as a midshipman in the late glorious battle, and was the only one of that class of officers who was not either killed or wounded! It seems, in fact, almost a miracle that in the midst of such horrible carnage, when so many gallant fellows took their way to the "world of spirits," both the brothers should escape unhurt.

Commodore Perry is now but little more than twenty-eight years of age, having been born in August, 1785. [Norwich Courier.]

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

There is now great sensibility in the fiction prints about the employment of the Indians against those who placed the tomahawk in their hands.—Debased creatures, that never published one line of remark on the murders they committed on their own fellow-citizens; but concealed their cruelties or made a savage jest of them.

Citizens of Harrison. The following general order, issued on the day of the debarkation of our troops into Canada, is one of the "unkindest cuts" the "halmark of our religion" ever received, if there remains one particle of shame in her system:

Head-Quarters on board the Ariel,
September 27, 1813.

GENERAL ORDER.

The general intreats his brave troops to remember that they are the sons of sires whose fame is immortal: That they are to fight for the rights of their insulted country, whilst their opponents combat for the unjust pretensions of a master.

EXERCITIANS—remember the river Raisin; but remember it only whilst the victory is suspended.—The revenge of a soldier cannot be gratified upon a fallen enemy.

B. command,
ROBERT BUTLER, A. Adj. General.

General Harrison (says the Democratic Press) has added a new manoeuvre to the science of military tactics—the charging bayonet on horse back; which may afford some ingenious Englishman an opportunity of discovering a method of counteracting it, just as captain Manby has explained to the enlightened John Bull the American secret of conquering at sea.

"General Harrison's detailed letter (says the Richmond Enquirer) tells us every thing that we wish to know about the officers except himself. He does justice to every one, but to Harrison—and the world must, therefore, do justice to the man who was too modest to be just to himself. We ask what heart is there that does not bow with gratitude to the gallantry of Shelby, who has shone in two wars, and of Perry, who conquers on both elements."

A British major.—The following gasconading notice was sent out to Judge Moore, of Champlain, by Major Perreault, who commands about sixty Canadians and Indians at Orléans. A few nights previous to the promulgation of this petty mandate, our militia had attacked a picket near the lines, which so excited the ire of the British major, that he issued, without delay, the following "humane advertisement."

"La GAZETTE, 10th October.

Citizens of Champlain!—I am happy that humanity should still have so much power over me so as to inform you that should any of the militia of Champlain, be found hovering this side of the line, I will let loose upon your village and inhabitants, the Canadian and Indian force under my command. You are probably aware that it has been with the greatest difficulty I have till now withheld them. But your cowardly attack at midnight, of a small picket of ours, has torn asunder the veil which hid you from them.—So beware!

J. PERREAULT, major commanding ad post.

"P. S. Major Perreault would be obliged to the honorable Judge Moore, to acquaint the citizens of Champlain of the tenor of the above humane advertisement.

The Salem Gazette of the 23d instant, thus announces Harrison's victory—

"At length the handful of British troops, which for more than a year had baffled the numerous armies of the United States, in the invasion of Canada, deprived of the genius of the immortal Brock, have been obliged to yield to superior power and numbers."

The Boston Daily Messenger, of the 23d, on the same subject, says—

"We shall surrender all our conquests at a peace.

It is indeed a hopeful exploit for Harrison, with five thousand troops, who have been assembling and preparing ever since July, 1812, to fight and conquer four hundred and fifty worn out, exhausted British regulars, whom the Indians had previously deserted.

"Does this wipe away the disgrace of the surrender of Hull, of 2000 to 1400—or of Winchester's defeat, or of Clay's destruction?"

A late London paper says—"On the passage of the Frolic, captain Mitchell, to Portsmouth, from the Downs, she made her number to the Niobe, captain Montague, which ship is in attendance to H. R. H. the duke of Clarence, at Brighton. As soon as his royal highness understood it was the Frolic which had been captured by the American sloop of war Wasp, he expressed a wish to go on board of her, which he did in two hours afterwards, and held a levee. The officers were introduced to his royal highness, and complimented on the native gallantry they had displayed."

[Now what would "his royal highness" have said, if the Frolic had taken the Wasp?]

From the London Sun of August 13.—In our last page we have given some curious extracts from the American papers. American honor is as distinguished on land by the service of officers on parole, not to serve, as her courage is conspicuous on the seas by her largest frigates running away from the British smallest, mistaking them (fear is a great magnifier of objects) in the mist for *seventy-seven*s.

"The capture of the Argus is the second lesson of inferiority. The Yankees said they wanted a fair besides the Chesapeake. Why don't they come fairly to the task? They would soon have knowledge beaten into them."

"Blame let thy trumpet sound,
"Till all the world around"

That a British sloop of war captured an American brig, after almost an hour's hard fighting.]

It appears the British are now building ninety-six vessels; to carry in the whole, according to rate, 4048 guns—eight of them are first rates—fourteen 74's, six 50's, twenty-five frigates, &c.

Among the prisoners on board the ship Detroit, captured on Eric, were two Indians who had been placed in the tops at the beginning of the action, but skulked below on the first broadside from the Lawrence. Commodore Perry asked one of them, who could speak a little English, what he had been placed there for—he replied "to shoot Yankees."

CAPTAIN ALLEN, Lieut of the U. S. brig Argus.—The following is from an Irish newspaper. From the amiable character of the deceased, as well as from the distinguished humanity that has marked the whole proceedings of our seamen, we cannot do but the literal truth of the fact. How unlike the conduct of the enemy, for whom many in the United States claim every ennobling quality, and contend that the good actions of our people are mere copies of British magnanimity! Where shall we find any thing like this? Aristides and Bhimadmi!—The officers of the United States' sloop of war Wasp, captured by the Porpoises, were rifled of every thing—those of the Chesapeake were compelled to attend the funeral of their late commander in the very clothes they fought in, having no change of raiment left them; and the dying Lawrence hardly got a drop of the wine that had belonged to his private store, to cherish expiring nature! Chelburn, an admiral, a very thick-skulled dunder on the shores of the Chesapeake that a plunderer of the Porpoises would have thou, lie beneath him. In the whole of our acquaintance with the enemy, we have found but two officers worthy of comparison with our common officersmen; they are Sir Thomas Hardy, of the 24 families, and captain Byron, of the Belvidere. We mention them with pleasure; for they stand like Lots in horrid Soloni, to intercede for a race of masters. See page 142.

"It would be injustice not to notice the excellent conduct of captain Allen, of the Argus. He allowed the passengers and crews of the Betsy and Mariner to remove every article of their private property; and in order that they might have liberty to do so, he would not suffer one of his officers or crew to be present below whilst they were employed in packing up their effects. Captain Gilbert, of the Marnier, had left some articles of cabin furniture behind, which captain Allen sent after him in his boat. A great coat, belonging to an officer of one of the captured ships, was missing, and it was found in the possession of one of the crew of the Argus. Captain Allen immediately ordered the man to be tied up, and he actually received a severe flogging. Considerable sums in specie were saved by the passengers, as captain Allen would not allow his men to touch a single article."

The greater part of the British vessels of war lately at Halifax, have left that port, destination unknown—supposed for the Cheapeake.

MILITARY.

No certain accounts of the movement of the northern army under Wilkinson, has yet reached us. We have a report that the whole force sailed from Sackett's Harbor on the 13th inst. Destination unknown.

We have nothing important from the Creek country; but from the arrangements made, we expect immediately to hear that the British allies in that quarter, who formed a "holy league" to murder and destroy, are also on their "beam ends."

From a statement made in the Kentucky Gazette of the 12th inst., it appears that that state has sent to the frontiers since the declaration of war, no less than seventeen thousand, three hundred and seventy-five men! What an exertion for a country that twenty or thirty years ago was a wilderness!—Kentucky has lost many of her choicest sons in this conflict, but her zeal and courage is unabated. She has now at least 7000 men in the service—in Canada or on its frontier.

On the 20th inst. the troops under gen. Hampton, then at the "Four corners Chataugee," drew six days provisions, and were on the eve of a march.

The 1st and 3rd regiments of Vermont militia, stationed at Burlington, were reviewed by brig. gen. Parker on the 15th, who dismissed all the next day except those that had volunteered to enter the enemy's country.

The Burlington paper tells us that Hampton has in custody several curious persons, who had been lurking about his army.

"From private letters received in this city (says the National Intelligencer of the 28th) from the north, we learn that gen. Wilkinson has been very ill at fort George. He moved with the troops from that place to Sackett's Harbor, and, at the last dates from the latter place, was still indisposed, but not so much so as to prevent his commanding the contemplated expedition—which has been much delayed by circumstances that no human ingenuity could prevent. If commodore Chauncey could have succeeded in destroying the British fleet, as was expected, our work would have been easy. No fault is attributable to him—he has done all that could be done, as his antagonist had the heels of him, and always availed himself of the advantage his superior sailing afforded him. We must soon expect something interesting from that quarter."

Extract from a late Montreal paper.

"His royal highness the prince regent, in the name and on behalf of his majesty, has been pleased to appoint the following officers to take the rank by brevet, as undermentioned:—

To be major-generals.—Colonels Duncan Derrick, John Vincent, 4th regiment; Robert Lebridge, infantry field officer; Henry Proctor, 41st; A. Holkett, 10th; L. De Watteville.

To be colonels.—Lieutenant-colonels W. Douglass, 98th regiment; H. Scott, 103d regiment; J. B. St. George, infantry field officer; J. Menron."

Copy of a letter from brigadier-general Parker to the Secretary at war, dated

BURLINGTON, October 19, 1813.

SIR—I have the honor to enclose you a communication from colonel Isaac Clarke, dated the 15th inst.

The expedition appears to have been well concerted and happily executed, for which the colonel deserves great credit.

On our part none were killed, and only two wounded, neither of them dangerously.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS PARKER,

Brigadier-general commanding.

The hon. John Armstrong,

Secretary of war.

Extract of a letter from colonel Clerk to brigadier-general Parker, dated Camp Shazy-landing, Oct. 15, 1813.

It is with great pleasure I can inform you of a successful attack upon the enemy at Messquoi bay on the morning of the 12th inst. (after detailing his approach to the enemy which evinces an excellent knowledge of the country, the colonel states :) At this time I had only the riflemen with me, the artillery moving slow and the militia protecting their rear. We proceeded to the village (Messquoi) and arrived within fifteen rods of the enemy before we were discovered. We found them draw up under major Powell in a manner that would have annoyed us much had we attacked them by water, but wholly unprepared to defend themselves on the land side; they commenced a fire on the left flank, but in ten minutes after the first attack they hid down their arms and surrendered themselves prisoners of war.

Understanding that a force of 200 men under col. Lock was marching to attack us, I dispatched capt. Finch with his company to reconnoitre them and ascertain their course. He proceeded with such promptness and ability as to surprise and capture the advanced guard, consisting of cavalry, excepting one man who escaped, and, giving the information, the enemy retreated.

The prisoners were then put on board our boats and sent to Burlington.

Our whole force engaged was one hundred and two—the number of prisoners taken is one hundred and one, their killed nine and wounded fourteen.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

ISAAC CLARK.

Brig. Gen. Parker,

commanding at Burlington, &c.

BEAUFORT, October 19.

Extract from a letter, dated Fort George, October 17.

"On the 11th inst. we marched out with a force of eleven hundred, inclusive of Indians to see what had become of the gallant Vincennes. But we found that he had absconded precipitately, burning all the public property he could reach. From the best information there can be no doubt but that the appearance of the militia, who were supposed by the enemy to amount to 5000 men, and the employment of the Indians, struck terror to their souls and caused their retreat. We marched to the Twelve Mile Creek, and were pursuing the rear guard of the enemy, who were about two hundred strong at the For- ty, with baggage and sick. But the movements of col. Scott, who gave us notice that he was about to quit this fort, compelled gen. McClure very reluctantly to give up the pursuit. We took a circuit through the country to Chippewa, and thence to this place. We have collected immense quantities of public stores—perhaps 1000 barrels of flour, 3 or 400 stand of arms, 500 hides, tallow, bread, hats, &c. The conduct of the Indians ought to silence the British pretext of not being able to restrain them. The address of gen. McClure is a sufficient comment on their conduct. We have a party now out. Col. Chapin is with them. We look for news from them every moment."

The 23d infantry and all the light artillery, have left fort George and taken up their line of march for the eastward on Thursday last, col. W. Scott accompanied them; but we do not learn that gen. M. Porter has left fort Niagara.

We learn that col. Grove, with the 7th regt. of state artillery, is on his march for the frontier.

NAVAL.

The enemy has again appeared in Long Island sound, and took or burnt a few small vessels. Commodore Lewis, with his flotilla of gun boats, left New-York to repel them on the 21st inst.

We have nothing interesting as to the blockades of New-Zealand or the Chesapeake, except every reason to believe that a fleet of Baltimore privateers and letters of marque got safely to sea some days ago. The enemy will soon hear of them and feel them. Among them are some of the best vessels of their class, in the world, strongly manned with as brave men as are brought down the bloody flag of England.

By a letter from Gloucester, C. H. Va. it appears that all the vessels were in or out on the 23d instant; three of them were in the neighborhood of that place. A regiment of militia with a proportion of cavalry and artillery, had been called out to assist them if necessary; they wait for a gale of wind.

OF CAPTAIN PORTER, who left the Dorset twelve months ago, we have the following account, communicated to the editor of the Democratic Press, in an extract of a letter from Boston, dated October 31—It is what the printers call "round about," but may be true:

"A gentleman died with me yesterday, who is of Norfolk, his name Barke, he had just arrived from Havana. He informed me that in the middle of August last, he was in Jamaica, where were three or four gentlemen, masters of vessels, who had been captured by captain Porter of the frigate Essex, and carried, ships and cargoes, into Lima. When they had been liberated they travelled on mules across the southern continent to Porto Bello, on their way to England. They had been commanders of South Sea ships, engaged in the whale fishery, &c. Captain Porter was in fine health, as was all his ship's company. The frigate and crew in excellent order. He had with him an excellent man of war brig which he had taken and offered, and manned her by new enlistments, and kept her in company for cruising. She was a very fine vessel. He got at Lima all supplies. He heard, as those English masters expressed it, "gotten a many vessels, and had much property on board." He was endeavoring the sale of the captured ships, but, was not permitted, it was, however, expected he would accomplish it."

Two elegant galleys were launched at Fort George, Lake Champlain, on the 5th instant. On the next day, two long 18 pounders were mounted upon them, and they proceeded directly after to the foot of the lake under the command of commodore McDonough.

Copy of a letter from commodore Chaucey to the secretary of the navy, dated Catlet Sea of ship General Pike,

Sackett's Harbor, 8th Oct. 1813.

Sir,—As soon as the last of the Flotilla with the troops cleared the Niagara, I proceeded in quest of the enemy. On the 2d instant, at 10 A. M. discovered him steering a course for Niagara with studding-sails and all sails set, wind from the south and westward; we made all sail in chase, but as soon as we shot out from the land so that he could fairly make us out, he took in studding-sails and hauled upon a wind to the westward and made all sail from us; the wind being light all day we made but little progress against the current, and at sun-down the enemy was off Twenty Mile Creek and had evidently gained considerably from us. During the night the wind continued so light that we altered our position but very little, and at day light on the 3d saw the enemy at anchor close in the strand between Twelve and Twenty mile creek; as soon as he saw us he weighed and made all sail to the westward, wind from south to south-west and squally. I made all sail in chase, and continued the chase the whole day, it blowing very heavy in squalls; at sun-down we could barely make him out from the mast-head when he appeared nearly up to the head of the lake; it continued squally with rain and the night very dark; at day light on the 4th could see nothing of the enemy—continued working up for the head of the lake; towards mere him it became calm, I ordered the Lady of the Lake to sweep up to Burlington Bay and ascertain whether the fleet was there—at half past 9 P. M. she returned with information that the fleet was not there. Saw but two gun-boats. It struck me at once that he had availed himself of the darkness of the preceding night and had either run for Kingston or down the lake for the purpose of intercepting the flotilla with the army. I therefore made all sail and shaped my course for the Ducks, with a view of intercepting him or his prizes if he should have made any. The wind increased to a strong gale from the northward and westward and continued during the whole day on the 5th, we then fired in de a great run, for at 1 P. M. we passed Long Point; at 3 discovered seven sail in the Fake Ducks; presuming them to be another fleet made sail in chase; at 4 made them out to be ships and schooners. I made the signal for the Sybil and the Lady of the Lake to cast off their tow, and close N. W. soon after perceiving the enemy operating on different tacks, I cast off the Governor Tompkins from this ship, gave the squadron in charge of captain Crane and made all sail in chase; at 5 the enemy finding us to gain rise upon him, and one of his privateers sailing much worse than the rest, he took the people out and set her on fire. At sun-down, when opposite the Real Ducks, the Hannibal, (late Grovel's Confidence) (100 tons) and Mary Ann, struck to us. The Sybil soon after brought down the Dumont, or a rigged. The Lady Gore ran into the Ducks, but the Sybil (which was not to watch her) took possession of her early the next morning. The Enterprise, a small schooner, is the only one that escaped, and she owed her safety to the darkness of the night.

Finding much difficulty in shifting the prisoners, owing to the smallness of our boats and a heavy sea, I determined to take the prizes in tow and run for this place and hold the prisoners and troops that I had on board. We arrived here at day light. On the 6th, the Lady of the Lake having towed one of the prizes in, I dispatched her immediately to cruise between the Real and Fake Ducks. She returned the same afternoon, having discovered the enemy's squadron going into Kingston.

I have repaired the principal damages sustained by this ship in the action on the 28th ultimo, and have put a new fore-mast into the Governor Tompkins. We are now ready and waiting the movements of the army which is contemplated will leave here on the 10th.

The vessels captured on the 5th are gun-vessels, mounting from 1 to 3 guns each, with troops from the head of the lake (but last from York) bound to Kingston. We learnt from the prisoners that the enemy was very much cut up in their hulls and spars, and a great many men killed and wounded, particularly on board the Wolfe and Royal George. I enclose herewith a list of the prisoners* taken on the 5th.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant. ISAAC CRAUNCEY.

631. "His majesty's" packet Morgiana, 18 guns, 2 pounders, two of them long brass pieces, 50 men, burthen 400 tons, captured by the privateer Saratoga of 4 guns and 116 men, by boarding. [The Saratoga, chased by a frigate, had been compelled to throw overboard 12 of her guns previous to the action, but took the brass pieces from the packet and continued her cruise.] The Morgiana was obstinately defended—had two men killed and five wounded, among the latter, the captain severely. The Saratoga had three men killed and seven wounded. Before the Morgiana struck she threw over the mail. The prize has arrived at New-ort, R. I. where her late captain has publicly offered his thanks to the prize-master for his humanity, &c.

632. Ship —, captured by the Saratoga and burnt.

634. Schooner —, of 130 tons, from St. Johns for the West-Indies, sent into Machias, by the privateer General Stark.

THE CHRONICLE.

Vermont election—There was no legal choice of governor by the people at the last election. Mr. Galusha (rep.) had a majority of 295 over Mr. Chittenden (fed.) but not a plurality of all that were given, and the choice was decided by a joint ballot of the council [or senate] and assembly. The council, elected by a general vote of the people of the state, consists of eight republicans and four federalists, the assembly of 109 federalists and 103 republicans. On the joint ballot, Mr. Chittenden (fed.) had a plurality of three votes, and is governor of Vermont.

There is a special law in Vermont providing that citizens of the state, belonging to the army, may vote in any part of the state for state officers; but all such votes were thrown by as illegal. It is stated that Vermont has from 2 to 3000 citizens in arms.

Mr. Rodney is a "federalist." As many do not know that there are two families of the Rodneys in Delaware, who have never agreed on any political question since 1775, it may serve the public information to state, that the Mr. Rodney elected is of the opposite line to the late attorney-general of the United States.

The legislature of New-Jersey, met at Trenton on the 26th. In the council, Charles Clark (rep.) was elected to the chair without opposition. In the house the votes were, for Bateman (rep.) 20—Pearson (fed.) 11.

"The St. Mary's (Md.) return is deemed illegal, as the law expressly says that the levy court of the county, in the month of August, yearly, shall appoint the next ensuing judges, and that judges must be sworn in on the day of election, first Monday of September, by a magistrate, and if no magistrate is at hand, the first named judge is to swear in himself and he to swear the two assistant judges; no commission however, issued from the levy court, and the last year's judges undertook to open the poll and make the return without any swearing in." [A. Her.]

A trading vessel on l'rive, belonging to Mr. Park, of Buffalo, was wrecked near the town of Erie on the 10th inst. There was a dreadful gale on the lake that day, with a fall of snow about three inches deep. It was thought that some of the vessels of Perry's fleet may have suffered.

LATEST FROM MEXICO.

Alexandria, (Louis.) Sept. 24—The unfortunate sufferers are coming in daily. It appears that, much to the astonishment of all, Escobedo has liberated the Americans taken prisoners in and after the action. No parole was required; he advised them never to take up arms against the royalists again, unless by approbation of the American government, of which he spoke with much respect and intimated that an expedition under the patronage of government, would have his co-operation—He treated the Americans with humanity and supplied them with provisions for their return home; but most of the Spanish prisoners were shot.

General Toledo arrived here on Monday evening last—he has the entire approbation of the officers and men generally, and no doubt is entertained that he was eminently qualified to do justice to the command, and had his orders been obeyed, would have led the Patriots on to triumph and to glory.

There is no kind of doubt, that at the time of retreat, the Patriots had much the advantage, and could the officers have rallied them, their triumph would have been complete. It is stated that the royalists lost upwards of 700 and the loss on the part of the Patriots did not exceed four hundred.

POSTSCRIPT.

We have an arrival from Leith at Boston, that brings London dates to the 7th of September.

We have reports (and nothing but reports) of a great battle, fought between the French and the allies near Dresden, about the 20th of August, in which both claim the victory. Our account, however, definitely states that Bonaparte had got a complete victory, and entered Berlin, on the 24th or 25th of the same month.

This is also announced by the minister of the police at Paris, but he gives no particulars. We believe it, because a depression of the funds was felt at London.

We have never seen so much stuff, with so little point. It only certainly appears, that Austria is at war with France, and there has been a dreadful battle.

* This list is already inserted, see page 135.

Hamilton's Report.

The editor presents this supplement to his patrons chiefly to get in, and keep in one body, a considerable portion of Mr. Hamilton's celebrated report on the manufactures of the United States, laid before congress in 1790. This interesting document forms an important part of the history of our country in one of its [now] most valuable concerns; and we think will be read with no common attention. It deserves this—both on account of the intrinsic merit of the report itself, as because of the many curious facts it brings to the recollection, to shew the mighty changes that have taken place in the short period of twenty-three years—changes that the most visionary never imagined could so soon be brought about, but in which were the hopes of the patriot ever since the revolution. From what has happened, we look forward with confidence to the future; and indulge a belief that the real independence of the United States is at hand. This voluminous article (making nearly 300 pages of a common 8vo. volume, but which we shall get in in less than thirty.) is one of those originally promised in the prospectus; but has for some time been purposely delayed as the immediate precursor of a report on the actual state of our manufactures, compiled from the returns of the marshals in 1810, and designed (we understand) to be published during the next session of congress.

The secretary of the treasury, in obedience to the order of the house of representatives of the 15th of January, 1793, has applied his attention at as early a period as his other duties would permit, to the subject of manufactures; and particularly to the means of promoting such as will tend to render the United States independent on foreign nations, for military and other essential supplies: and he thereupon respectfully submits the following report:

The expediency of encouraging manufactures in the United States, which was, not long since, deemed very questionable, appears at this time to be pretty generally admitted. The embarrassments, which have obstructed the progress of our external trade, have led to serious reflections on the necessity of enlarging the sphere of our domestic commerce: the restrictive regulations, which in foreign markets abridge the vent of the increasing surplus of our agricultural produce, serve to beget an earnest desire, that a more extensive demand for that surplus may be created at home. And the complete success, which has rewarded manufacturing enterprise, in some valuable branches, conspiring with the promising symptoms which attend some less mature essays in others, justify a hope, that the obstacles to the growth of this species of industry, are less formidable than they were apprehended to be; and that it is not difficult to find in its further extension, a full indemnification for any external disadvantages, which are, or may be experienced, as well as an accession of resources favorable to national independence and safety.

There still are, nevertheless, respectable patrons of opinions, unfriendly to the encouragement of manufactures. The following are, substantially, the arguments by which these opinions are defended:—

"In every country (say those who entertain them) agriculture is the most beneficial and productive object of human industry. This position, generally, if not universally true, applies with peculiar emphasis to the United States, on account of their immense tracts of fertile territory, uninhabited and unimproved. Nothing can afford so advantageous an employment for capital and labor, as the conversion of this extensive wilderness into cultivated farms. Nothing equally with this, can contribute to the population, strength and real riches of the country.

"To endeavor, by the extraordinary patronage of government, to accelerate the growth of manufactures, is, in fact, to endeavor, by force and art, to transfer the natural current of industry, from a more to a less beneficial channel. Whatever has such a tendency must necessarily be unwise: indeed it can hardly ever be wise in a government, to attempt to give a direction to the industry of its citizens. Thus, under the quick-sighted guidance of private interest, will, if left to itself, infallibly find its own way to the most profitable employment; and it is by such employment, that the public prosperity will be most effectually promoted. To leave industry to itself, therefore, is, in almost every case, the soundest, as well as the simplest policy.

"This policy is not only recommended to the United States, by considerations which affect all nations; it is, in a manner, dictated to them by the imperious force of a very peculiar situation. The smallness of their population, compared with their territory—the constant allurements to emigration from the settled to the unsettled parts of the country—the facility with which the less independent condition of an artisan can be exchanged for the more independent condition of a farmer—these, and similar causes, conspire to produce, and, for a length of time, must continue to occasion, a scarcity of hands for manufacturing occupation, and dearth of labor generally. To these disadvantages for the prosecution of manufactures, a deficiency of pecuniary capital being added, the prospect of a successful competition with the manufacturers of Europe, must be regarded as little less than desperate. Extensive manufactures can only be the offspring of a redundant, at least a full population. Till the latter shall characterise the situation of this country, 'tis vain to hope for the former.

"If, contrary to the natural course of things, an unseasonable and premature spring can be given to certain fabrics, by heavy duties, prohibitions, bounties, or by other forced expedients; this will only be to sacrifice the interests of the community to those of particular classes. Besides the misdirection of labor, a virtual monopoly will be given to the persons employed on such fabrics; and an enhancement of price, the inevitable consequence of every monopoly, must be defrayed at the expence of the other parts of the society. It is far preferable, that those persons should be engaged in the cultivation of the earth, and that we should procure, in exchange for our productions, the commodities, with which foreigners are able to supply us in greater perfection, and upon better terms."

This mode of reasoning is founded upon facts and principles, which have certainly respectable pretensions. If it had governed the conduct of nations, more generally than it has done, there is room to suppose, that it might have carried them faster to prosperity and greatness, than they have attained by the pursuit of maxims too widely opposite. Most general theories, however, admit of numerous exceptions; and there are few, if any, of the political kind, which do not blend a considerable portion of error with the truths they inculcate.

In order to an accurate judgment, how far that, which has been just stated, ought to be deemed liable to a similar imputation, it is necessary to advert carefully to the considerations which plead in favor of manufactures, and which appear to recommend the special and positive encouragement of them, in certain cases, and under certain reasonable limitations.

It ought readily to be conceded, that the cultivation of the earth, as the primary and most certain source of national supply—as the immediate and chief source of subsistence to man—as the principal source of those materials which constitute the nutriment of other kinds of labor—as including a state most favorable to the freedom and independence of the human mind—one, perhaps, most conducive to the multiplication of the human species—has intrinsically a strong claim to pre-eminence over every other kind of industry.

But, that it has a title to any thing like an exclusive pre-dilection, in any country, ought to be admitted with great caution. That it is even more productive than every branch of industry, requires more evidence than has yet been given in support of the position. That its real interests, precious and important as, without help of exaggeration, they truly are, will be advanced, rather than injured by the due encouragement of manufactures, may, it is believed, be satisfactorily demonstrated. And it is also believed, that the expediency of such encouragement, in a general view, may be shown to be recommended by the most cogent and persuasive motives of national policy.

It has been maintained, that agriculture is not only the most productive, but the only productive species of industry. The reality of this suggestion, in either respect, has, however, not been verified by any accurate detail of facts and calculations: and the general arguments which are adduced to prove it, are rather subtle and paradoxical, than solid or convincing.

Those, which maintain its exclusive productiveness, are to this effect:

Labor, bestowed upon the cultivation of land, produces enough, not only to replace all the necessary expences incurred in the business, and to maintain the persons who are employed in it, but to afford, together with the ordinary profit on the stock or capital of the farmer, a net surplus, or rent for the landlord or proprietor of the soil. But the labor of artificers does nothing more than replace the stock which employs them, or which furnishes materials, tools, and wages, and yield the ordinary profit upon that stock. It yields nothing equivalent to the rent of land. Neither does it add any thing to the total value of the whole annual produce of the land and labor of the country. The additional value given to those parts of the produce of land, which are wrought into manufactures, is counterbalanced by the value of those other parts of that produce, which are consumed by the manufacturers. It can therefore only be by saving or parsimony, not by the positive productiveness of their labor, that the classes of artificers can in any degree augment the revenue of the society.

To this it has been answered,

1. "That inasmuch as it is acknowledged, that manufacturing labor produces a value equal to that which is expended or consumed in carrying it on, and continues in existence the original stock or capital employed, it ought, on that account alone, to escape being considered as wholly unproductive: that though it should be admitted, as alleged, that the consumption of the produce of the soil, by the classes of artificers or manufacturers, is exactly equal to the value added by their labor to the materials upon which it is exerted; yet it would not thence follow, that it added nothing to the revenue of the society, or to the aggregate value of the annual produce of its land and labor. If the consumption, for any given period, amounted to a given sum, and the increased value of the produce manufactured, in the same period, to a like sum, the total amount of the consumption and production during that period, would be equal to the two sums, and consequently double the value of the agricultural produce consumed. And though the increment of value, produced by the classes of artificers, should at no time exceed the value of the produce of the land consumed by them, yet there would be at every moment, in consequence of their labor, a greater value of goods in the market, than would exist independent of it.

2. "That the position, that artificers can augment the revenue of a society, only by parsimony, is true in no other sense, than in one which is equally applicable to husbandmen or cultivators. It may be alike affirmed of all these classes, that the fund acquired by their labor, and destined for their support, is not, in an ordinary way, more than equal to it. And hence it will follow, that augmentations of the wealth or capital of the community (except in the instances of some extraordinary dexterity or skill) can only proceed, with respect to any of them, from the savings of the more thrifty and parsimonious.

3. "That the annual produce of the land and labor of a country can only be increased, in two ways, by some improvement in the productive powers of the useful labor, which actually exists within it, or by some increase in the quantity of such labor; that with regard to the first, the labor of artificers being capable of greater subdivision and simplicity of operation, than that of cultivators, it is susceptible, in a proportionably greater degree, of improvement in its productive powers, whether to be derived from an accession of skill, or from the application of ingenious machinery; in which particular, therefore, the labor employed in the culture of land can pretend to no advantage over that engaged in manufactures: that with regard to an augmentation of the quantity of useful labor, this, excluding adventitious circumstances, must depend essentially upon an increase of capital, which again must depend upon the savings made out of the revenues of those, who furnish or manage that, which is at any time employed, whether in agriculture, or in manufactures, or in any other way."

But while the exclusive productiveness of agricultural labor has been thus denied and refuted, the superiority of its productiveness has been conceded without hesitation. As this concession involves a point of considerable magnitude, in relation to maxims of public administration, the grounds on which it rests are worthy of a distinct and particular examination.

One of the arguments made use of, in support of the idea, may be pronounced both quaint and superficial; it amounts to this:—That in the productions of the soil, nature co-operates with man; and that the effect of their joint labor must be greater than that of the labor of man alone.

This, however, is far from being a necessary inference. It is very conceivable, that the labor of man alone laid out upon a work, requiring great skill and art to bring it to perfection, may be more productive, in value, than the labor of nature and man combined, when directed towards more simple operations and objects: and when it is recollected to what an extent the agency of nature, in the application of the mechanical powers, is made auxiliary to the prosecution of manufactures, the suggestion which has been noticed, loses even the appearance of plausibility.

It might also be observed, with a contrary view, that the labor employed in agriculture is in a great measure periodical and occasional, depending on seasons, liable to various and long intermissions; while that occupied in many manufactures is constant and regular, extending through the year, embracing, in some instances, night as well as day. It is also probable, that there are among the cultivators of land, more examples of recklessness, than among artificers. The farmer, from the peculiar fertility of his land, or some other favorable circumstance, may frequently obtain a livelihood, even with a considerable degree of carelessness in the mode of cultivation; but the artisan can with difficulty effect the same object, without exerting himself pretty equally with all those, who are engaged in the same pursuit. And if it may likewise be assumed as a fact, that manufactures open a wider field to exertions of ingenuity than agriculture, it would not be a strained conjecture, that the labor employed in the former being as once more constant, more uniform, and more ingenious, than that which is employed in the latter, will be found at the same time more productive.

But it is not meant to lay stress on observations of this nature: they ought only to serve as a counterbalance to those of a similar complexion. Circumstances so vague and general, as well as so abstract, can afford little instruction in a matter of this kind.

Another, and that which seems to be the principal argument offered for the superior productiveness of agricultural labor, turns upon the allegation, that labor employed on manufactures yields no thing equivalent to the rent of land; or to that surplus, as it is called, which accrues to the proprietor of the soil. But this distinction, important as it has been deemed, appears rather verbal than substantial.

It is easily discernible, that what, in the first instance, is divided into two parts, under the denominations of the ordinary profit of the stock of the farmer and rent to the landlord, is, in the second instance, united under the general appellation of the ordinary profit on the stock of the undertaker; and that this formal or verbal distribution constitutes the whole difference in the two cases. It seems to have been overlooked, that the land is itself a stock or capital, advanced or lent by its owner to the occupier or tenant, and that the rent he receives is only the ordinary profit of a certain stock in land, not managed by the proprietor himself, but by another to whom he lends or lets it, and who, on his part, advances a second capital to stock and improve the land, upon which he also receives the usual profit. The rent of the landlord and the profit of the farmer are therefore nothing more than the ordinary profits of two capitals, belonging to two different persons, and united in the cultivation of a farm; as, in the other case, the surplus which arises upon any manufactory, after replacing the expences of carrying it on, answers to the ordinary profits of one or more capitals engaged in the prosecution of such manufactory. It is said one or more capitals:

because, in fact, the same thing which is contemplated in the case of the farm, sometimes happens in that of a manufactory. There is one, who furnishes a part of the capital, or lends a part of the money, by which it is carried on, and another, who carries it on, with the addition of his own capital. Out of the surplus which remains, after defraying expences, an interest is paid to the money-lender for the proportion of the capital furnished by him, which exactly agrees with the rent paid to the landlord: and the residue of that surplus constitutes the profit of the undertaker or manufacturer, and agrees with what is denominated the ordinary profits of the stock of the farmer. Both together make the ordinary profits of two capitals employed in a manufactory; as in the other case, the rent of the landlord and the revenue of the farmer compose the ordinary profits of two capitals, employed in the cultivation of a farm.

The rent, therefore, accruing to the proprietor of the land, far from being a criterion of exclusive productiveness, as has been argued, is no criterion even of superior productiveness. The question must still be, whether the surplus, after defraying expences, of a given capital, employed in the purchase and improvement of a piece of land, is greater or less, than that of a like capital, employed in the prosecution of a manufactory; or whether the whole value produced from a given capital, and a given quantity of labor, employed in one way, be greater or less than the whole value produced from an equal capital and an equal quantity of labor, employed in the other way; or rather, perhaps, whether the business of agriculture or that of manufactures will yield the greatest product, according to a compound ratio of the quantity of the capital and the quantity of labor, which are employed in the one or in the other.

The solution of either of these questions is not easy: it involves numerous complicated details, depending on an accurate knowledge of the objects to be compared. It is not known that the comparison has ever yet been made upon sufficient data, properly ascertained and analyzed. To be able to make it on the present occasion, with satisfactory precision, would demand more previous enquiry and investigation, than there has been hitherto either leisure or opportunity to accomplish.

Some essays, however, have been made towards acquiring the requisite information; which have rather served to throw doubt upon, than to confirm the hypothesis, under examination. But it ought to be acknowledged, that they have been too little diversified, and are too imperfect, to authorise a definitive conclusion, either way; leading rather to probable conjecture than to certain deduction. They render it probable, that there are various branches of manufactures, in which a given capital will yield a greater total product, and a considerably greater net product, than an equal capital invested in the purchase and improvement of lands; and that there are also some branches, in which both the gross and the net produce will exceed that of agricultural industry: according to a compound ratio of capital and labor. But it is on this last point, that there appears to be the greatest room for doubt. It is far less difficult, to infer generally, that the net produce of capital engaged in manufacturing enterprises is greater than that of capital engaged in agriculture.

The foregoing suggestions are not designed to inculcate an opinion, that manufacturing industry is more productive than that of agriculture. They are intended rather to show, that the reverse of this proposition is not ascertained; that the general arguments which are brought to establish it, are not satisfactory; and consequently, that a supposition, of the superior productiveness of tillage, ought to be no obstacle to listening to any substantial inducements to the encouragement of manufactures, which may be otherwise perceived to exist, through an apprehension, that they may have a tendency to divert labor from a more to a less profitable employment.

It is extremely probable, that on a full and accurate development of the matter, on the ground of fact and calculation, it would be discovered that there is no material difference between the aggregate productiveness of the one, and of the other kind of industry; and that the propriety of the encouragements, which may in any case be proposed to be given to either, ought to be determined upon considerations inelative to any comparison of that nature.

II. But without contending for the superior productiveness of manufacturing industry, it may conduce to a better judgment of the policy, which ought to be pursued in protecting its encouragement, to contemplate the subject, under some additional aspects, tending not only to confirm the idea, that this kind of industry has been improperly represented as unproductive in itself; but to evince in addition, that the establishment and diffusion of manufactures, have the effect of rendering the total mass of useful and productive labor, in a community, greater than it would otherwise be. In prosecuting this discussion, it may be necessary, briefly to resume and review some of the topics which have been already touched.

To affirm that the labor of the manufacturer is unproductive, because he consumes as much of the produce of land, as he adds value to the raw materials which he manufactures, is not better founded, than it would be to affirm, that the labor of the farmer, which furnishes materials to the manufacturer, is unproductive, because he consumes an equal value of manufactured articles. Each furnishes a certain portion of the produce of his labor to the other, and each destroys a correspondent portion of the produce of the labor of the other. In the meantime, the maintenance of two citizens, instead of one, is going on; the state has two members instead of one; and they together consume twice the value of what is produced from the land.

If instead of a farmer and artificer, there were a farmer only, he would be under the necessity of devoting a part of his labor to the fabrication of clothing and other articles, which he would procure of the artificer, in the case of there being such a person; and of course he would be able to devote less labor to the cultivation of his farm, and would draw from it a proportionably less product. The whole quantity of production, in this state of things, in provisions, raw materials, and manufactures, would certainly not exceed in value the amount of what would be produced in provisions and raw materials only, if there were an artificer as well as a farmer.

Again—if there were both an artificer and a farmer, the latter would be left at liberty to pursue exclusively the cultivation of his farm. A greater quantity of provisions and raw materials would of course be produced, equal, at least, as has been already observed, to the whole amount of the provisions, raw materials and manufactures, which would exist, on a contrary supposition. The artificer, at the same time, would be going on in the production of manufactured commodities; to an amount sufficient not only to repay the farmer, in those commodities, for the provisions and materials which were procured from him, but to furnish the artificer himself with a supply of similar commodities for his own use. Thus then, there would be two quantities or values in existence, instead of one; and the revenue and consumption would be double in one case, what it would be in the other.

If, in place of both these suppositions, there were supposed to be two farmers and no artificer, each of whom applied a part of his labor to the culture of land, and another part to the fabrication of manufactures; in this case, the portion of the labor of both, bestowed upon land, would produce the same quantity of provisions and raw materials only, as would be produced by the entire sum of the labor of one applied in the same manner: and the portion of the labor of both bestowed upon manufactures, would produce the same quantity of manufactures only as would be produced by the entire sum of the labor of one applied in the same manner. Hence the produce of the labor of the two farmers, would not be greater than the produce of the labor of the farmer and artificer; and hence it results, that the labor of the artificer is as positively productive as that of the farmer, and, as positively, augments the revenue of the society.

The labor of the artificer replaces to the farmer that portion of his labor with which he provides the materials of exchange with the artificer, and which he would otherwise have been compelled to apply to manufactures; and while the artificer thus enables the farmer to enlarge his stock of agricultural industry, a portion of which he purchases for his own use, he also supplies himself with the manufactured articles of which he stands in need. He does still more. Besides this equivalent, which he gives for the portion of agricultural labor consumed by him, and this supply of manufactured commodities for his own consumption, he furnishes still a surplus, which compensates for the use of the capital advanced either by himself or some other person, for carrying on the business. This is the ordinary profit of the stock employed in the manufactory; and is, in every sense, as effective an addition to the income of the society, as the rent of land.

The produce of the labor of the artificer, consequently, may be regarded as composed of three parts; one, by which the provisions for his subsistence and the materials for his work are purchased of the farmer; one, by which he supplies himself with manufactured necessaries; and a third, which constitutes the profit on the stock employed. The two last portions seem to have been overlooked in the system, which represents manufacturing industry as barren and unproductive.

In the course of the preceding illustrations, the products of equal quantities of the labor of the farmer and artificer have been treated as if equal to each other. But this is not to be understood as intending to assert any such precise equality. It is merely a manner of expression adopted for the sake of simplicity and perspicuity. Whether the value of the produce of the labor of the farmer be somewhat more or less, than that of the artificer, is not material to the main scope of the argument, which hitherto has only aimed at showing that the one, as well as the other, occasions a positive augmentation of the total produce and revenue of the society.

It is now proper to proceed a step further, and to enumerate the principal circumstances, from which it may be inferred—that manufacturing establishments not only occasion a positive augmentation of the produce and revenue of the society, but that they contribute essentially to rendering them greater than they could possibly be, without such establishments. These circumstances are,

1. The division of labor.
2. An extension of the use of machinery.

3. Additional employment to classes of the community, not ordinarily engaged in the business.

4. The promoting of emigration from foreign countries.

5. The furnishing greater scope for the diversity of talents and dispositions which discriminate men from each other.

6. The affording a more ample and various field for enterprise.

7. The creating, in some instances, a new, and securing, in all, a more certain and steady demand for the surplus produce of the soil.

Each of these circumstances has a considerable influence upon the total mass of industrious effort in a community: together, they add to it a degree of energy and effect, which are not easily conceived. Some comments upon each of them, in the order in which they have been stated, may serve to explain their importance.

I. As to the division of labor.

It has justly been observed, that there is scarcely any thing of greater moment in the economy of a nation, than the proper division of labor. The separation of occupations causes each to be carried to a much greater perfection than it could possibly acquire, if they were blended. This arises principally from three circumstances.

1st. The greater skill and dexterity naturally resulting from a constant and undivided application to a single object. It is evident, that these properties must increase, in proportion to the separation and simplification of objects, and the steadiness of the attention devoted to each; and must be less, in proportion to the complication of objects, and the number among which the attention is distracted.

2d. The economy of time, by avoiding the loss of it, incident to a frequent transition from one operation to another of a different nature. This depends on various circumstances; the transition itself—the orderly disposition of the implements, machines, and materials employed in the operation to be relinquished—the preparatory steps to the commencement of a new one—the interruption of the impulse, which the mind of the workman acquires, from being engaged in a particular operation—the distractions, hesitations and reluctances, which attend the passage from one kind of business to another.

3d. An extension of the use of machinery. A man occupied on a single object, will have it more in his power, and will be more naturally led to exert his imagination in devising methods to facilitate and abridge labor, than if he were perplexed by a variety of independent and dissimilar operations. Besides this, the fabrication of machines, in numerous instances, becoming itself a distinct trade, the artist, who follows it, has all the advantages which have been enumerated, for improvement in his particular art: and in both ways the invention and application of machinery are extended.

And from these causes united, the mere separation of the occupation of the cultivator, from that of the artificer, has the effect of augmenting the productive powers of labor, and with them, the total mass of the produce or revenue of a country. In this single view of the subject, therefore, the utility of artificers or manufacturers, towards promoting an increase of productive industry, is apparent.

II. As to an extension of the use of machinery, a point which, though partly anticipated, requires to be placed in one or two additional lights.

The employment of machinery forms an item of great importance in the general mass of national industry. 'Tis an artificial force brought in aid of the natural force of man, and, to all the purposes of labor, is an increase of hands; an accession of strength, unnumbered too by the expense of maintaining the laborer. May it not therefore be fairly inferred, that those occupations which give greatest scope to the use of this auxiliary, contribute most to the general stock of industrious effort, and, in consequence, to the general product of industry?

It shall be taken for granted, and the truth of the position referred to observation, that manufacturing pursuits are susceptible in a greater degree of the application of machinery, than those of agriculture. If so, all the difference is lost to a community, which, instead of manufacturing for itself, procures the fabrics requisite to its supply from other countries. The substitution of foreign for domestic manufactures is a transfer to foreign nations of the advantages accruing from the employment of machinery in the modes in which it is capable of being employed, with most utility and to the greatest extent.

The cotton mill invented in England, within the last twenty years, is a signal illustration of the general proposition which has been just advanced. In consequence of it, all the different processes for spinning cotton are performed by means of machines, which are put in motion by water, and attended chiefly by women and children; and by a smaller number of persons, in the whole, than are requisite in the ordinary mode of spinning. And it is an advantage of great moment, that the operations of this mill continue with convenience, during the night, as well as through the day. The prodigious effect of such a machine is easily conceived. To this invention is to be attributed essentially the immense progress, which has been so suddenly made in Great Britain, in the various fabrics of cotton.

III. As to the additional employment of classes of the community, not originally engaged in the particular business.

This is not among the least valuable of the means by which manufacturing institutions contribute to augment the general stock of industry and production. In places where those institutions prevail, besides the persons regularly engaged in them, they afford occasional and extra employment to industrious individuals and families, who are willing to devote the leisure resulting from the intermissions of their ordinary pursuits to collateral labors, as a resource for multiplying their acquisitions or their enjoyments. The husbandman himself experiences a new source of profit and support from the increased industry of his wife and daughters; invited and stimulated by the demands of the neighboring manufactories.

Besides this advantage of occasional employment to classes having different occupations, there is another of a nature allied to it, and of a similar tendency. This is, the employment of persons who would otherwise be idle, (and, in many cases, a burden on the community) either from the bias of temper, habit, infirmity of body, or some other cause, indisposing or disqualifying them for the toils of the country. It is worthy of particular remark, that, in general, women and children are rendered more useful, and the latter more early useful, by manufacturing establishments, than they would otherwise be. Of the number of persons employed in the cotton manufactories of Great Britain, it is computed that four-sevenths nearly are women and children; of whom the greatest proportion are children, and many of them of a tender age.

And thus it appears to be one of the attributes of manufactures, and one of no small consequence, to give occasion to the exertion of a greater quantity of industry, even by the same number of persons, where they happen to prevail, than would exist, if there were no such establishments.

IV. As to the promoting of emigration from foreign countries.

Men reluctantly quit one course of occupation and livelihood for another, unless invited to it by very apparent and proximate advantages. Many, who would go from one country to another, if they had a prospect of continuing, with more benefit, the callings to which they have been educated, will often not be tempted to change their situation by the hope of doing better in some other way. Manufacturers, who (listening to the powerful invitations of a better price for their fabrics, or their labor, of greater cheapness of provision and raw materials, of an exemption from the chief part of the taxes, burdens and restraints, which they endure in the old world, of greater personal independence and consequence, under the operation of a more equal government, and of, what is far more precious than mere religious toleration, a perfect equality of religious privileges) would probably flock from Europe to the United States to pursue their own trades or professions, if they were once made sensible of the advantages they would enjoy, and were inspired with an assurance of encouragement and employment, will, with difficulty, be induced to transplant themselves, with a view to become cultivators of land.

If it be true, then, that it is the interest of the United States to open every possible avenue to emigration from abroad, it affords a weighty argument for the encouragement of manufactures; which, for the reason just assigned, will have the strongest tendency to multiply the inducements to it.

Here is perceived an important resource, not only for extending the population, and with it the useful and productive labor of the country, but likewise for the prosecution of manufactures; without deducting from the number of hands which might otherwise be drawn to tillage; and even for the indemnification of agriculture for such as might happen to be diverted from it. Many, whom manufacturing views would induce to emigrate, would afterwards yield to the temptations, which the particular situation of this country holds out to agricultural pursuits. And while agriculture would in other respects derive many signal and unmingled advantages, from the growth of manufactures, it is a problem, whether it would gain or lose, as to the article of the number of persons employed in carrying it on.

V. As to the furnishing greater scope for the diversity of talents and dispositions, which discriminate men from each other.

This is a much more powerful mean of augmenting the fund of national industry than may at first sight appear. It is a just observation, that minds, of the strongest and most active powers for their proper objects, fall below mediocrity, and labor without effect, if confined to uncongenial pursuits. And it is thence to be inferred, that the result of human exertion may be immensely increased by diversifying its objects. When all the different kinds of industry obtain in a community, each individual can find his proper element, and call into activity the whole vigor of his nature. And the community is benefited by the services of its respective members, in the manner in which each can serve it with most effect.

If there be any thing in a remark often to be met with, namely, that there is, in the genius of the people of this country, a peculiar aptitude for mechanic improvements, it would operate as a forcible reason for giving opportunities to the exercise of that species of talent, by the propagation of manufactures.

VI. As to the affording a more ample and various field for enterprize.

This also is of greater consequence in the general scale of national exertion, than might perhaps on a superficial view be supposed, and has effects not altogether dissimilar from those of the circumstance last noticed. To cherish and stimulate the activity of the human mind by multiplying the objects of enterprize, is not among the least considerable of the expedients, by which the wealth of a nation may be promoted. Even things, in themselves not positively advantageous, sometimes become so, by their tendency to provoke exertion. Every new scene which is opened to the busy nature of man, to rouse and exert itself, is the addition of a new energy to the general stock of effort.

The spirit of enterprize, useful and prolific as it is, must necessary be contracted or expanded in proportion to the simplicity or variety, of the occupations and productions which are to be found in a society. It must be less in a nation of mere cultivators, than in a nation of cultivators and merchants; less in a nation of cultivators and merchants, than in a nation of cultivators, artificers, and merchants.

VII. As to the creating, in some instances, a new, and securing in all a more certain and steady demand for the surplus produce of the soil.

This is among the most important of the circumstances which have been indicated. It is a principal mean, by which the establishment of manufactures contributes to an augmentation of the produce or revenue of a country, and has an immediate and direct relation to the prosperity of agriculture.

It is evident, that the exertions of the husbandman will be steady or fluctuating, vigorous or feeble, in proportion to the steadiness or fluctuation, adequateness or inadequateness of the markets on which he must depend, for the vent of the surplus, which may be produced by his labor; and that such surplus, in the ordinary course of things, will be greater or less in the same proportion.

For the purpose of this vent, a domestic market is greatly to be preferred to a foreign one; because it is, in the nature of things, far more to be relied upon.

It is a primary object of the policy of nations to be able to supply themselves with subsistence from their own soils; and manufacturing nations, as far as circumstances permit, endeavor to procure from the same source, the raw materials necessary for their own fabrics. This disposition, urged by the spirit of monopoly, is sometimes even carried to an injudicious extreme. It seems not always to be collected, that nations who have neither mines nor manufactures, can only obtain the manufactured articles of which they stand in need, by an exchange of the products of their soils; and that, if those who can best furnish them with such articles, are unwilling to give a due course to this exchange, they must of necessity make every possible effort to manufacture for themselves; the effect of which is, that the manufacturing nations abridge the natural advantages of their situation, through an unwillingness to permit the agricultural countries to enjoy the advantages of theirs, and sacrifice the interest of a mutually beneficial intercourse to the vain project of selling every thing and buying nothing.

But it is also a consequence of the policy, which has been noted, that the foreign demand for the products of agricultural countries, is in a great degree rather casual and occasional, than certain or constant. To what extent injurious interruptions of the demand for some of the staple commodities of the United States, may have been experienced, from that cause, must be referred to the judgment of those who are engaged in carrying on the commerce of the country: but it may be safely affirmed, that such interruptions are at times very inconveniently felt, and that cases not unfrequently occur, in which markets are so confined and restricted, as to render the demand very unequal to the supply.

Independently likewise of the artificial impediments, which are created by the policy in question, there are natural causes tending to render the external demand for the surplus of agricultural nations a precarious reliance. The differences of seasons in the countries which are the consumers, make immense differences in the produce of their own soils, in different years, and consequently in the degrees of their necessity, for foreign supply. Plentiful harvests with them, especially if similar ones occur at the same time in the countries which are furnishers, occasion of course a glut in the markets of the latter.

Considering how fast and how much the progress of new settlements in the United States must increase the surplus produce of the soil, and weighing seriously the tendency of the system, which prevails among most of the commercial nations of Europe; whatever dependence may be placed on the force of natural circumstances to counteract the effects of an artificial policy; there appear strong reasons to regard the foreign demand for that surplus, as too uncertain a reliance, and to desire a substitute for it, in an extensive domestic market.

To secure such a market, there is no other expedient, than to promote manufacturing establishments. Manufacturers, who constitute the most numerous class, after the cultivators of land, are for that reason the principal consumers of the surplus of their labor.

This idea of an extensive domestic market for the surplus produce of the soil, is of the first consequence. It is, of all things, that which most effectually conduces to a flourishing state of agriculture. If the effect of manufactures should be to detach a portion of the hands, which would otherwise be engaged in tillage, it might possibly cause a smaller quantity of lands to be under cultivation: but by their tendency to procure a more certain demand for the surplus produce of the soil, they would, at the same time, cause the lands, which were in cultivation, to be better improved and more productive. And while, by their influence, the condition of each individual farmer would be meliorated, the total mass of agricultural production would probably be increased. For this must evidently depend as much, if not more, upon the degree of improvement, than upon the number of acres under culture.

It merits particular observation, that the multiplication of manufactories not only furnishes a market for those articles which have been accustomed to be produced in abundance, in a country; but it likewise creates a demand for such as were either unknown or produced in inconsiderable quantities. The bowels, as well as the surface of the earth, are ransacked for articles which were before neglected. Animals, plants, and minerals acquire a utility and value, which were before unexplored.

The foregoing considerations seem sufficient to establish, as general propositions, that it is the interest of nations to diversify the industrious pursuits of the individuals who compose them—that the establishment of manufactures is calculated not only to increase the general stock of useful and productive labor, but even to improve the state of agriculture in particular, certainly to advance the interests of those who are engaged in it. There are other views, that will be hereafter taken of the subject, which, it is conceived, will serve to confirm these inferences.

VIII. Previously to a further discussion of the objections to the encouragement of manufactures which have been stated, it will be of use to see what can be said in reference to the particular situation of the United States, against the conclusions appearing to result from what has been already offered.

It may be observed, that the idea is of no inconsiderable weight, that however true it might be, that a state, which, possessing large tracts of vacant and fertile territory, was at the same time secluded from foreign commerce, would find its interest and the interest of agriculture, in diverting a part of its population from tillage to manufactures; yet, it will not follow that the same is true of a state, which, having such vacant and fertile territory, has, at the same time ample opportunity of procuring from abroad, on good terms, all the fabrics of which it stands in need, for the supply of its inhabitants. The power of doing this at least secures the great advantage of a division of labor, leaving the farmer free to pursue exclusively the culture of his land, and enabling him to procure with its products, the manufactured supplies requisite either to his own wants or to his enjoyments. And though it should be true, that in settled countries, the diversification of industry is conducive to an increase in the productive powers of labor, and to an augmentation of revenue and capital; yet it is scarcely conceivable that there can be any thing of so solid and permanent advantage to an uncultivated and unpeopled country, as to convert its wastes into cultivated and inhabited districts. If the revenue, in the mean time, should be less, the capital, in the event, must be greater.

To these observations, the following appears to be a satisfactory answer—

1. If the system of perfect liberty to industry and commerce were the prevailing system of nations, the arguments, which dissuade a country, in the predicament of the United States, from the zealous pursuit of manufactures, would doubtless have great force. It will not be affirmed, that they might not be permitted, with few exceptions, to serve as the rule of national conduct. In such a state of things, each country would have the full benefit of its peculiar advantages, to compensate for its deficiencies or disadvantages. If one nation were in condition to supply manufactured articles on better terms than another, that other might find an abundant indemnification in a superior capacity to furnish the produce of the soil. And a free exchange, mutually beneficial, of the commodities which each was able to supply, on the best terms, might be carried on between them, supporting in full vigor the industry of each. And though the circumstances which have been mentioned, and others, which will be unfolded hereafter, render it probable, that nations merely agricultural, would not enjoy the same degree of opulence, in proportion to their numbers, as those which united manufactures with agriculture; yet the progressive improvement of the lands of the former, might, in the end, atone for an inferior degree of opulence in the mean time; and in a case, in which opposite considerations are pretty equally balanced, the opinion ought perhaps always to be, in favor of leaving industry to its own direction.

But the system, which has been mentioned, is far from characterising the general policy of nations. The prevalent one has been regulated by an opposite spirit. The consequence of it is, that the United States are, to a certain extent, in the situation of a country precluded from foreign commerce. They can, indeed, without difficulty, obtain from abroad the manufactured supplies, of which they are in want; but they experience numerous and very injurious impediments to the emission and vent of their own commodities. Nor is this the case in reference to a single foreign nation only. The regulations of several countries, with which we have the most extensive intercourse, throw serious obstructions in the way of the principal staples of the United States.

In such a position of things, the United States cannot exchange with Europe on equal terms; and the want of reciprocity would render them the victim of a system, which should induce them to confine their views to agriculture, and refrain from manufactures. A constant and increasing necessity, on their part, for the commodities of Europe, and only a partial and occasional demand for their own, in return, could not but expose them to a state of impoverishment, compared with the opulence to which their political and natural advantages authorise them to aspire.

Remarks of this kind are not made in the spirit of complaint. 'Tis for the nations, whose regulations are alluded to, to judge for themselves, whether by aiming at too much, they do not lose more than they gain. 'Tis for the United States to consider by what means they can render themselves least dependent, on the combinations, right or wrong, of foreign policy.

It is no small consolation, that already the measures which have embarrassed our trade, have accelerated internal improvements, which, upon the whole, have bettered our affairs. To diversify and extend these improvements, is the surest and safest method of indemnifying ourselves for any inconveniences which those or similar measures have a tendency to beget. If Europe will not take from us the products of our soil, upon terms consistent with our interest, the natural remedy is, to contract, as fast as possible, our wants of her.

2. The conversion of their waste into cultivated land is certainly a point of great moment in the political calculations of the United States. But the degree in which this may possibly be retarded by the encouragement of manufactories does not appear to countervail the powerful inducements to affording that encouragement.

An observation, made in another place, is of a nature to have great influence upon this question. If it cannot be denied, that the interests, even of agriculture, may be advanced more by having such of the lands of a state as are occupied under good cultivation, than by having a greater quantity occupied under a much inferior cultivation—and if manufactories, for the reasons assigned, must be admitted to have a tendency to promote a more steady and vigorous cultivation of the lands occupied, than would happen without them—it will follow that they are capable of indemnifying a country for a diminution of the progress of new settlements; and may serve to increase both the capital value and the income of its lands, even though they should abridge the number of acres under tillage.

But it does by no means follow, that the progress of new settlements would be retarded by the extension of manufactories. The desire of being an independent proprietor of land is founded on such strong principles in the human breast, that where the opportunity of becoming so is as great as it is in the United States, the proportion will be small of those, whose situations would otherwise lead to it, who would be diverted from it towards manufactories. And it is highly probable, as already intimated, that the accessions of foreigners, who, originally drawn over by manufacturing views, would afterwards abandon them for agricultural, would be more than an equivalent for those of our own citizens, who might happen to be detached from them.

The remaining objections to a particular encouragement of manufactories in the United States, now require to be examined.

Of these turns on the proposition, that industry, if left to itself, will naturally find its way to the most useful and profitable employment. Hence it is inferred, that manufactures, without the aid of government, will grow up as soon and as fast, as the natural state of things and the interest of the community may require.

Against the solidity of this hypothesis, in the full latitude of the terms, very cogent reasons may be offered. These have relation to the strong influence of habit and spirit of imitation, the fear of want of success in untried enterprises, the intrinsic difficulties incident to first essays towards a competition with those who have previously attained to perfection in the business to be attempted, the bounties, premiums, and other artificial encouragements, with which foreign nations second the exertions of their own citizens in the branches in which they are to be rivalled.

Experience teaches, that men are often so much governed by what they are accustomed to see and practice, that the simplest and most obvious improvements, in the most ordinary occupations, are adopted with hesitation, reluctance, and by slow gradations. The spontaneous transition to new pursuits, in a community long habituated to different ones, may be expected to be attended with proportionably greater difficulty. When former occupations ceased to yield a profit adequate to the subsistence of their followers, or when there was an absolute deficiency of employment in them, owing to the superabundance of hands, changes would ensue; but these changes would be likely to be more tardy than might consist with the interest either of individuals or of the society. In many cases they would not happen, while a bare support could be ensured by an adherence to ancient courses; though a resort to a more profitable employment might be practicable. To produce the desirable changes, as early as may be expedient, may therefore require the incitement and patronage of government.

The apprehension of failing in new attempts is perhaps a more serious impediment. There are dispositions apt to be attracted by the mere novelty of an undertaking; but these are not always the best calculated to give it success. To this, it is of importance that the confidence of the cautious, sagacious capitalists, both citizens and foreigners, should be excited. And to inspire this description of persons with confidence, it is essential that they should be made to see in any project, which is new, and for that reason alone, if for no other, precarious, the prospect of such a degree of countenance and support from government, as may be capable of overcoming the obstacles, inseparable from first experiments.

The superiority antecedently enjoyed by nations, who have pre-occupied and perfected a branch of industry, constitutes a more formidable obstacle, than either of those, which have been mentioned, to the introduction of the same branch into a country, in which it did not before exist. To maintain, between the recent establishments of one country and the long-matured establishments of another country, a competition upon equal terms, both as to quality and price, is, in most cases, impracticable. The disparity, in the one, or in the other, or in both, must necessarily be so considerable, as to forbid a successful rivalry, without the extraordinary aid and protection of government.

But the greatest obstacle of all to the successful prosecution of a new branch of industry, in a country, in which it was before unknown, consists, as far as the instances apply, in the bounties, premiums, and other aids, which are granted, in a variety of cases, by the nations in which the establishments to be imitated, are previously introduced. It is well known (and particular examples in the course of the report will be cited) that certain nations grant bounties on the exportation of particular commodities, to enable their own workmen to undersell and supplant all competitors, in the countries to which those commodities are sent. Hence the undertaker of a new manufacture have to contend not only with the natural disadvantages of a new undertaking, but with the gratuities and remunerations which other governments bestow. To be enabled to contend with success, it is evident, that the interference and aid of their own government are indispensable.

Combinations by those engaged in a particular branch of business, in one country, to frustrate the first efforts to introduce it into another, by temporary sacrifices, recompensed perhaps by extraordinary indemnifications of the government of such country, are believed to have existed, and are not to be regarded as destitute of probability. The existence or assurance of aid from the government of the country, in which the business is to be introduced, may be essential to fortify adventurers against the dread of such combinations—to defeat their effects, if formed, and to prevent their being formed, by demonstrating that they must in the end prove fruitless.

Whatever room there may be for an expectation that the industry of a people, under the direction of private interest, will, upon equal terms, find out the most beneficial employment for itself, there is none for a reliance, that it will struggle against the force of unequal terms, or will, of itself, surmount all the adventitious barriers to a successful competition, which may have been erected either by the advantages naturally acquired from practice and previous possession of the ground, or by those which may have sprung from positive regulations and an artificial policy. This general reflection might alone suffice as an answer to the objection under examination; exclusively of the weighty considerations which have been particularly urged.

The objections to the pursuit of manufactures in the United States, which next present themselves to discussion, represent an impracticability of success, arising from three causes—scarcity of hands, dearth of labor, want of capital.

The two first circumstances are, to a certain extent, real, and, within due limits, ought to be admitted as obstacles to the success of manufacturing enterprise in the United States. But there are various considerations, which lessen their force, and tend to afford an assurance, that they are not sufficient to prevent the advantageous prosecution of many very useful and extensive manufactures.

With regard to the scarcity of hands, the fact itself must be applied, with no small qualification, to certain parts of the United States. There are large districts, which may be considered as pretty fully peopled; and which, notwithstanding a continual drain for distant settlement, are thickly interspersed with flourishing and increasing towns. If these districts have not already reached the point, to which the complaint of scarcity of hands ceases, they are not remote from it, and are approaching fast towards it; and having perhaps fewer attractions to agriculture, than some other parts of the union, they exhibit a proportionably stronger tendency towards other kinds of industry. In these districts, may be discerned, no inconsiderable maturity for manufacturing establishments.

But there are circumstances, which have been already noticed with another view, that materially diminish every where the effect of a scarcity of hands. These circumstances are—the great use which can be made of women and children; on which point a very pregnant and instructive fact has been mentioned; the vast extension given by late improvements to the employment of machines, which substituting the agency of fire and water, has prodigiously lessened the necessity for manual labor—the employment of persons ordinarily engaged in other occupations, during the seasons, or hours of leisure—which, besides giving occasion to the exertion of a greater quantity of labor by the same number of persons, and thereby increasing the general stock of labor, as has been elsewhere remarked, may also be taken into the calculation, as a resource for obviating the scarcity of hands—lastly, the attraction of foreign emigrants. Whoever inspects with a careful eye, the composition of our towns, will be made sensible to what an extent this resource may be relied upon. This exhibits a large proportion of ingenious and valuable workmen, in different arts and trades, who, by expatriating from Europe, have improved their own condition, and added to the industry and wealth of the United States. It is a natural inference from the experience, we have already had, that as soon as the United States shall present the countenance of a serious prosecution of manufactures, as soon as foreign artists shall be made sensible that the state of things here affords a moral certainty of employment and encouragement, competent numbers of European workmen will transplat themselves, effectually to insure the success of the design. How indeed can it otherwise happen, considering the various and powerful inducements, which the situation of this country offers, addressing themselves to so many strong passions and feelings, to so many general and particular interests?

It may be affirmed, therefore, in respect to hands for carrying on manufactures, that we shall in a great measure trade upon a foreign stock; reserving our own for the cultivation of our lands, and the manning of our ships, as far as character and circumstances shall incline. It is not unworthy of remark, that the objection to the success of manufactures, deduced from the scarcity of hands, is alike applicable to trade and navigation; and yet these are perceived to flourish, without any sensible impediment from that cause.

As to the dearth of labor, (another of the obstacles alleged) this has relation principally to two circumstances; one, that which has been just discussed, or the scarcity of hands; the other, the greatness of profits.

As far as it is a consequence of the scarcity of hands, it is mitigated by all the considerations which have been adduced as lessening that deficiency. It is certain, too, that the disparity in this respect, between some of the most manufacturing parts of Europe and a large proportion of the United States, is not nearly so great as is commonly imagined. It is also much less in regard to country laborers; and while a careful comparison shows, that there is, in this particular, much exaggeration; it is also evident, that the effect of the degree of disparity which does truly exist, is diminished in proportion to the use which can be made of machinery.

To illustrate this last idea—let it be supposed, that the difference of price, in two countries, of a given quantity of manual labor, requisite to the fabrication of a given article, is as ten; and that some mechanic power is introduced into both countries, which, performing half the necessary labor, leaves only half to be done by hand, it is evident, that the difference in the cost of the fabrication of the article in question, in the two countries, as far as it is connected with the price of labor, will be reduced from ten to five, in consequence of the introduction of that power.

This circumstance is worthy of the most particular attention. It diminishes immensely one of the objections, most strenuously urged, against the success of manufactures in the United States.

To procure all such machines as are known in any part of Europe, can only require a proper provision and site plans. The knowledge of several of the most important of them is already possessed. The preparation of them here, is, in most cases, practicable on nearly equal terms. As far as they depend on water, some superiority of advantages may be claimed, from the uncommon variety and greater cheapness of the situations adapted to mills, with which different parts of the United States abound.

So far as the dearth of the labor may be a consequence of the greatness of profits in any branch of business, it is no obstacle to its success. The undertaker can afford to pay the price.

There are grounds to conclude that undertakers of manufactures in this country can, at this time, afford to pay higher wages to the workmen they may employ, than are paid to similar workmen in Europe. The prices of foreign fabrics, in the markets of the United States, which will for a long time regulate the prices of the domestic ones, may be considered as compounded of the following ingredients: The first cost of materials, including the taxes, if any, which are paid upon them where they are made—the expense of ground, buildings, machinery and tools—the wages of the persons employed in the manufactory—the profits on the capital or stock employed—the commissions of agents to purchase them where they are made—the expense of transportation to the United States, including insurance and other incidental charges—the taxes or duties, if any, and fees of office which are paid on their exportation—the taxes or duties, and fees of office which are paid on their importation.

As to the first of these items, the cost of materials, the advantage, upon the whole, is at present on the side of the United States, and the difference in their favor, must increase, in proportion as a certain and extensive domestic demand shall induce the proprietors of land to devote more of their attention to the production of those materials. It ought not to escape observation, in a comparison on this point, that some of the principal manufacturing countries of Europe are much more dependent on foreign supply for the materials of their manufactures, than would be the United States, who are capable of supplying themselves with a greater abundance, as well as a greater variety of the requisite material.

As to the second item, the expense of grounds, buildings, machinery and tools, an equality at least may be assumed; since advantages in some particulars will counterbalance temporary disadvantages in others.

As to the third item, or the article of wages, the comparison certainly turns against the United States; though, as before observed, not in so great a degree as is commonly supposed.

The fourth item is like applicable to the foreign and to the domestic manufactory. It is indeed more properly a result than a particular, to be compared.

But with respect to all the remaining items, they are alone applicable to the foreign manufactory, and in the strictest sense extraordinary; constituting a sum of extra charge on the foreign fabric, which cannot be estimated at less than from fifteen to thirty per cent. on the cost of it at the manufactory.

This sum of extra charge may be confidently regarded as more than a counterpoise for the real difference in the price of labor; and it is a satisfactory proof that manufactures may prosper in defiance of it in the United States.

To the general allegation, connected with the circumstances of scarcity of hands and dearth of labor that extensive manufactures can only grow out of a redundant or full population, it will be sufficient, to answer generally, that the fact has been otherwise. That the situation, alleged to be an essential condition of success, has not been that of several nations, at periods when they had already attained to maturity in a variety of manufactures.

The supposed want of capital for the prosecution of manufactures in the United States, is the most infinite of the objections which are usually opposed to it.

It is very difficult to pronounce any thing precise concerning the real extent of the nominal capital of a country, and still more concerning the proportion which it bears to the objects that invite the employment of capital. It is not less difficult to pronounce how far the effect of any given quantity of money, as capital, or, in other words, as a medium for circulating the industry and property of a nation, may be increased by the very circumstance of the addition, which is given to it by new objects of employment. That effect, like the momentum of descending bodies, may not improperly be represented, as in a compound ratio to mass and velocity. It seems pretty certain, that a given sum of money, in a situation, in which the quick impulses of commercial activity were little felt, would appear inadequate to the circulation of as great a quantity of industry and property, as in one, in which their full influence was experienced.

It is not obvious, why the same objections might not as well be made to external commerce as to manufactures; since it is manifest that our immense tracts of land, occupied, and unoccupied, are capable of giving employment to more capital than is actually bestowed upon them. It is certain, that the United States offer a vast field for the advantageous employment of capital, but it does not follow, that there will not be found, in one way or another, a sufficient fund, for the successful prosecution of any species of industry which is likely to prove truly beneficial.

The following considerations are of a nature to remove all inquietude on the score of want of capital.

The introduction of banks, as has been shown on another occasion, has a powerful tendency to extend the active capital of a country. Experience of the utility of these institutions is multiplying them in the United States. It is probable that they will be established wherever they can exist with advantage.

and wherever they can be supported, if administered with prudence, they will add new energies to all pecuniary operations.

The aid of foreign capital may safely, and with considerable latitude, be taken into calculation. Its instrumentality has been long experienced in our external commerce; and it has begun to be felt in various other modes. Not only our funds but our agriculture and other internal improvements have been animated by it. It has already, in a few instances, extended even to our manufactures.

It is a well known fact, that there are parts of Europe, which have more capital, than profitable domestic objects of employment. Hence, among other proofs, the large loans continually furnished to foreign states. And it is equally certain, that the capital of other parts may find more profitable employment in the United States, than at home. And notwithstanding there are weighty inducements to prefer the employment of capital at home, even at less profit, to an investment of it abroad, though with greater gain, yet these inducements are overruled, either by a deficiency of employment, or by a very material difference in profit. Both these causes operate to produce a transfer of foreign capital to the United States. 'Tis certain, that various objects in this country hold out advantages, which are with difficulty to be equalled elsewhere; and under the increasingly favorable impressions, which are entertained of our government, the attractions will become more and more strong. These impressions will prove a rich mine of prosperity to the country, if they are confirmed and strengthened by the progress of our affairs. And to secure this advantage, little more is necessary, than to foster industry, and to cultivate order and tranquility, at home and abroad.

It is not impossible, that there may be persons disposed to look with a jealous eye on the introduction of foreign capital, as if it were an instrument to deprive our own citizens of the profits of our own industry; but perhaps there never could be a more unreasonable jealousy. Instead of being viewed as a rival, it ought to be considered as a most valuable auxiliary; conducing to put in motion a greater quantity of productive labor, and a greater portion of useful enterprize than could exist without it. It is at least evident, that in a country situated like the United States, with an infinite fund of resources, yet to be unfolded, every farthing of foreign capital, which is laid out in internal ameliorations, and in industrious establishments of a permanent nature, is a precious acquisition.

And whatever be the objects which originally attract foreign capital, when once introduced, it may be directed towards any purpose of beneficial exertion, which is desired. And to detain it among us, there can be no expedient so effectual as to enlarge the sphere, within which it may be usefully employed: though introduced merely with views to speculations in the funds, it may afterwards be rendered subservient to the interests of agriculture, commerce and manufactures.

But the attraction of foreign capital for the direct purpose of manufactures ought not to be deemed a chimerical expectation. There are already examples of it, as remarked in another place. And the examples, if the disposition be cultivated, can hardly fail to multiply. There are also instances of another kind, which serve to strengthen the expectation; enterprizes for improving the public communications, by cutting canals, opening the obstructions in rivers, and erecting bridges, have received very material aid from the same source.

When the manufacturing capitalist of Europe shall advert to the many important advantages which have been intimated, in the course of this report, he cannot but perceive very powerful inducements to a transfer of himself and his capital to the United States. Among the reflections, which is most interesting peculiarity of situation is calculated to suggest, it cannot escape his observation, as a circumstance of moment in the calculation, that the progressive population and improvement of the United States, ensure a continually increasing domestic demand for the fabrics which he shall produce, not to be affected by any external casualties or vicissitudes.

But while there are circumstances sufficiently strong to authorise a considerable degree of reliance on the aid of foreign capital, towards the attainment of the object in view, it is satisfactory to have good ground of assurance, that there are domestic resources of themselves adequate to it. It happens, that there is a species of capital, actually existing within the United States, which relieves from all inquietude, on the score of want of capital. This is the funded debt.

The effect of a funded debt, as a species of capital, has been noticed upon a former occasion; but a more particular elucidation of the point seems to be required by the stress which is here laid upon it: this shall accordingly be attempted.

Public funds answer the purpose of capital, from the estimation in which they are usually held by monied men; and consequently from the ease and dispatch with which they can be turned into money. This capacity of prompt convertibility into money causes a transfer of stock to be in a great number of cases equivalent to a payment in coin—and where it does not happen to suit the party who is to receive, to accept a transfer of stock, the party who is to pay, is never at a loss to find elsewhere a purchaser of his stock, who will furnish him in lieu of it, with the coin of which he stands in need.

Hence, in a sound and settled state of the public funds, a man possessed of a sum in them can embrace any scheme of business, which offers, with as much confidence as if he were possessed of an equal sum in coin.

This operation of public funds, as capital, is too obvious to be denied: but it is objected to the idea of their operating as an augmentation of the capital of the community, that they serve to occasion the destruction of some other capital to an equal amount.

The capital which alone they can be supposed to destroy, must consist of—the annual revenue, which is applied to the payment of interest on the debt, and to the gradual redemption of the principal—he amount of the coin, which is employed in circulating the funds, or, in other words, in effecting the different alienations which they undergo.

But the following appears to be the true and accurate view of this matter—

1st. As to the point of the annual revenue requisite for the payment of interest and the redemption of principal.

As a determinate proportion will tend to perspicuity in the reasoning, let it be supposed that the annual revenue to be applied, corresponding with the modification of the six per cent. stock of the United States, is in the ratio of eight upon the hundred; that is, in the first instance, six on account of interest, and two on account of principal.

Thus far it is evident, that the capital destroyed, to the capital created, would bear no greater proportion than eight to one hundred. There would be withdrawn from the total mass of other capitals a sum of eight dollars to be paid to the public creditor, while he would be possessed of a sum of one hundred dollars, ready to be applied to any purpose, to be embarked in any enterprise, which might appear to him eligible—here then the augmentation of capital, or the excess of that which is produced, beyond that which is destroyed, is equal to ninety-two dollars.

To this conclusion it may be objected, that the sum of eight dollars is to be withdrawn annually, until the whole fund is extinguished, and it may be alleged, that in process of time a capital will be destroyed equal to that which is at first created.

But it is nevertheless true, that during the whole of the interval, between the creation of the capital of one hundred dollars, and its reduction to a sum not greater than that of the annual revenue appropriated to its redemption—there will be a greater active capital in existence, than if no debt had been contracted. The sum drawn from other capitals, in any one year, will not exceed eight dollars; but there will be, at every instant of time during the whole period in question, a sum corresponding with so much of the principal as remains unredeemed, in the hands of some persons or other, employed, or ready to be employed, in any one of the undertakings. There will, therefore, consequently be more capital, in capacity to be employed, than capital taken from employment. The excess, for the first year, has been stated to be ninety-two dollars; it will diminish yearly; but there always will be an excess, until the principal of the debt is brought to a level with the redeeming annuity; that is, in the case which has been assumed by way of example, to eight dollars. The result of this success becomes palpable, if it be supposed, as often happens, that the citizens of a foreign country import into the United States one hundred dollars for the purchase of an equal sum of public debt: here is an absolute augmentation of the mass of circulating coin to the extent of one hundred dollars. At the end of a year, the foreigner is presumed to draw back eight dollars, on account of his principal and interest; but he still leaves ninety-two of his original deposit in circulation, as he in like manner leaves eighty-four, at the end of the second year, drawing back then also the annuity of eight dollars; and thus the matter proceeds; the capital left in circulation diminishing each year, and coming nearer to the level of the annuity drawn back. There are, however, some differences in the above operation of the part of the debt, which is purchased by foreigners and that which remains in the hands of citizens. But the general effect, in each case, though in different degrees, is to add to the active capital of the country.

Having the reasoning has proceeded on a conception of the position, that there is a destruction of some other capital, to the extent of the annuity appropriated to the payment of the interest and the redemption of the principal of the debt; but in this, too much has been conceded. There is, at most, a temporary transfer of some other capital, to the amount of the annuity, from those who pay, to the creditor who receives; which he again restores to the circulation, to resume the offices of a capital. To be done either immediately, by employing the money in some branch of industry, or mediately by lending it to some other person, who does so employ it, or by spending it on his own maintenance. In either supposition, there is no destruction of capital; it is only something more than a suspension of its motion for a time; that is, while it is passing from the hands of those who pay into the public coffers, and thence through the public creditor, into some other channel of circulation. When the payments of interest are periodical and quick, and made by the instrumentality of banks, the diversion or suspension of capital may almost be denominated momentary. Hence the deduction on this account is far less, than it at first sight appears to be.

Boston Memorial.

We have been requested to register the following memorial; and, as it falls immediately into the plan of the work, we are happy to oblige. The object is to shew the ground the merchants took, when England, by an order in council, had merely touched the carrying-trade; i. e. a dealing in the commodities of other nations. It will be recollected that the de-avers prohibited, in a much more extensive manner, the transportation of our own productions, except on paying a duty or tribute on them at a British port, and the like on the return cargoes.

To the president of the United States, and the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled.

The subscribers, a committee of the merchants of the town of Boston, duly empowered for the purpose, respectfully ask leave to address the government on a subject highly interesting to the commerce and prosperity of the United States, and involving in its results a great pecuniary property, acquired as they believe by honest exertions in the prosecution of an open, fair, and authorised trade.

While your memorialists have witnessed with mingled feelings of indignation towards the perpetrators, and of commiseration for their unfortunate countrymen, the results and barbarities which the commerce of these states has sustained from the cruelties of France and Spain, it is their object in the present memorial, to confine their animadversions to the more alarming, because more numerous and extensive detentions and condemnations of American vessels by Great Britain; and to advert to the principles recently avowed, and adopted by her courts, relative to neutral trade in articles of colonial produce. Principles which, if admitted, or practised upon in all the latitude which may fairly be inferred to be intended, would be destructive of the navigation, and radically impair the most lucrative commerce of our country.

The law of nations, like all other laws not formed by express compact, must, to give it an obligatory force, be founded on the rule of right, and be construed to exist only from open declaration, or from a tacit acquiescence under its operation by the parties interested in it.

It is a law which can never be considered as absolutely permanent, for being established by common consent for the general good, it can only be supported so long as it produces the effect intended, and so various are the changes in the political world from the relative situation of states at different epochs, and from the growth of new empires, that it may very possibly happen, that what promoted the public happiness at one time, and therefore became part of the law of nations, might at another period tend only to the aggrandizement of an individual nation, at the expense, and to the depression and injury of many other nations.—In such case, it is but reasonable to expect, that old principles, even if they had been once expressly admitted, would become obsolete, or be newly modified, and made to conform to a state of nations widely different from that in which they originated.—at any rate, your memorialists presume it can never be justly contended, that principles of maritime law have been admitted by a nation, during whose existence they had never been avowed nor acted upon, merely because such nation did not anticipate and combat pretensions which it never imagined would be seriously advocated. Principles that had been virtually abandoned subsequently to their first avowal, even during an intermediate and intertate war, and during the prosecution of a trade which is now interdicted and alleged to be illegal, but which trade was at that time sanctioned by the promulgated decisions of her courts, and by an official communication from one of the highest organs of the very government which is now attempting to destroy it, and with its suppression to annihilate, or greatly diminish the commerce of neutral nations.

From the decree of the lords of appeal in the case of the Essex, Omei, from the judgment of Sir Wm. Scott, in several other cases since that decree, in direct contravention of his former decisions—from the multiplied arrestations and detentions of American vessels, of which every arrival furnishes a more extended list—there is great cause to apprehend, that the British government mean to set up a principle—That she has a right to interdict all commerce by neutrals to the ports of her enemies, which ports had not been open previously to the commencement of hostilities—that if she permits a trade with them in any degree, she has a right to prescribe the limits of it—to investigate the invasion of the parties prosecuting it, and if such invasion be not the actual disposition of the property in the neutral country, to establish the merchandise, even if of the importation into such country, after having been landed therein, re-landed and the duties paid on it, as only in the stage of a cartel and direct voyage from the colony to the mother country, or vice versa, and therefore illegal, and liable to condemnation.

Speculating upon the apparent avowal of these principles, the vice-admiral judges of Great Britain, the officers of her ships of war and cruizers, seem to consider them as the signal for harassing and arresting neutral commerce, and vigorously acting in conformity with these impressions. We find that scarcely an American vessel can pass the Bahamas, the straits of Gibraltar, or the English channel, without being seized, in some cases condemned, and in others released either without damages, or with the conviction, that the demand for compensation would be attended with greater expense than would be defrayed by a successful pursuit of it.

In some instances, your memorialists find new vessels on their first passage from the United States to Europe, arrested, carried out of their course, and injuriously detained under the vexatious pretence of a continuity of voyage from the country or colony of a belligerent.

In another instance they have witnessed a vessel captured and condemned under the most frivolous pretext, when in the prosecution of an acknowledged and permitted trade, under circumstances which banished every shadow of doubt, as to the real destination of the vessel, the identity of the owners, or the actual intentions of the parties.

Your memorialist allude to the case of the Indus, Myrick, which vessel was owned by gentlemen of this town, not engaged in commission business—possessing very abundant capital to undertake large and distant enterprizes, and the fairness of whose intentions or conduct, has never been questioned or suspected.

The Indus proceeded from Boston to Batavia, there purchased a cargo, and on the return thereof to Boston, was dismantled, and after suffering severely from the elements, obliged to put into the Mauritius—on her arrival there, the ship was found too much injured to prosecute the voyage, was condemned as not seaworthy, and sold.—The capt not being able satisfactorily to dispose of the sale of France of that part of the cargo which remained after defraying the expenses, purchased another vessel, gave her the same name, put on board the residue of her original cargo, and completed his loading with freight belonging to citizens of this town—with this remnant saved from his misfortunes, he proceeded on the voyage, and had nearly reached the mouth of our harbor, when his vessel was captured by a British cruizer, carried into H. M. S., and there by the Vice-admiralty court condemned, but causing among the papers were found, a memorandum reminding the captain after his arrival within the harbor of Boston, to insert in the manifest to be delivered at the custom house, that the ship was bound "for Boston and Embden,"—a provision merely intended to operate in case of the restoration of peace before the return of the vessel, and which, as the laws of the United States were, when she departed from Boston, was needful to enable her to proceed to Batavia without unloading the cargo, or the payment of duties; and which provision, the captain must have been well convinced, was rendered wholly nugatory with the second ship, because when he left the United States he knew, that if any part of a cargo was entered the whole must be landed; and having taken freight which he was obliged to deliver here, there no longer remained an objection respecting the termination of the voyage, and that it must of necessity be concluded at Boston.

The precautionary memorandum to insert in the manifest after the arrival of the vessel in the harbor, the words "Boston and Embden," was practised at the time for the same purpose by many of our most correct and intelligent merchants and is no evidence of an intention to avail of the permission which it gave to proceed to Europe. In the case of the Indus the owners have disavowed most formally, under the existing political state of Europe, any intention of continuing the voyage; and this avowal, is corroborated by the strongest collateral evidence it is possible to adduce—the same orders having been given in previous enterprizes, in none of which had the permission been availed of—but in every case in which they were interested, the cargoes had been actually landed and sold in the United States, notwithstanding a similar declaration in the manifests.

In another case, your memorialists learn, that a vessel (the Aurora, H. M.) belonging to Portsmouth in New Hampshire, after having carried out a cargo of innocent merchandise, the property of natives and merchants of this town, to the neutral port of Leghorn, ordered from thence with specie to Calcutta, and from thence to return with a cargo to this place, has been arrested in the progress of the voyage, carried into Gibraltar, and may probably be condemned, because her outward cargo consisted of colonial produce, and because the captain was permitted by his orders to stop at the isle of France, on his voyage to Calcutta, and to avail of the state of the markets there, should they be favorable to procure a return cargo for Boston; thus embarrassing a trade, which, whether prosecuted to the one place or to the other, has by all parties been considered as open, and extending the tent of a cargo of colonial produce further, than by most nations is attached to a loading of articles wholly contraband of war, for it is admitted by them even in that case, that the office is deposited with the cargo, and ceases on its delivery.

Your memorialists will not proceed to fatigue the attention of government by citing cases, which they presume, so soon as regular documents can be obtained, will be transmitted in precise statements to the department of state. These few instances they have thought it needful to notice, in order to demonstrate, that unless the present disposition of British admiralty courts, and navy officers can be counteracted and removed, a widely dispersed and unprotected commerce, extending to every region of the globe, will only serve to invite depredation, to bankrupt ourselves, and enrich others, until such commerce be swept from the face of the ocean, and leave nothing in its stead, but sentiments of hostility, and acts of contention.

Without entering into elaborate disquisitions, your memorialists request permission to make a few remarks on what they conceive to be the principles assumed by Great Britain.

1st. It is contended by Great Britain, that she has the right to interdict entirely a trade by neutrals to the ports of her enemies, such ports not having been open to them in time of peace, and that having the right to interdict this trade altogether, she has, a fortiori, the right to modify it as she pleases—and of consequence, if an enemy nation should remain in a state of war for half a century, any alteration of her colonial system, which, very probably the progress of events might have produced in time of peace, shall not be permitted to her, even should there have taking place during that time, a total and acknowledged revolution of her government, and an abolition of all her ancient systems.

2dly. That having allowed a direct trade between the colonies of her enemies, and neutral countries, she has a right to say, that such trade shall cease and determine in the neutral state—and that to prevent its further progress, she has the right to examine in all cases, to whom property found on the ocean belongs—to trace the evidences of a continuity of trade—to investigate the latent intentions of neutral merchants—to discriminate between importers and exporters—and then to accord to one part of a community, what she denies to another part.

A tacit submission to pretensions thus lofty and comprehensive, but which your memorialists trust are most of them untenable, would, they conceive, be an abandonment of rights openly recognized, and a direlection of the most important commercial interests of our country.

Reason and the most powerful considerations of equity enjoin it as a duty on the United States to oppose these pretensions; for circumstanced as those states are, possessing an immensely extended and fertile territory, producing mostly the necessities of life, which, with the merchandize obtained from abroad by the industry and enterprise of her citizens, she is obliged to barter or furnish in payment for importations of foreign produce or manufactures—It behoves her, strenuously to contend for the right of an open commerce in innocent articles between other nations that are willing to accord with it and herself; for if the right be not both claimed and admitted, scarcely any of the European powers can in future be engaged in warfare, without making the United States, in opposition both to her efforts and wishes either a victim or a party in the contest; for it is well known that the trade of this country with nearly all the colonies of European powers is carried on by occasional permissions, and by partial relaxations of the prohibitory system, and if the British contend, that the port of Batavia shall not be opened to neutrals in time of war, because it has ordinarily been closed against them in periods of peace—that the temporary permission to trade there, was extorted merely by the pressure of the maritime superiority of Great Britain, and that to relieve this pressure by the purchase of Javenee produce was counteracting the effect of her arms, and giving aid to her enemies in the war. It might with equal force, by parity of reasoning be contended by France, or any other nation at war with Great Britain, that the limited permission given to the United States to trade to Jamaica in articles of the first necessity, was evidently granted with reluctance, and was extorted by the power of their arms on the continent of Europe; that to oppose and counterbalance these, Great Britain was necessitated to victual and man immense fleets, and to organize and support numerous armies—that to provision these fleets, and to provide for these armies consumed all the produce of her country—that not having any articles of subsistence to spare, she must therefore either abandon her colonies to famine, or reduce or distress her armaments by diverting from them, part of the supplies destined to their support—and that for the citizens of the U. States to step in, and avail of even a six weeks permission to supply her colonies, and thus prevent their falling an easy prey into the arms of France from the pressure of their own necessities, was actually giving aid, and comfort, and existence to the enemy of France, was in effect making a common cause with her, and of course rendered the vessels of the United States, when captured in the prosecution of such trade, lawful prizes to the cruisers of France.—Thus your memorialists conceive these pretensions afford constant sources of collision, continually tending to involve these states in the issue of European wars, and would oblige the government on the occurrence of such wars, speedily to unite with one or other of the parties in order that the commerce of the country might lawfully avail itself of some degree of security, from the protection which its own force, and that of its allies could afford.

To this state of things your memorialists believe it can neither be the interest nor wish of the British government, to reduce our country.

The right of internal commercial regulation in articles of an innoxious nature is one of the essential and inherent rights of every independent sovereignty and with the exception of a trade to blockaded ports, or in articles contraband of war, every government has a right to sell the surplus articles of its manufactures and produce to neutral merchants, who on their part, so long as they confine themselves to a fair and honorable course of dealing, purchasing exclusively for their own account; and refusing to cover the property of a belligerent, are entitled to the protection of their own, and the respect of other governments—for the most tenacious advocates for the rights of belligerents admit, that during war, neutrals have a right to enjoy in the utmost latitude the trade to which they had been accustomed in time of peace. Now if a belligerent has a right to blockade an extended sea coast, and to exclude neutrals from perhaps fifty different ports (as was the French ports in the channel during the last war) how can the neutral enjoy his usual peace trade in its greatest latitude, unless this deprivation is balanced by another trade which is opened to him during the war?

As to the inquisitorial right of search into the ownership of neutral property set up by Great Britain, and the doctrine appended to it; that a neutral importer shall not again export his goods, but that they shall be first alienated and passed into the possession of others—Your memorialists believe them to be unsound in point of principle, offensive in practice and nugatory in effect—for the importation of merchandise into a neutral country, landing it, payment of duties on it, and exposing it for sale, as fully domesticates such merchandize, and makes it as much a part of the marketable stock of the country as the corn which is raised in its fields, or the beef that is fatted on its mountains; and thence-forward it becomes as much the right of one citizen as of another, to export, or appropriate it, as he chooses, and the attempt by another government subsequently to discriminate, and to deprive a neutral merchant of the right to purchase a cargo for exportation, because possibly he owned a fiftheth part of it on importation, can only excite irritation—invite collision—lead to fictitious sales, and eventually would diminish in a very small, if in any degree, shipments of foreign produce.

This doctrine is probably more injurious in its operation on the U. States than to any other country. Second to no nation on the earth in enterprize, her citizens are yet inferior to those of in any other countries in capital—hence arises the necessity of numerous associates from the right of any subsequent trade in articles derived from adventures in which they had been concerned, to perhaps a very small amount, and which adventures after the arrival in the United States, are as much terminated, so far as respects a continuity of association, as if the property had been sunk in the ocean, and thus to throw advantages into the laps of their neighbors from a participation of which they are interdicted, is manifestly arbitrary and unjust.

Your memorialists would with reluctance believe that the sacred tribunals of justice have become subservient to motives of political expediency, more especially in a nation whose judicial proceedings have frequently deserved and commanded the respect of all civilized countries, yet they know not easily how to reconcile on any other ground the contradictory proceedings of the British admiralty courts during the last and present war.

In February, 1800, there came on for final adjudication before the high court of admiralty in Great Britain, the case of the Polly, Laskey. This was a vessel bound from Marblehead to Bilbao, captured, and carried into England, because she had on board 249 boxes of Havana sugars, and 50 hhd's of Caraccas cocoa, the produce of Spanish colonies, and was brought to trial, principally under the pretence that, as she was carrying those articles to a port of Spain, the trade was in effect a direct one between the colony and the mother country, and therefore illegal, and subjecting the property to condemnation.

The Polly was owned by a merchant of Marblehead, who in his attestation declared, that he had been in the habit of trading both with old Spain and with the Havana. In evidence on the trial it appeared, that the Polly on a previous voyage had been to Bilbao—that she took from thence bills of exchange on the Havana—that with these bills, she in part paid for the identical sugars which were found on board of her at the time of capture—that for the residue of the purchase, bills were drawn from the Havana on the house in Bilbao who did the business of the vessel on her former voyage—and by the certificates of the collector of the customs at Marblehead, it appeared that the sugar had been imported from the Havana on board the Polly in June, and exported by her to Bilbao in August—the intermediate time being employed in repairing the vessel, and preparing her for the voyage. It also appeared by the deposition of the mate, that the captain had destroyed some of his papers.

A case more pertinent to the question at issue, or more strongly marked, could scarcely be imagined by the strongest powers of invention.

For the captors, there appeared the king's advocate (undoubtedly one of the ablest jurists in the nation) and Mr. Arnold. In delivering its judgment, the court asked, whether it were contended that an American could not purchase articles of this nature, and import them bona fide to America on his own account, and afterwards export them? It was answered, no.—The court then stated, that an American has undoubtedly a right to import the produce of the Spanish colonies for his own use, and after it is imported bona fide into his own country, he would be at liberty to carry them on to the general commerce of Europe. The vessel and cargo were restored to the neutral claimants.

In 1801, in consequence of a decree of the vice-admiralty court at Nassau, condemning the cargo of an American vessel going from the United States to a port in the Spanish colonies, with a cargo consisting of articles the growth of old Spain—our highly respectable and able minister at the court of London immediately addressed lord Hawkesbury, his majesty's secretary for foreign affairs, and remonstrated in a respectful, but firm and dignified manner, against this infringement and violation of the rights of neutrals. The remonstrance met that prompt attention from the British government which its merits demanded. The subject was referred to the consideration of the advocate general, who reported, that the sentence of the vice-admiralty court at Nassau was founded in error,—that it was now (1801) distinctly understood, and had been repeatedly so decided by the high court of appeals, that the produce of the colonies of the enemy may be imported by a neutral into his own country, and may be re-exported from thence even to the mother country of such colony; and in like manner, the produce and manufactures of the mother country, may in this circuitous route legally find their way to the colonies—that a direct trade had not been recognized as legal, and the decision of what was, or was not, a direct trade, was a question of some difficulty, but that the high court of admiralty had expressly decided, and the advocate-general saw no reason to expect the court of appeals would vary the rule, that loading the goods, and paying the duties in the neutral country, breaks the continuity of the voyage, and is such an importation as legalizes the trade, although the goods be re-shipped in the same vessel, and on account of the same neutral proprietors, and forwarded for sale to the mother country.

The report of the advocate-general was accepted by the British government, immediately transmitted by lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King; and by his majesty's express command, communicated by the duke of Portland, the principal secretary of state, to the lords commissioners of the admiralty, with the information, that it was his majesty's pleasure, that the doctrine laid down in the advocate-general's report, should be immediately made known to the several judges of the vice-admiralty courts, setting forth to them what is held to be law upon the subject, by the superior tribunals, for their future guidance and direction.

Thus are obtained so recently as within five years, the deliberate opinions on the subject under discussion, of the most eminent English civilians, and of the high court of admiralty, corroborated (if one of the first law officers of the crown may be credited) by the repeated decisions of the same court of appeals, which by its late and contradictory decree in the case of the Essex, Guac, has caused so disastrous an arrestation and condemnation of American property.

Judgments thus peremptorily stated, and enforced by the highest authority, it was fair to consider as intended for a beacon, to direct to the channel through which neutral commerce might be prosecuted with security. It is hoped the event will not prove, they were a mere ignis fatuus to ensnare the innocent and unsuspecting.

At any rate, whether the doctrine were sound or not, or whether it injured Great Britain or not, it cannot become the integrity and magnanimity of a great and powerful nation, at once, and without notice, to reverse her rule of conduct towards other states, and to prey upon the unprotected property of a friendly power, the extension of whose commerce had been invited by the formal avowal of her intentions, and prosecuted under a reliance on her good faith, and from the confidence reposed, that her courts—uniform in their principles—would never be influenced by the time-serving politics of the moment.

But whatever may have been the motives for the proceedings on the part of Great Britain, the effect is notorious. From her recent conduct, great losses have been sustained, our commerce has been checked and embarrassed, and large quantities of produce are now remaining locked up in this country which were purchased for foreign markets, because our merchants cannot send it abroad, without taking risks on themselves which prudence would not justify, or without paying such rates for insurance as the trade of the country cannot afford.

Thus circumstanced, the merchants of Boston have thought it their duty respectfully to make known their complaints to the government. Believing the citizens of the United States desirous of cultivating relations of amity with the whole human race, and particularly connected as they are with Great Britain, by habits of constant intercourse and by mutual wants, they cannot but hope, that like dispositions are entertained by the British nation towards this country, and if measures were speedily taken for the amicable discussion by negotiation of our complaints, that a sense of her own interest, and a respect for the rights of others, would induce her to depart from her present measures, and to conduct towards us with justice and liberality.

Under this persuasion, and without meaning in the smallest degree to derogate from the talents or attention of the American minister at the court of London, the subscribers, with deference and humility, beg leave to suggest, whether, when so important national interests are at stake, a special mission would not carry with it great influence, and be very instrumental in the accomplishment of our reasonable wishes.

In all events, fully relying that the subject of our differences with Great Britain will receive the due consideration of government, and that such measures will in consequence be promptly adopted, as will tend to disembarrass our commerce—assure our arguments—AND SUPPORT THE DIGNITY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Degradation of the Press.

The following articles, so completely expose the condition of the British Press, and contain so many important things, that are certainly true, that we could not refuse to record them for the guidance of our readers on receiving intelligence, first so mingled "at home," and then, re-clopped and doubly obscured by kindred spirits in the United States.

FROM COBBETT'S WEEKLY REGISTER.

London, September 18.

CONTINENTAL WAR.—From the moment of the re-commencement of this war, I was of opinion, and I expressed that opinion, that Bonaparte would defeat the Allies; that he would break up the coalition; and that he would then dictate terms to his enemies. My reasons for this opinion I have given at length—and I have heard nothing, from any quarter, in answer to those reasons. It is impossible, to restrain one's indignation at viewing the endeavors which are used, by the press of both the political factions in this country, to prevent the people from coming at the real truth with regard to the prospects in the war, and even with regard to events which have actually taken place. The French Bulletins, which will be found in another part of this paper, give a complete history of the campaign up to the 30th Aug. and from these bulletins it appears, that the Allied army, commanded by the Emperors of Russia and Austria and the King of Prussia, had been defeated by the French army under Bonaparte with the loss of sixty thousand men, sixty pieces of cannon, and forty stand of colors. Is there any one in his senses who doubts of the truth of this statement? I do not believe that there is any such person in England, if he has been accustomed to compare the statements of the French Bulletins with the facts as they have afterwards proved to be. Indeed, none but those whose wish, and, indeed, whose business it is, to deceive the people, can doubt of the truth of this statement on the part of the French. If the statement be true, it appears to me, that very little further resistance will be made, by the Austrians, at least. They have received such a blow at the outset as to sicken them. There will, doubtless, be more battles fought; and, it will be hard, indeed, if our new friends, Bernadotte and Moreau, do not give us some little proof of their skill and courage; but I really do not expect that we shall hear of the grand French army meeting with a serious repulse. I expect to hear, that that army has been, with very few exceptions, as rapid in gaining victories, as during any former campaign. In the meanwhile, it is right to notice (though, perhaps it may produce no good effect) the frauds which have been practised in England, with a view of deceiving the people with regard to these important events. During the former part of the last week, it was stated in the London newspapers, that Bernadotte had attacked the French army, had gained a great victory over it, and had killed one French Marshal, and mortally wounded another. This lie served to feed the thinking people of England for three days.—At the end of that time the French papers had come to hand, and had discovered, not only that Bernadotte had gained no victory at all, and had merely been able to stand his ground for a little while, in the face of a mere detachment from the French army; but these papers also informed us that the Allies had been defeated by the French, in the manner above stated. The manner in which it was contrived to keep this latter fact from the public for three days, is very curious, and deserving of a particular account put upon record. There is nothing in which the people are more interested than in the means that are thus made use of to deceive them. They are constantly told of the deceptions practised upon the people of France. They are bidden to be proud of the freedom of the press, which exists in their own country; they are bidden to compare the political sunshine in which they live, with the darkness in which the people of France are kept. And, yet they are at the same time the most completely duped of any nation that ever existed in this world. Not to suffer men to print at all upon the subject of politics and political news; this is not the way to deceive the people; this is not the way effectually to keep them in the dark as to the truth. The way to effect this purpose is to have a press, which the people shall regard as being free, and which, from the workings of various unseen wheels, from an influence flowing through numerous obscure and intricate channels, shall convey to the people falsehood instead of truth. He who knows nothing of any event that takes place, is in a better situation, in point of knowledge, than he who believes that which is false with respect to the events which take place. No knowledge at all, is better than a belief that you know facts, of which you really know only the contrary. The man who has lost a horse, which has been stolen, and taken towards the East, is in a worse situation, from believing that the horse is gone towards the West, than he would be in, if wholly at a loss to guess which way his horse was gone. To leave hounds at a fault, is much better than to call them off and put them upon a wrong scent. These are almost self-evident propositions; and upon the principle on which these propositions proceed, we may, I think, safely affirm, that it would be better for a nation to have no press at all, than a press which feeds it with falsehoods. A press which has no pretensions to freedom; a press like that of France, which is well known to be openly avowed, to be under the previous inspection of the government; a press, like the press in India, which can send forth nothing which has not first received the approbation of some officer under the government, who, sometimes, crosses out advertisements, if they relate to publications which he disapproves: I say, that a press like this is just mischievous, because less calculated to deceive, than a press which the people believe to be free, but which is, in fact, under the control of those, who find it their interest, ninety-nine times out of a hundred, to publish falsehood and not truth. Such a press as this is the grand instrument of deception, of delusion, of producing in a nation a total perversion of the mind: and such a press now exists in England.

The people of France read the newspapers as publications made by the government, and, of course, they believe no more of them than they see supported by real acts and occurrences. They judge from the evidence of their senses; and, accordingly, they are not deceived. But the people in England, looking upon every editor of a newspaper, as being at perfect liberty to say what he thinks, and more especially to publish true accounts of what is passing in the world; and the said people, not being able to get behind the curtain, to see the reason why editors of papers should prefer falsehood to truth, naturally believe all that they read; and therefore, they are, as to political events, the most deceived people in the world. There are certain documents, however, which, though calculated to circulate disagreeable truths, it would be impossible to suppress; because, through some channel or other, such documents, like the famous 'Book,' would find their way into print; and this would totally blast the reputation of those newspapers, whose business it is, not only to promulgate falsehoods, but to cause them to be regarded as truths. The way they go to work, therefore, when they get hold of one of these documents, is, to keep it back, in the first place, as long as they can; but this cannot be done for any considerable length of time. Scarcely for more than forty-eight hours. During this in exile, they go to work with both hands, to weaken the effect of the document upon the public mind. With one hand they make a sort of summary of the contents of the document, in which, generally, they contrive to break down the document to about one-half of its real force. To this summary they subjoin a commentary of their own—in which they endeavor to show, that the facts related in the document cannot be true; or, if true in part, only to a trifling extent. At the same time, with the other hand, they introduce some piece of intelligence of a very favorable nature. This is, in general, intelligence wholly invented for the purpose—Matched, as the saying is. It usually makes its appearance under the head of "SECOND EDITION," printed in enormously large letters, and gives an account of some very signal victory on our side. The union of these two tricks weakens the effect of the adverse intelligence of its first going forth. The next day nothing is said of the good news announced in the second edition the day before. It passes, of course uncontradicted, is believed by a vast majority of the people; and becomes recorded in their minds as true. The writers of these newspapers; the literary impostors who play these tricks, know very well, that the well-informed part of the community regard them as most impudent and profligate scoundrels; but they also know, that ninety-nine persons out of a hundred, are not well informed, and to a great part of the remainder they know that falsehood, even glaring falsehood, in the shape of good news, is more pleasing than truth, in the shape of bad news; and with this knowledge in their minds, they pocket the profit of their impudence, and laugh at the contempt of the sensible few. If I want any thing to convince me of the vast importance of the repeated victories of Napoleon, I should find it at once in the tricks of these men in announcing to the people the account of these victories.—The London press was in possession of the French bulletins on Thursday, the 9th inst. It took very good care not to publish them till Saturday, the 11th inst. In the mean while it was at work in the manner before described; and I appeal to every reader who lives in a country town, whether he did not believe, during the whole of Friday and Saturday last, that the French army had been defeated by the allies? Such, I will venture to say, was the general belief through the whole kingdom. At last, on Sunday morning, the French bulletins themselves reached the people in the country, at this distance from London. But, good use had been made of the lapse of time; for there were not only commentaries, the object of which was to show that the French bulletins could not be true; but there were victories hatched for Bernadotte, and bulletins hatched in his name, announcing such victories, which appear to have been wholly invented for the occasion; it being manifest that in the slight affair in which he was engaged, he gained no victory at all. The typographical trick played off upon this occasion, is worthy of notice. The whole mass of intelligence had for title these words: "Victory gained by the Crown Prince—Great battle near Dresden." Only observe this trick! it was a victory gained by the Crown Prince; but, it was only a great battle near Dresden, though the impostor well knew, that in half a minute from the reading of the title, every one must see that this great battle ended in a most tremendous victory gained by the emperor Napoleon.—But half a minute was something! Half a minute was a great deal as to the intelligent reader; and, as to the mass of readers, they would take care (most thinking people as they are) to carry the title full in their minds while reading the whole of the intelligence. And yet, with these tricks daily under our eyes; with these at once impudent and sorry tricks constantly staring us in the face, and with the success of these impostors well known to us all, we have the shamelessness to pretend, that the people of France are less fairly dealt with than the people of England, with regard to political intelligence! If I may be permitted to step aside for a moment, I will avail myself of it to observe, that in private concerns as well as public concerns, the English press is a base and mischievous deceiver. There are hundreds of men, who, without any fair pretensions to public esteem or admiration, have gained great celebrity—have become persons of great public consideration, and have even pocketed the profits of their reputation, in consequence of nothing but the judicious employment of their money with those who have the press in their hands. I have in my eye a man who, without one grain of talent, without one sentiment of honor, performing for years functions very little above those of a mere pimp, was regarded by the mass of the people of England, as the man above all others distinguished for refinement in all the notions of the higher order. A creature more completely devoid of real honesty, more puffed up with vanity, more weak in head or hollow of heart, more worthy of the epithet of dirty out before his name, does not, perhaps, exist in the whole world: and yet, through the means of this detestable press, he was throughout the kingdom, regarded as the profoundest of statesmen, and as the very pith of honor. It would be a curious thing to ascertain what is the actual amount of the money received at the different newspaper offices in payment of the praises they bestow upon individuals, or the inventions or property of individuals. I do not mean what they receive for those honest puffs which the lottery proprietors or the vendors of medicines put in the newspapers. There is nothing unfair in these; they are avowedly puffs; but what I complain of, are those paragraphs, which appear as if written by the editor himself, and which begin with a "We:" when, perhaps, he has never read them, or even seen them, they having been received at the office by the clerk, who, upon being paid the price of them, according to their length, has sent them up stairs to the printer for insertion. This praise, as well of the dead as of the living, is actually to be bought in London by measure; as one buys woollens and linens. The clerk to a newspaper office has a guage, by which he will tell in a moment, the stated price of any article that you present to him. There are, indeed, certain cases, where the quality, as well as the quantity, is taken into view. For instance, if the party praised be notorious and even proverbial for every species of villainy, the price is high to obtain the praise of being possessed of every virtue. It would have cost Nicholson, who seems to have been a murderer by infract, many hundred pounds, if he had had them, to obtain any thing like a decent apology for his conduct; and, perhaps, it did not cost a trifle to attribute to motives of wonderful delicacy, Goldsmith's blowing of his own brains out, and to make it appear that his corpse, in place of being buried in a cross road, was hardly sufficiently honored by being deposited in the earth amidst the lamentations of the full congregation of the children of Israel. And we are the people, are we, who have the effrontery to point the finger of scorn at the French people on account of their being kept in darkness by the press! To return to our subject—it appears that Moreau has made his exit from this nether world.—The Courier newspaper seems to lament this exceedingly, and so do I too: for I should like to have seen him live out the campaign, in order that the world might see how many soldiers of the French army would have gone over to him. The French newspapers speak the voice of the government, or, they speak not at all. But all the papers, except the official paper, may keep silence if they please.—They are at liberty to refrain from speaking; and therefore, I look upon the following article, which is taken from a French newspaper, as expressing pretty fairly the sentiments which the people of France entertain with regard to the conduct of Moreau.

Paris, September 5.—The ex-general Moreau arrived at Prague on the 20th August. Some people appeared to doubt his arrival on the continent, and his connexions with the enemies of his country. There can no longer be any doubt on this subject. This ex-general, who has for a long time resided in America, has, without doubt, heard talk of general Arnold, so celebrated in the American revolutionary war, and who, after having gloriously fought in the ranks of his countrymen, conspired against the government of his country. The conspiracy being discovered, the traitor offered his services to the English, who made use of him, by despising and condemning him to inaction and oblivion. The name of Arnold, dishonored in history, is never mentioned in America, without being accompanied by some disgraceful epithet, and children even only pronounce it with execration. Why did not such an example deter the ex-general Moreau? But he chose rather to throw off the mask, and by new steps justify the opinion of all intelligent men, whom his hypocrisy had not been able to deceive. There he then has joined the Russians and Prussians! This intelligence has dissipated all illusions respecting him. Public indignation is pronounced against him; it will pursue him to the tomb, and deliver up his name to the justice of posterity. In all times, in all countries, the man who joined the enemies of his country, lost all his titles to consideration, and did not even fail to excite contempt in those who profited by his treason. On this head, the sublime words of that model for French warriors, the chevalier Bayard, are known. He was mortally wounded fighting against the imperials, at whose head was found the constable Bourbon, who had basely sold himself to the enemies of France. The traitor arrived near Bayard, and seeing him ready to expire, could not restrain his tears—"Do not weep for me" said the chevalier, without fear and without reproach, indignantly to him, "weep for yourself for having betrayed your country and your oath."

These, I take it, are the real sentiments of the great body of the French people. They are not the sentiments of our newswriters, who, while they commend the ripping out of the quivering bowels of Englishmen found fighting against England, bestow the boldest praises on a Frenchman, who, after having been raised from poverty to riches in the armies of France, comes from America to Europe to volunteer his services in the armies of her enemies. These gentlemen have surely never read the holy scriptures, which expressly forbids the using of two weights and two measures. No, these gentlemen never read the scriptures, or they would remember that men are to be judged by the rules and maxims by which they judge others; and, if it be a crime worthy of the most terrible of deaths in an Englishman to fight against England, by what logic do they think the world is to be convinced that it is a meritorious act; nay, even an act of patriotism in a Frenchman to fight against France? They will say, perhaps, that Moreau does not like the government of France, and that he thinks that the men at the head of that government ought to be put down. In short, that it is not France that Moreau is fighting against, but against Bonaparte. Indeed! and do you think that an Englishman, found fighting against England, would not be able to make the same sort of apology for his conduct? I will warrant it, that there is no man, amongst all those that have been executed by us for this crime, who would not have saved his life, if it could have been saved upon a similar plea. Decency, one would think, common decency would be sufficient, if we had any sense of it, to restrain us from praising this man's conduct; but if we are not to be restrained by that sort of feeling, surely we ought by a reflection on the danger, which such an example might possibly have upon our soldiers and sailors.

WILLIAM COBBETT.

Botley, 14th Sept. 1813.

The following extract from the London Monthly Magazine, a work of the highest reputation. (for June last) finishes the picture that Cobbett has drawn of the BRITISH PRESS:

"We have, during successive months, warned our readers against the mischievous political delusions spread with apparent system by most of the London newspapers. All the benefits of a free press seemed suddenly to be lost to the free people of England; and the "Cossack" appeared to have bent the minds of Englishmen to a yoke of mental vassalage, almost as degrading as that of the wretched Siberians. We do not affect to trace so disgraceful a change to its sources, because they are probably so complicated as to evade our analysis; but we will state some facts relative to the present condition of the London press which ought to be made known through an independent channel, and leave it to our readers to draw inferences and connect causes with effects. It seems that owing to the re-action of political animosity, the intercourse with the continent became a few years since so uncertain and dangerous, that the newspapers found it difficult, and always very costly to procure foreign intelligence. As high a sum as 50*l.* or even 6*l.* was frequently paid for a single paper, or by a union of two or three papers, for any series of new foreign gazettes. There seemed in fact to be no limits to the competition that might be excited among the rival papers, nor to the cupidity of masters of vessels, who smuggled the documents from shore to shore. At length, as a measure of self-defence, the proprietors united in an arrangement with the Post offices, thro' which, in future, they were to be supplied simultaneously with the same extracts from the French papers.

The terms were to be 84 guineas per week, that is, 42 guineas from six morning papers, and the same sum from as many evening papers as could be induced to unite in the subscription. The latter could not agree in the arrangement and two of these papers alone shared the expense for a considerable time. At length these abandoned it also, and the 84 guineas are now paid by six morning papers, at the rate of 14 guineas each per week, or 12 guineas per day, because the Moniteur is published every day without intermission. None of the editors therefore see the foreign papers from which they publish their extracts, and we are told the inspection of them has been denied when desired on particular occasions. In stating these facts, however, we blame no one for making, imposing or submitting to arrangements which under all the circumstances might be unavoidable. Our sole object is simply to enable the public correctly to estimate and qualify the credit which is due to foreign intelligence so selected, and fully to understand the present mode in which it is brought before them. The selectors and translators may do impartial justice: but in all questions in which truth is to be separated from falsehood, we like to take as little as possible on trust; and in politics, like commerce, the best security of the public is the free competition of candidates for public favor, and the best data on which to form judgments are those which arise out of the collision of opposing interests and opinions."

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The lakes.—We are daily becoming better acquainted with the many interesting particulars that belong to these inland seas. The winds upon them appear much more uncertain than they are on the ocean; and they are also more subject to storms. The U. S. schooner Chippeway, sailed from Put-in-Bay for Malden, on the 19th ult.—within a few miles of the De troit river she parted with her anchor and was driven with great impetuosity and danger down to the lower end of the lake, under her bare poles, near Buffalo, where she beached. The crew and passengers were all saved but one, who left the vessel and attempted to make the shore on an oar; and a considerable quantity of baggage was lost, but the schooner was got off without much damage. All the rest of our vessels were in safe harbor. The lake rose nearly eight feet. The Buffalo paper says that while the storm raged many water spouts were observed on the lake, "one of which was very large, and the others smaller. The first appearance was like a whirlwind on the water, which raised a spray of a large diameter to a considerable distance in the air, from the top of which was seen to rise a column of water increasing in size until it was lost among the clouds."

A good appointment.—Certain persons of Philadelphia, associating for the purpose of celebrating our late victories, held their meeting at the sign of the "Lion turned upside down."

"Aid and comfort to the enemy?"—It is stated in the Albany Argus, that a suit of superfine Berkshire (Ms.) cloth, has been sent as a present to the Prince Regent of England. It is thought it may prove a good negotiator.

Facts are developing themselves to shew that the Spaniards at Pensacola are deeply engaged in the late proceedings of the Creeks.

One of the passengers in the ship Erie, reports, that he understood that Messrs. Galkatin and Bayard had left St. Petersburg, the latter end of August, without effecting any thing. It is further said, that they had not been received at that court by any one, as official characters.—which we do not believe.

A letter to the editor from Chatham, states it as a thing believed, that Brig. gen. Tecumseh was killed in the fight on the Thames.

The '76 association at Charleston, S. C. have voted a sword to their "absent member" lieutenant John J. Edwards, of the Niagara.

A piece of plate to the value of $400 has been voted to commodore Perry, by the citizens of Newport, R. I.

At a special meeting of the common council of New-York, a motion was made to present major-general Harrison with a sword and the freedom of the city, as the like had been bestowed on Decatur, Perry, &c. But the motion was negatived. Yeas 3, noes 12.

The prisoners taken by Perry have arrived at Chellicothe. Those made by Harrison are expected. Huts have been erected for their accommodation.

The Kentucky volunteers under governor Shelby, as well as Johnson's regiment, have been discharged, and are on their way home. Colonel Johnson, we are happy to say, is in a fair way to recover his many honorable wounds.

Steel's list, for Sept. 1813, places on the Halifax, Newfoundland, &c. stations, 71 vessels, viz. 11 of the line, 1 of 50 guns, 21 frigates, 15 sloops, 15 brigs, 2 cutters, and 6 sloopers. In the West Indies, and on the passage, 69 vessels, viz. 6 of the line, 3 from 44 to 50 guns, 17 frigates, 16 sloops, 10 brigs, 3 cutters, and 4 sloopers. On the coast of Africa, 4 sail, 3 sloops and 1 brig. South America, 23 sail, viz. 4 of the line, 3 from 44 to 50, 11 frigates, 3 sloops, 6 brigs and 1 cutter. Total at sea—383 vessels, of which 98 are of the line, 14 from 44 to 50 guns, 125 frigates, &c.

Earl Stanhope has formed a plan to counteract the American torpedoes—250 seamen are coming from England to man the fleet on lake Ontario, also 1200 troops for Canada, with some reinforcements for Bermuda and the West Indies. One of the 74's that went to fight the frigate President, in the northern seas, has returned to England, as well as she went forth, tear and wear only excepted. Nine of the late crew of the Argus have been separated from the rest of the prisoners on suspicion of being British subjects. The Erie brought despatches for government. In a late fleet that arrived in England from China and India were $1,000,000. The Madagascar frigate with her guard, the Centaur, of 74, has arrived in England, after four months cruise, without taking one prize, though they chased a schooner. Among the rarities in the London papers, are accounts of the capture of the Macedonian frigate, at sea, and also, of the destruction of our squadron in New-India.

LEXINGTON, Aug. 24.—On Friday evening, a court martial was held on board his majesty's ship Labrador, rear admiral FOOTE, president, on THOMAS MAS

nal, seaman, belonging to his majesty's ship Garland, for desertion, and for being found on board the American brig of war Vixen. The court was of opinion that the charge was proved; but in consequence of circumstances, did adjudge him to receive three hundred lashes through the fleet, to forfeit all his wages, and to solitary confinement in the Marshalsea for 12 calendar months.

The French naval force in the Texel is very considerable, several vessels are apparently ready for sea. Much vigilance is used to prevent communication with the British ships on the coast. The fishing boats that come out being escorted by gun vessels, to keep off the English barges.

It is variously reported that 4 ships of the line and 3 frigates, were about to leave France for New-York. The news comes through the English papers; which further say that out of the many prizes lately sent in, the French had got 137 volunteers to proceed in the frigates for the United States.

The dashing expeditions of our privateers have given new spirit to the French, who have latterly made many valuable prizes in the British channel.

By William Henry Harrison, major-general in the army of the United States, and commander in chief of the 5th Military District.

A PROCLAMATION.

The enemy having been driven from the territory of Michigan, and a part of the army under my command having taken possession of it, it becomes necessary that the civil government of the territory should be re-established, and the former officers renew the exercise of their authority; I have therefore thought proper to proclaim, that all appointments and commissions which have been derived from British officers, are at an end, that the citizens of the territory are restored to all the rights and privileges which they enjoyed previously to the capitulation made by general Hull on the 15th of August 1812. Under the present circumstances, and until the will of the government be known, I have thought proper to direct that all persons having civil offices in the territory of Michigan, at the period of the capitulation of Detroit, resume the exercise of the powers appertaining to their offices respectively. In the present dispersed state of its population, many officers are, doubtless, absent. In all cases thus situated, the last incumbent who resigned the office, will resume the exercise of its duties. The laws in force at the period above mentioned, will be re-established and continue in force until repealed by the proper authority.

Given at Head-quarters, the 29th day of September, 1813.
WM. H. HARRISON.

By the General,

JOHN O'FALLAN, aid-de-camp.

MILITARY.

Hampton's army, at our last accounts, was on the south side of the St. Lawrence, at the Carlow Rapids, 15 miles this side of Montreal, and four miles from the British army under governor Proctor, said to consist of 5000 men, regulars and militia. Hampton was supposed to be waiting for the arrival of Wilkinson, who was reported at Ogdensburg on the 22nd or 23d inst. going down with about 5000 bataillons.—The inhabitants of Montreal are said to be moving their valuable effects to Quebec. If these reports be true, and we think they may be relied upon, Kings-ton will be left for an after business, or to fall of itself, the resources being cut off.

Maj. gen. Dearborn has arrived at New-York.

Maj. gen. Harrison and his suite, with com. Perry, arrived at Erie, in the Ariel, from Detroit, on the 25th ult. and were received by the inhabitants of that place with rapture, with the thunder of cannon, illuminations, and every demonstration of joy, to the deliverers of the frontier. Commodore Perry proceeds to Newport, R. I. Gen. Harrison with his disposable force (supposed to be about 2000 regulars) proceeded with the troops the next day, and arrived at Black-Rock on the 24th—expecting, it is said to go on immediately in the Ontario fleet, to join Wilkinson at Sackett's Harbor. But Chauncey is occupied in waiting upon Sir James Yeo at the other end of the lake. If gen. Vincennes, or any British force, however, remains near the head of the lake, he may find something to do, and will do it. The force left at Detroit, is about 1000 regulars and 2000 militia, under command, we believe, of brig. gen. Cass. Captain Burchey, late commander of the late British fleet on Erie, accompanied Harrison and Perry, and it is thought will recover of his wounds.

From St. Louis we have satisfactory accounts of the measures that have been taken to meet and punish the Indians in that quarter. But, it is probable, that Harrison's victory has given peace to all the western country. The news of it will fly like wild fire among the savage tribes, and point out the necessity of submission.

A letter from Pass Christian, dated September 17, states that information had been received there of the arrival of a British vessel at Pensacola, having on board a large quantity of ammunition, and two Seminole Indians, who have the rank of Brigadier generals in the British service.

The following is given as a return of the volunteers and militia that have marched from Kentucky, since the declaration of war.

In addition to this list there were about two hundred men marched from this state by captains Hopkins, Graham and Price, which brings the number up to seventeen thousand three hundred and seventy-five. We cannot say that this statement is precisely correct. It may not be enough, or it may be too much by a few hundred. [Ken. Gaz.]

It is stated that maj. gen. Proctor reached the British at Burlington Heights with only 17 men. The following "official" account of his expulsion from the upper province has been published by the enemy: MONTREAL, OCT. 18.

GENERAL ORDER.

The commander of the forces has the deepest regret in announcing to the army, that Lieut. Rifflenstein, staff adjutant, arrived yesterday, and is the bearer of the following unpleasant intelligence. That major-general Proctor having sustained, by the unfortunate capture of the squadron on Lake Erie, the loss of a very considerable portion of his military force, which was serving on board that fleet, as well as the principal heavy ordnance necessary for the defence of his military positions—commenced his retreat from the fort of Sandwich on the 24th September, having previously dismantled the posts of Andoverburgh and Detroit, and burned and destroyed every public building and stores of every description.

The retreating regular force consisting of a small detachment of Royal Artillery, a troop of Provincial Dragoons, and the remains of the 41st regiment, in all about 450 rank and file—which was accompanied by a body of Indian warriors from 10 to 1500.

The enemy's fleet and army appeared off Amherstburgh on the 26th Sept. and landed on the following day, but soon re-embarked their troops and proceeded by Lake St. Clair, to the mouth of the Thames river. The American army was again landed, and accompanied by gun-boats, followed the route of major-general Proctor's corps, which, having been much retarded by the slow progress of loaded bataillons, they were enabled to come up with the rear guard and loaded boats on the 27th inst. and succeeded in capturing the whole. Major-general Proctor being thus deprived of the means of supporting his little army, was to order the necessity of awaiting the enemy's attack; which took place at four o'clock on the evening of the 28th inst. near the Marysville village.

A six pounder on the bank, was by some unaccountable neglect, left destitute of ammunition, and the enemy, availing himself of this unfortunate circumstance, pressed upon that part of the line which, wanting the support of artillery, was forced by the superior numbers of the enemy. Major-general Proctor, exerted himself to rally the troops, who, being exhausted with fatigue, not having received any provisions the preceding day, were unable to make adequate exertions to resist the superior numbers by which they were assailed.

The safety of major-general Proctor, the officers of his personal staff, and some few others, together with about fifty men, has only as yet been ascertained. The Indian warriors retreated towards Mackinac.

* A "British official" account and a huge falsehood are synonymous, yet we shall insert them as they reach us, to let the people see how John Bull is getting on.

The enemy's force employed on this service is estimated at from 20 to 12,000 strong, including troops of every description.

EDWARD BAYNES, Adjt. Gen.

Address to the inhabitants of the upper province of Canada.

Brigadier-general McClure, commanding the Niagara frontier, finds the upper province deserted by the British army and abandoned by its government. In the peculiar situation of the inhabitants, it is essential to their security that some regulations should be established for their government, while the American army has the power of enforcing them. The general regrets to say, that illegal, unauthorised and forbidden pillage has been committed by a few, who are lost to all honor and insensible of the obligations of a soldier. To arrest such practices, to afford all the protection in his power, and to ensure safety to the property and persons of the inhabitants who are now under his control, the general has issued this address.

The employment of the Indians has been a source of extreme regret to the general. But finding them called out by the government of the United States, and expecting to attack an army who had long employed them in scenes of atrocity and outrage at which humanity shudders, he was driven to the only alternative—flight or using the same weapons against our enemies which they had used against ourselves. That the British army had abandoned their encampments and fled before the American force, does not weaken the necessity which he was under, of employing the Indians before he knew that the enemy had abandoned. At the same time, it is due to them to say, that the Indians have conducted themselves far better than could have been expected, if the example of the British officers and British savages be a criterion. Not a single individual has been scalped or tomahawked by them, no prisoner of war has been burnt, the dead have not been thrown into the public highways, the women and children have not been massacred, nor has private property been destroyed except in cases where the former conduct of the owners required exemplary retaliation. The property which they have plundered has in cases where it was possible, been restored to the inhabitants at the expense of the United States; and when the necessity for their employ ceased to exist, the Indians were sent to the American side of the river beyond the reach of temptation, to wait until circumstances justified another call upon them. The relation of these facts is due to the honor of our government, to the reputation of the general and to the reputation of the Indians. From it also, the inhabitants of Canada may learn, what they may expect from American forbearance and clemency.

To insure that forbearance, the inhabitants have an easy duty to perform—let them abstain from communications with the British army and remain at home quietly pursuing their avocations. Those who conduct differently will incur the penalties of rigorous martial law. The character of our free republican government and the nature of our institutions, will justify an expectation of security and protection; all civil magistrates will continue to exercise the functions of their offices merely as conservators of the peace; as far as they are able, they will preserve order and quiet among the inhabitants. The existing laws of the province, so far as they regard the public peace, and not interfering with the regulations of the army, will be considered in force until other measures are taken. The magistrates are particularly required to give information at head-quarters of all violence committed by the American troops or citizens, unless they are authorised by a written order. The general expects the inhabitants to submit to their magistrates, and those who refuse obedience must be reported to head-quarters. The brigadier-general invites all the inhabitants who are disposed to be peaceable, orderly and neutral, to return to their homes and their business. He cannot promise complete security, but he engages as far as his power extends, to protect the innocent, the unfortunate and the distressed.

GEO. MCCLURE, Commanding Niagara frontier.

Head-Quarters, Fort George, Oct. 16, 1813.

Extract of a letter from a correspondent of the Chillicothe Freeman, dated

Detroit, October 11, 1813.

On the 27th ult. we landed on the Canada shore, 3 miles below Malden, and marched up to its ruins without opposition, the same afternoon. We found Malden burnt, all moveable public property either taken away or destroyed, and the enemy flown. The next day we marched on in pursuit towards Sandwich: arrived there on the 29th; crossed over to Detroit the same day, where we were greeted with tearful eyes and joyous hearts by the poor plundered inhabitants. A large number of Indians were still around the town; and so bold were some that even while we were crossing the river, some warriors were seen on the opposite bank. They fled, however, on our landing. Our Indians and Captain Puthuff's company were sent out scouting immediately on our arrival, and shortly returned with two warriors and a squaw prisoners.

Col. Johnson's regiment arrived on the 30th, and after crossing over with their horses, pursuit was immediately made after the enemy up the river Thames. At the distance of about 80 miles from this, colonel Johnson's regiment, some other volunteer Kentuckians, and a few regulars, overtook the enemy, and after a few fires, made the whole British force prisoners! Proctor escaped but very narrowly, having left his horse and chaise, sword and papers on the road. Tecumseh has fallen. Six hundred British regulars, including thirty officers, are prisoners. No Indians were captured; but a great many were slain. We had 13 men killed, and a few wounded. Colonel Harrison was wounded in five places! General Harrison was in the midst of the fight. Commodore Perry and general Cass acted as his volunteer aids-de-camp. Governor Shelby was also there.

A considerable number of the savages have forsaken the bad cause of king George. Several flags were brought to this place since our arrival, and upwards of fifteen hundred are within six miles in a starving condition.

Proctor is certainly a grand coward; for his force, (counting Indians and all) was unquestionably sufficiently respectable to authorise an effort, ere he gave up, destroyed and retired from the strong holds of Malden and Detroit. The day previous to our landing, 15,000 rations were issued to the Indians, of whom 3000 were warriors. These, with his regulars, could have annoyed us much at landing, and also have given him time to retreat, in case of necessity. Enclosed is TECUMSEH'S talk, at Amherstburgh, previous to the retreat: it was found among general Proctor's papers. General Harrison returned 2 days ago. The troops are daily getting back; and I believe that an expedition to Mackinac is intended by a part of our force.

SPEECH OF TECUMSEH,

In the name of the Indian chiefs and warriors, to major-general Proctor, as the representative of their great father—the king.

FATHER, listen to your children! You have them now all before you.

The year before this, our British father gave the hatchet to his red children, when our chiefs were alive. They are now dead. In that year, our father was thrown on his back by the Americans, and our father took them by the hand without our knowledge; and we are afraid that our father will do so again at this time.

Summer before last, when I came forward with my red brethren, and was ready to take up the hatchet in favor of our British father, we were told not to be in a hurry, that he had not yet determined to fight the Americans.

Listen!—When war was declared, our father stood up and gave us the tomahawk, and told us that he was then ready to strike the Americans; that he wanted our assistance; and that he would certainly get us our lands back, which the Americans had taken from us.

Listen! You told us, at that time, to bring forward our families to this place; and we did so; and you promised to take care of them, and that they should want for nothing, while the men would go and fight the enemy. That we need not trouble ourselves about the enemy's garrison; that we knew nothing about them, and that our father would attend to that part of the business. You also told your red children, that you would take good care of your garrison here, which made our hearts glad.

Listen! When we were last to the Rapids, it is true we gave you little assistance. It is hard to fight people who live like ground hogs.

Father listen! Our fleet has gone out; we know they have fought; we have heard the great guns; but know nothing of what has happened to our father with one arm. Our ships have gone one way, and we are much astonished to see our father trying up every thing and preparing to run away the other, without letting his red children know what his intentions are. You always told us to remain here and take care of our lands; it made our hearts glad to hear that was your wish. Our great father, the king, is our head, and you represent him. You always told us, that you would never draw your foot off British ground: but now, father, we see you are drawing back, and we are sorry to see our father doing so without seeing the enemy. We must compare our father's conduct to a fat animal, that carries its tail upon its back, but when affrighted, he drops it between his legs and runs off.

Listen, Father! The Americans have not yet defeated us by land; neither are we sure that they have come so by water: we, therefore, wish to remain here, and fight our enemy, if they should make their appearance. If they defeat us, we will then retreat with our father.

At the battle of the Rapids last war, the Americans certainly defeated us; and when we retreated to our father's fort at that place the gates were shut against us. We were afraid that it would now be the case; but instead of that we now see our British father preparing to march out of his garrison.

Father! You have got the arms and ammunition which our great father sent for his red children. If you have an idea of going away, give them to us, and you may go and welcome, for us. Our lives are in the hands of the Great Spirit. We are determined to defend our lands, and if it be his will we wish to leave our bones upon them.

Amherstburg, Sept. 18, 1813.

Extract of another letter from the same, dated

Detroit, October 13, 1813.

Nothing of much importance has transpired since the date of my last. Additional movements are in contemplation, and will be put in motion in a few days: one to Mackinac, the other to Long Point.—A sufficient force will, no doubt, be sent to each to subdue both places: that done, and we shall have performed our part, since we resumed the line of march, from Put-in-Bay Island.

After repeated overtures of peace by the Pottawatimie and Miami Indians (the principal hostile tribes) the general consented to-day, in council, to a suspension of hostilities, until the will of government can be made known, upon the following terms, viz. That they should leave with us several of their principal chiefs as hostages, and on to-morrow move off to their respective hunting grounds; that they should draw at fort Wayne ammunition to answer their hunting purposes, and occasionally provisions for their families; and that perfect peace and friendship should exist among all the hostile tribes and our people, together with our friendly Indians, until the general should be instructed by government what course to pursue towards them. Massac, an intelligent venerable looking old chief, principal warrior of the Pottawatimie tribe, was, on this occasion, speaker on behalf of the Indians. He acknowledges that the hostile tribes had acted very unwisely and foolishly in going to war with us, and that they were all very sorry for it. It now appears, that the operations of the tomahawk and scalping knife have for the present ceased; and I trust that government will, in its wisdom, pursue that course towards the savages, which will ensure peace and tranquillity to this unfortunate frontier country, where nothing but a continued scene of cruel warfare has been exhibited ever since its first settlement two centuries ago.

While in council, the arrival of a captain Le Breton, with a flag, was announced. He was the bearer of a letter from gen. Proctor to general Harrison, requesting that some papers taken in the late action might be returned. This paltry excuse to ascertain every thing going on with our army, must be obvious to all. It won't do to play yankee tricks with yankees. Our general with his non quam dormis, at one glimpse perceived the object, and informed captain Le Breton that he should return him to a different part of his army; but for the present, he must remain where he was. Can it be possible because the officers of our government are celebrated for their manifest generosity and hospitality to the fallen foe, under whatever clime or circumstances, that advantages like this should be taken by the enemy? It is too much for an honorable nation to war with a dishonorable one, when the latter will derive no lessons of liberality or justice from the examples of the former.

It gives me unspeakable satisfaction, to see the eyes of all classes of people fixed on our youthful heroes Perry and Croghan, with veneration and gratitude; and well may the British and Indians view them with astonishment. If Lavater was alive and here, he could point them out from a crowd of 10,000 strangers. The very pliz of these characters show every thing that is military, brave, intrepid and humane."

Two English frigates are said to have gone round Cape Horn to search for the Essex.

We have some scraps of intelligence, by way of Jamaica and Carthagens, that corroborate the account in our last of the Essex. One report says she has from 4 to 5 millions of dollars on board.

The blockade of New-London is exceedingly rigid. The enemy lies as close to the mouth of the harbor as he can—but our squadron may get out in a gale.

Com. Lewis returned to New-York on the 27th ult. without "meeting" the enemy.

Three enemy boats entered the sound, a few days since, for the purpose of cutting out some vessels lying at New Inlet, North-Carolina. A party of militia came upon them, captured one barge with 17 men and drove the others off. Among the prisoners are some negroes supposed to be runaways.

The U. S. brigs Niagara, Caledonia and Hunter, with the schrs. Ariel, and Lady Prescott, and sloops Trippe and Little Belt, arrived at Buffalo on the 24th inst. with Perry, Harrison and Jr. Arthur, and a detachment of the N. W. army about 2000 strong.

677 The property destroyed by the Argus, in the Irish sea is valued at 2,500,000 dollars.

673. Schooner Fame, of Barbadoes, laden with Madras wine, captured by the Saratoga, and wrecked on Long Island; crew and cargo all saved.

674. Ship St. Lawrence, from England, with a British license full of most valuable British goods, worth from 3 to 400,000 dollars, captured by a privateer privateer, and sent into Portsmouth, N. H., where she was condemned. The vessel and property is decreed to have been American.

675, 676. Two vessels captured by the Yankee, and given up to discharge her prisoners. The Yankee has again returned to Rhode Island after a successful cruise, in which she captured nine vessels. The letter of marque schooner Water Witch, of New York, fell in with a fleet of British vessels, and took several of them. Particulars hereafter.

THE CHRONICLE.

EUROPEAN AFFAIRS.

There has been terrible fighting in Germany; but the knavery or ignorance of the printers through whose hands the details have past, (and we have none but what have reached us by the way of England) have thrown them into such wonderful confusion, that it is no easy matter to form an opinion of the real state of things, much less to ascertain the facts that belong to them. So far as the events are narrated in the French bulletins, we have, at least, a well connected story; all else is "uprooted wild."

The French accounts detail a great battle fought near Dresden on the 26th and 27th of August. The French were commanded by Bonaparte, in person, assisted by Murat, Ney, Marmont, Victor, Mortier, St. Cyr, &c. The allies were under the emperors of Russia and Austria, and the king of Prussia; the latter is said to have had the direction of the whole. The forces of the contending parties must have amounted to 350,000 men. The action began at 4 or 5 o'clock in the evening; the allies appear to have been driven from their ground before night—and the next day, though the rain fell in torrents, the French pursued their advantages with great success—and state the result to be 25 or 30,000 prisoners, 40 standards, and 60 pieces of cannon taken,—the whole loss of the allies being estimated at 60,000 men; the French boys only 4,000, which is improbable. Murat, with the cavalry, appears to have conducted himself with his usual skill, courage and good fortune. On the 28th, 29th and 30th, the French pursued their successes and took 1000 ammunition waggons and many prisoners. They found the neighboring villages full of the wounded of the allied army—they counted 10,000. The French accounts are as late as the 8th of September, and notice various minor successes; but admit they lost 3 or 4,000 prisoners in Silesia, being a part of the duke of Tarente's command, pursuing the allies, who were separated from the other forces by the rising of the waters, which swept away the bridges, &c. Moreau, who had been appointed "major-general and chief of the staff" of the Russian forces (the same post that Berthier holds under Bonaparte) while discoursing with Alexander, was mortally wounded by one of the first cannon the French fired on the 26th. It carried off both legs, passing through his horse, and he died on the 2nd September.

In consequence of these events the empress regent of France ordered a grand Te Deum.

The war also goes on in Italy. The French force, under the viceroy, is reported to have gained some advantages—which other statements deny.

The English accounts admit a defeat before Dresden, but deprive the battle of the great importance the French ascribe to it—and say that the allies on the 3th of September "issued from the passes of Bohemia," and took the roads leading to Dresden; where, it was calculated another battle might be fought about the 16th of that month. But Paris papers of the 20th are silent on the subject, from which the English editors infer the French have been beaten. It appears that Bernadotte made a successful attack upon the left wing of the French army, under Vandamme at Dornowitz, where he took about 10,000 prisoners; that Blücher obtained considerable advantages to the right; other successes are claimed for the allies, too tedious for us to detail, even if the truth could be gleaned from the mass of matter presented, which is impossible. See Cobbett's remarks page 163.

Contrary to our belief, the crown prince of Sweden has really joined the allies, and the emperor of Austria has staked his crown on the issue. If Bonaparte conquers, they will be ruined; for he certainly will not permit them to retain a power that may again be used against him. The arch-duke Charles (prince von Schwartzenberg) commands the Austrians, said to be 160,000 men. The Danes are said to have suffered much in the action with Bernadotte, whose force is rated at 110,000. In Spain the British are reported successful. St. Sebastians, with a garrison short of 2000 men, has surrendered. Soult is drawing troops from France, and a great battle may be looked for in the neighborhood of the Pyrenees. Suchet is at Barcelona, with 40,000 men.—The British have appointed the earl of Aberdeen minister at the court of Vienna. Old king George still lives, "tranquil and comfortable (as the bulletin says) although his disorder remains undiminished." The whole contending forces of France and the allies, are given at the mighty aggregate 1,140,000 men, in Germany and Italy.

The military affairs of the coalition appear better managed than on any former occasion, and the forces on each side are powerful, beyond precedent; and more bloody battles have been fought, perhaps, than Europe ever witnessed before, in the same time. From the most careful examination, we conclude, that the advantage was, on the whole, much in favor of the French, but that nothing decisive had been accomplished, in any case, by either party. If it so turns out, that Bonaparte shall defeat the alliance, it would almost incline us to believe that he is the immediate instrument of Providence to accomplish his all-wise purposes, against which the power of man exerts itself in vain. The details and accounts of the late battles and movements of the adverse armies, would occupy three or four numbers of the REGISTER—we have carefully read the whole and collect the opinion above stated. As several vessels are expected from France, we look for later and more regular accounts; nor do we look to them with indifference, for on the issue relatively depends the more speedy restoration of peace to the United States.

Pennsylvania Election—A letter to the editor of the REGISTER from a gentleman at Harrisburg, gives the following result of the late elections in Pennsylvania:

The house of representatives consists of 95 members of whom eighty-four are "republicans" and eleven "federalists."

The Senate consists of 51 members, one-third elected annually—of those elected the present year, all are "republican" but one, and he had a majority of only 11 votes.

New-Jersey.—Wm. S. Pennington (rep.) has been elected governor of New-Jersey. The votes were, for Pennington 3;—for Ogden (fed.) 2. The brother of the governor elected did not vote, and two members were absent.

We have reports that Kingston has fallen, and the whole British fleet taken. Not believed.

The pressure of articles for record, the present week, with the continuation of Mr. Hamilton's report, has necessarily postponed several matters prepared for the press. We are laboring to collect some domestic statistical facts; which, we apprehend, will afford much satisfaction to our readers. A part may be ready by the time that Mr. Hamilton's report is concluded, and be attached to it, to shew things as they are. On the purport of governor Gilman's speech to the legislature of New-Hampshire, many persons will, doubtless, require some explanation; and the facts, as they appear, shall hereafter be stated, for the circumstances demand a record. We are not well enough acquainted with the singular matters to which he alludes, than to say, generally, there are two sets of judges in that state, each claiming a like jurisdiction; the old declaring the appointment of the junior to be unconstitutional.

The late charge of Luther Martin, esquire, chief judge of the criminal court to the grand inquest of Baltimore county, with the reply of the latter, embracing some great national topics, is laid off for insertion.

Legislature of New Hampshire.

CONVOCED, Oct. 27.

The two houses of the General Court having formed a quorum, a committee was appointed to wait on his excellency the Governor, and inform him they were ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make. At 12 o'clock, his excellency, attended with the honorable council, met the two branches of the legislature, in the hall of representatives, and delivered the following

SPEECH:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives,

Having, by and with the advice of the council requested your attendance in general court, before the time to which you were adjourned, it is my duty to state causes which made this request necessary.—To make statements to the legislature, respecting improper conduct of individual persons, is an unpleasant task, but in the present case unavoidable.

In conformity to the act of the legislature passed the twenty-fourth day of June, 1813, establishing a supreme court of judicature, and circuit courts of common pleas, one of the justices of the supreme judicial court, opened the court at Dover, in and for the county of Strafford, at the time by law appointed for that purpose; on the same day, Richard Evans, esq. and Clifton Chaggett, esq. two persons who were formerly justices of the superior court of judicature, pretended to open a court in a formal manner, having a person of their own appointment, whom they called clerk of the court, and proceeded to make speeches, and to do other acts in open defiance of the law aforesaid.

At the time by law appointed, the supreme judicial court was opened at Exeter, in and for the county of Rockingham, by the chief justice and one of the associate justices, and the usual oaths were administered to the grand jurors. After this the two persons aforesaid, being present, directed the person whom they called their clerk, to administer the oath to the grand jurors; they, the jurors, no otherwise regarding, than with astonishment.—Indeed, it must excite astonishment, in the minds of all good men, to see persons, once justices of the superior court, thus as it were, trifling with the sacredness and solemnity of oaths.

Many other things were there said, and done, to the great interruption of the regular and orderly proceedings of the supreme judicial court.

The sheriff of the county of Rockingham, having refused obedience to the chief associate justice of the supreme judicial court, this court were left in the unprecedented situation of having no proper officer, or goaler, to command for the preservation of order and the public peace.

Since the proclamation was issued for convening the legislature, it is said, transactions somewhat similar have taken place in the county of Hillsborough. The sheriff of that county, with the two persons aforesaid, having taken possession of the court house at Amherst, the justices of the supreme judicial court were obliged to seek some other place for holding the court.

It is with deep regret that I have been compelled to speak publicly of such transactions—hope I may be excused from being more particular, more especially as there are many members of the legislature who saw and heard, and can give full information respecting these unexampled proceedings.

Whatever woful work, party spirit may make in other respects, it was hoped that in a government, constituted like our own, there would not have been an attempt to organise opposition to law. If one set of men can with impunity, thus proceed in the violation of one law, another set of men may attempt to organise opposition to any other law, which they imagine injurious to their personal interests. Surely, if at any time, any thing is wrong, there are, in our free system of government, other remedies than open and public defiance of law.

The existing state of things requires the candid and serious consideration of the legislature.

I have not received copies of the laws passed at the last session of congress of the United States, but understand that there is a clause in the act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States, allowing each state to vary by an act of its legislature, the respective quotas imposed on its several counties; also a clause allowing each state to pay its quota into the treasury of the United States, and thereon to be entitled to certain deductions. Whether the legislature will think proper to make order on these subjects, is submitted for their consideration.

By a communication made to the legislature by his excellency governor Plumer, on the second day of June last, it is stated, that he had directed a military watch or guard, to be stationed at or near the mouth of Little Harbour. Application has been made for payment; but as the legislature had not made order upon the subject, I have not taken any measures respecting it, and it will require your consideration at this time.

It was, gentlemen, with much regret, that the Executive saw the necessity of convening the legislature at this time. But it was unavoidable; and it is hoped, it will not be necessary to have a session of long continuance.

JOHN TAYLOR GILMAN,

State of New-Hampshire, Oct. 27, 1813.

Legislature of Rhode-Island.

The Legislature of this state convened at South Kingston, on the 25th ult. and the next day formed a quorum, when they unanimously elected J. B. Mason esq. speaker of the house of representatives, and Thomas Burges, esq. clerk. His excellency governor Jones communicated the following

MESSAGE :

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives,

In compliance with your resolutions of the last session, two pieces of cannon have been selected from those belonging to the state, in the county of Washington, which, it is presumed, will fully answer the purpose intended, with a small expense to prepare them—the care of which, and getting them suitably mounted on travelling carriages, was committed to colonel Thomas Noyes, who will report to you the progress he has made.

With respect to the powder, purchased by the Quarter master general of the state, of which complaints have been made, I presume the report of the brigadier-generals, whose duty it was made at the last session, to cause it to be inspected, will give you a correct statement of its quality, when you will be able to determine whether an additional quantity shall be purchased or not.

I conceive it unnecessary, at this time, to go into detail on the subject of our resources, or of our supplies of ordnance, arms, &c. as the General Assembly are possessed of the necessary information, and can determine what further steps ought to be taken by them for the security of this state. While we felicitate ourselves that no invasion has yet been made upon this state, yet from the extent and accessibility of our shores, we shall always, during the war, remain exposed to the apprehension and danger of this calamity, and as there seems to be no well grounded hope of a speedy termination of this destructive evil, it becomes our duty to prepare our minds for its contingency. It is also our highest duty to remember, with gratitude, that Divine goodness which has hitherto protected us from many of the distresses and sufferings of war, and preserved to us the fruits of our labor, and the invaluable privileges, both civil and religious, which have been transmitted to us from our ancestors.

In the contest in which we are unhappily engaged, in which the United States have already expended so much blood and treasure, and incurred a large accumulation of debt, burthensome to us and to our remote posterity, however we may lament the fatal policy by which this state of things has been produced, it is nevertheless our duty to submit with patience to the privations and distresses of the times, and, by the operations of our excellent institutions, a change may be effected in the measures of our present rulers, or such other as appointed in their places, as shall pursue a system better adapted to promote the true interest of this extensive nation. A government like that of the United States, formed for the good of the people, is admirably fitted for the true purpose of defence against foreign invasion, or domestic tyranny; but is ill calculated for offensive war and schemes of conquest. The unprepared condition of the nation, at the commencement of this unhappy war, and the subsequent removal by the enemy of one of the principal causes of our hostility, ought to have operated powerfully on the administration, as reasons for suspending further proceedings, by an armistice, and for commencing a sincere negotiation for peace: but from the prevalence of violent counsels, and the effect, as I fear, of national animosity, carefully excited by crafty politicians, we are still exposed to the perils of this unnatural state of things, and to the evils of that desolating scourge, from which, by pursuing contrary maxims of policy, we had been for many years exempted.

If the United States would regain the proud eminence on which they lately stood, they must remember, "that it is righteousness which exalts a nation, and that sin is a reproach to any people;" they must endeavor to conduct their foreign relations, not so much with reference to the views of a party, or to the prejudices or partialities with which foreign nations are viewed, but with a strict regard to truth and fair dealing, and to the rights and prerogatives of other powers.

With a return of peace, we may hope for the return of the blessings by which it is generally accompanied—commerce extended to every shore—agriculture improved, and our moral and religious institutions and privileges, strengthened and increased.

In war, our rights and the constitution, and union of the United States are ever in danger of violation, and not only are the people exposed to the loss of life and liberty, but a general laxity of morals, and disregard of civil institutions, threaten evils which may be as lasting as they are extensive. —But under the smiles of a gracious Providence, we may be permitted to hope for a restoration of our national tranquility, and that the people, remembering the toils, privations and sufferings, by which our liberties were secured, will adhere to those principles and maxims under which the country has formerly prospered; and putting their confidence in the wise and good, may be enabled to support their rights and privileges, and transmit them unimpaired to posterity.

WILLIAM JONES.

South Kingston, Oct. 26, 1813.

Legislature of New Jersey.

Governor's Message to the Legislature of New-Jersey.

Gentlemen of the Council, and

Gentlemen of the House of Assembly,

Elected by the voluntary unobscured suffrages of the representatives of a free people to the office of first Magistrate of the state; and after due consideration, having conceived it my duty to take upon myself the execution thereof, not, however, without anxious solicitude lest the powers of my mind should prove unequal to the various, important and arduous duties assigned to it by our constitution, I apprehend it proper, from time to time, to communicate to the legislature, not only such information as may be peculiarly in the knowledge of the Executive, but my opinions and observations on such executive duties as may have relation to the general concerns of the state, or such as are in any manner connected with the legislative department of government.

On first entering upon the important duties of my station, it cannot be supposed that my acquaintance with the executive concerns of the state is such as to afford any useful information upon its details.—Some general observations, however, arising out of the present situation of our country, appear to me proper to be submitted to your consideration.

In the administration of our government, we shall unquestionably find that the internal government and concerns of the state will occupy our principal attention, and deserve our special care; at the same time it is important to keep in mind that our state is a member of a great federative republic, in which we have an important stake—that as citizens of our own state we have duties to perform to the union. The states, composing the American republic, anterior to the adoption of the constitution of the United States, were sovereign and independent; by that instrument, which is the last act of the people, a certain portion of that sovereignty was taken from the states and vested in the general government—that which was not so transferred, was reserved to the states, and now remains in them. In designating the line between the sovereignty of the union, and that of the states, it is to be apprehended that real difficulties may arise: and the interest of all, calls for a candid and liberal interpretation. Among the powers vested in the general government, is that of making war and peace, and with it the means of defence and annoyance, and, as a consequence, that of the command and disposal of the military force of the nation; in which, as I apprehend, is included the militia, not by implication and construction, but by clear, unambiguous and expressive provisions. It has been matter of surprise to me, that this part of the constitution could ever have admitted of a doubt—there can be nothing plainer than that the people, by the constitution of the United States, have placed at the disposal of the general government, the control of the militia whenever the public exigencies shall require it.—The following clause in the constitution has, however, given rise to a question of vast importance to the United States: “Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia, to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.” It is contended by high authority, that the state governments, or what is worse, that the executives of the state governments, are the sole and exclusive judges to determine whether the case exists—from which determination there is no appeal, for if the power of adjudging the question is reserved to the state governments, it is a sovereign independent power, and cannot be controlled. If this interpretation of the constitution be the true one, the militia, that great bulwark of our national security, is wrested from the general government, and placed under the discretion or caprice of the state executives, who can at any time paralyze and defeat the operations of the general government.—An attentive examination of the constitution on the subject of the militia, must unerringly mark out the power of the federal government over them.—In the first place, the national defence is committed to that government: according with this, a power is expressly given to organize (that is, to form into corps) arm and discipline the militia—to make laws to call them forth into the service of the United States, to execute the laws of the union, to suppress insurrections and repel invasions, and to make laws for governing them, when thus called into the service of the United States—and the President of the United States is made commander in chief of the militia thus called out. There is a power, however, reserved to the states of appointing the officers and training the militia, but this training it to be in conformity to the discipline prescribed by congress.—The state executives, backed by a legislative act, cannot change, in a single instance, the discipline prescribed by congress, yet it is contended that they have a power to control the general government in calling forth the militia. It appears to me that this doctrine is fraught with incalculable mischief, and that it carries in its bosom the seeds of national dissolution. The militia forms the great defence of our nation—An exposed sea-coast of two thousand miles, with a territorial frontier of double the extent, can never be defended at every point by regular force—the resources of no country are equal to it. The argument in favor of this construction is, that it is dangerous to trust congress with powers so important. An argument from the use to the abuse of a power, might have been proper in the convention that framed the constitution, but cannot do away its express provisions or impair a plain rational interpretation; nor is it easy to perceive why more danger is to be apprehended from the general than the state governments—they are both elected by the people, and responsible to them for the abuse of power; and it is certainly fit, that the government, whose special duty it is to protect and defend the country, should have the command of its military forces, and experience proves that the general government has no disposition to vex and oppress the militia.

A doctrine of a similar complexion to the foregoing, has made its appearance in modern times; it having recently become a question whether the militia can be constitutionally marched out of their own state, although it is not denied but that the militia may be called into the service of the United States, if the state executives do not chuse to interpose their authority, yet they must stop at a territorial line separating two states. A probable case, growing out of this doctrine, only wants to be stated to expose its absurdity—suppose the state of Delaware to be suddenly invaded from the sea, by a powerful enemy, and the militia of Pennsylvania and Maryland should remain at home, or assemble on the confines of their own states, and there wait inglorious spectators of the ruin of their neighbors, themselves the next victims of a system of local policy, as illiberal as it is weak and pernicious. The patriots of the revolution were unacquainted with those refined speculations, in the winter of seventeen hundred and seventy-six and seven, when New-Jersey was overrun by the enemy. The Delaware, with its floating ice, formed no obstacle to the intrepid militia of Pennsylvania—had they hesitated at state-lines, the spirit of their gallant chief would never have animated the classic groves of Princeton, and N. Jersey for a much longer time must have endured the scourge of a cruel and vindictive foe.

For the purposes of national defence, we are but one people: this is as well the letter, as the spirit of the constitution.

Do not understand me gentlemen, as entertaining a disposition to surrender to the general government the smallest portion of our state sovereignty; so far from that, I know its importance, and should the general government, unfortunately for our country, be so lost to the interest and welfare of the union, and so regardless of justice, as to encroach upon the sovereignty of the state, I pledge myself to be the last man in it to yield to the usurpation.—Yet, while we exact from the government of the union, an observance of our state rights of sovereignty, let us render to the legitimate constitutional powers, entrusted to it by the people, for the general security.

There is no principle more universally felt and acknowledged, and that applies itself more forcibly to the understanding of every reflecting man, than that the prosperity, safety and happiness of every portion of the United States, depends on the preservation of the union. History instructs us that in all confederative states, there is a latent tendency to weaken the power of the head, and to strengthen that of the members. This, probably, arises from the frailty of man, who feels with greater sensibility an immediate gratification, than a remote interest. It does not require the spirit of prophecy, to foresee the moment the union is dissolved America is undone.

The war in which our country is unhappily engaged, has been brought upon us by the injustice of a nation, that knows no law but her own will, and submits to no restraints but those of superior force. A long course of lawless violence committed on the persons and property of our citizens on the high seas, had been remonstrated against, with becoming decorum on the part of our government, until, by a course of diplomatic discussion, the controversy had arrived at a crisis, when it was found we must either abandon the persons and property of our citizens on the high seas, to the violence, insolence and rapacity of a haughty, imperious and unjust nation, or assert our rights by arms. Well informed men, possessed of American feelings, saw and acknowledged the injury—it became then a matter of policy, on which it must be admitted, honest and intelligent men have differed in opinion. But who so proper to determine that question, as the constituted authority of the nation, to whom the power of peace and war is constitutionally committed? The disposition of our government to make a peace upon fair and reasonable terms, cannot be doubted. Every attempt to that end has been treated by the enemy with scorn. We have, then, no other alternatives, than a vigorous prosecution of the war, or an inglorious peace that would compromise the rights of our country, and disgrace the American name. The unexampled success of our arms on the element on which we have been injured, evinces the retributive justice of Divine wisdom. The success of our land forces, in not only repelling the enemy from our borders, but carrying the war into their own territory, and reducing to submission their savage allies, affords a subject of grateful acknowledgments to the Great Disposer of events.

It is a subject of consolation and gratitude, that amid the ravages of war, the citizens of our state have been, in a great measure, exempt from its pangs—that the labor of our husbandmen has been blessed with an abundant harvest, and a ready market—and that our domestic and public manufactories have prospered beyond our most sanguine expectations.

WILLIAM S. PENNINGTON.

New Jersey, November, 1813.

Laws of New Jersey.

An act, to provide for paying the direct tax of this state.

WHEREAS, by a law of the United States, entitled "an act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States," passed the second day of August, in the year eighteen hundred and thirteen, it is enacted that the quota of New Jersey should be one hundred and eight thousand eight hundred and seventy one dollars and eighty three cents: And whereas, by the seventh section of said act, it is enacted "that each state may pay its quota into the treasury of the United States, and thereon be entitled to a deduction of fifteen per centum if paid before the tenth day of February next:"—And whereas, the sum of sixty thousand dollars and upwards of the monies now in the treasury may be safely appropriated towards the payment of said direct tax: And whereas, it may be a great saving to the state to borrow the residue of the sum required to pay the said tax:—Therefore,

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the council and general assembly of this state, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That the treasurer of the state be and he hereby is authorised and empowered to borrow on the credit of this state, the sum of thirty-two thousand dollars at an interest not exceeding six per centum per annum, to be reimbursed by such quarterly or half yearly payments as the governor of the state shall direct.

Sec. 2. And be it enacted, That a sufficient portion of the taxes and other income of the state, be and the same is hereby pledged for the payment of said loan, and the interest arising thereon: and that the said loan shall be paid and discharged within one year from the time of obtaining the same, in such quarterly or half yearly payments as the governor shall direct.

Sec. 3. And be it enacted, That the monies thence arising, together with a sufficient sum of the monies now in the treasury to make up the residue of the state quota as aforesaid, be and the same is hereby appropriated to the payment of the said quota; and that the treasurer be and he is hereby authorised and required, to pay the same into the treasury of the United States, in discharge of the quota aforesaid, before the tenth day of February next; and that he give notice to the secretary of the treasury of the United States, of the intention to pay such quota as aforesaid, before the tenth day of January next.

[They have also passed acts to repeal the acts passed last year on the "spur of the moment," which altered the plan by which members of congress and electors of president were theretofore chosen, and retored the accustomed forms.]

Legislature of Vermont.

On Saturday, 23d October, 1813, his excellency gov. CHITTENDEN, met both branches of the legislature and addressed them in the following SPEECH.

Gentlemen of the Council, and

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives,

We meet under prospects not the most flattering. Our political horizon is encircled with clouds somewhat portentous. It is a period peculiarly interesting as it respects our national and state affairs, and most eventful in the history of the world: A crisis demanding the united wisdom, prudence, and firmness of the whole community. Under these views and prospects, and with a due sense of my own inexperience, and imperfections, it is with extreme diffidence that I enter upon the duties assigned me by the constituted authorities of a moral and enlightened people. But, I do it cheerfully, relying on that candor, and indulgence, which I have heretofore so often experienced.

The national constitution having wisely placed our foreign relations in the hands and under the control of the general government, our attention will principally be directed to the local concerns of the state. To provide for the protection, and promote the greatest possible prosperity and happiness of every class of citizens, being the legitimate object of all free governments, will necessarily claim your attention. The peculiar situation, under which I am called to enter upon the duties of chief magistrate, must afford an apology for not laying before you, at this time, so particular a view of the affairs of the state, as might be desirable. But I have the satisfaction of believing, that the wisdom and intelligence of the legislature, composed of men elected from every portion of the state, and intimately acquainted with the feelings and necessities of their constituents, will furnish all the information necessary to promote the public interest.

The preservation of all free governments principally depending on the virtue and intelligence of the great body of the people, forcibly recommends the propriety of selecting for office, men distinguished for virtue and talents; such as will enforce their precepts by moral and virtuous example; disregarding those local or party views which stimulate one part of the community to trample on the rights of the other, and to sport with the feelings and happiness of their fellow men. In just retribution, for this perversion of reason, this violation of duty, it will generally be found that this spirit is not less destructive to the happiness of the aggressor than of the aggrieved.

The importance of the subject of the militia will not fail to claim your deliberate consideration. I have always considered this force peculiarly adapted, and exclusively assigned for the service and protection of the respective states; excepting in the cases provided for by the national constitution, viz. to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrection and rebel incursions. It never could have been contemplated by the wise framers of our excellent constitution, who, it appears, in the most cautious manner, guarded the sovereignty of the states, or by the states who adopted it, that the whole body of the militia were, by any kind of magic, at once to be transformed into a regular army for the purpose of foreign conquest; and it is to be regretted, that a construction should have been given to the constitution, so peculiarly burdensome, and oppressive to that important class of our fellow citizens.

The known spirit and patriotism of the militia forbid the supposition that they will not cheerfully perform their duty, when it shall be clearly defined and their rights permanently secured; and nothing is now wanted, but proper regulations and suitable encouragement to render them an efficient force for all the purposes contemplated by the national and state constitutions. But a recurrence to our present militia system will evince the propriety of many alterations and amendments. The propriety, likewise, of many alterations in our present mode of laws may be apparent. But that subject being under the consideration of the honorable council of censors, I would suggest the propriety of waiting the result of their deliberations. The state of our financial concerns will be derived from the treasury department; and the known integrity and ability, with which the duties of that office have been performed, leaves no room to doubt its correctness. And it is to be hoped that no additional burdens will be necessary to meet the current expenses of the present year. A consideration of the embarrassed situation of our commerce—the great source of national and individual income, in times of prosperity, and the heavy burthens soon to be imposed in the form of direct and internal taxes, cannot fail to recommend a strict attention to the principles of economy, both public and private.

The national constitution very justly enjoins due obedience to all the laws and regulations, which are made in conformity to it. But the same charter of our political rights ensures us the freedom of speech: a right never to be resigned, while a single vestige of civil liberty remains. It is, therefore, our unquestionable right, and, at periods like the present, it may be considered our duty, not only to reflect on the state of our public affairs; but with a manly and temperate frankness, becoming freemen, to express our sentiments respecting them; and in the exercise of all fair and constitutional means, endeavor to produce such a state of things, as will promote a just, secure and honorable peace, and avert the evils we feel, and the much greater, which we have reason to expect, from a war with the most powerful nation of Europe, and from the toils and intrigues, still more dangerous, of another. The war, in which we are engaged, would require the united wisdom and energy of the nation to sustain. It was declared under circumstances, which forcibly induced a great proportion of the people to consider it, at least, doubtful, as to its necessity, expedience or justice.

And its continuance has become still more so, since the removal of the orders in council, the principal admitted cause of it. The subject of impression never having been considered a sufficient cause of war by either of the preceding administrations, and having been once adjusted by two of the present cabinet, Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney, ministers on our part, in such a manner, as was by them stated to be both safe and honorable to our country; it would seem that it ought not now to be considered an insuperable obstacle to a fair and honorable peace; or an adequate cause for a protracted, expensive and destructive war. The conquest of the Canadas, of which so much has been said, if desirable under any circumstances, must be considered a poor compensation for the sacrifices, which are and must necessarily be made. Notwithstanding the multiplied embarrassments, and afflictive judgments, with which we are visited, yet, as a people, our situation is enviable compared with that of many other portions of our fellow men, who are groaning under the iron hand of despotism and oppression; and we have the highest reason to express, with grateful hearts, our dependence on an indulgent Providence for the bounties of the present season, and other innumerable, unmerited blessings, we still enjoy.

Should the documents of the office furnish matter for your consideration, it will be made the subject of a future communication. In the prosecution of the important business of the session, you may be assured that every measure calculated to promote the security, prosperity or happiness of our constituents, shall meet with my cordial co-operation and support. I am sensible, that in times of party heat, and general commotion, passion too often usurps the place of reason;—which seldom fails to lead to an improper result. But, with a firm reliance on the assistance of Divine Providence, I trust we shall never disregard those duties, which are enforced by the national and state constitutions, and which, if steadily pursued, will not fail to result in the promotion of the public good.

MARTIN CHITTENDEN.

Austrian Manifesto.

The Austrian monarch, has been compelled, by his situation, by its various connections with the other powers, and its importance in the confederacy of European states, to engage in most of those wars which have ravaged Europe for upwards of twenty years.—Throughout the progress of these arduous struggles, the same political principle has invariably directed his imperial majesty. A love of peace from a sense of duty, from his own natural feelings and from attachment to his people; free from all ambitious thoughts of conquest and aggrandizement, his majesty has only taken up arms when called by the urgent necessity of self-preservation, by an anxiety for the fate of contiguous states less palpable from his own or by the danger of disturbing the entire social system of Europe a prey to lawless and absolute power. To promote justice and order have been the object of his majesty's life and reign; and these alone has Austria contended for. If in these iniquitous unsuccessful contests, deep wounds have been inflicted on the monarchy, still his majesty has the consolation to reflect, that the fate of his empire has not been hazarded upon needless and violent enterprises; that all his decisions were justified before God, his people's contemporaries, and posterity.

Notwithstanding the most ample preparations, the war in 1800 would have brought the state to ruin, had not the ever memorable bravery of the army, and the spirit of true patriotism which animated all parts of the monarchy, overbalanced every advantage of the enemy. The honor of the nation and its ancient rights in arms, were happily upheld during all the mischances of this war; but valuable provinces were lost, and Austria, by the cession of these countries, depending upon the delicate and divided nature of all these maritime countries, one of the most efficient means of promoting her industry; a blow which would have been more sensibly felt, had not at the same time the whole continent been closed by a general and destructive system, preventing all commercial intercourse, and almost suspending all communication among nations. The progress and result of this war, fully satisfied his majesty that in the obvious impossibility of so immediate and thorough improvement of the political condition of Europe, should it succeed to its very foundation, the exertions of individual states in their own defence instead of setting bounds to the general efforts would only tend to destroy the first strength they still retained, would hasten the fall of the whole, and even destroy all hopes of future and better times. Under this conviction, his majesty foresaw the important advantages that would result from a peace, which, if secured for some years, might check this overgrowth, and hinder the irresistible power, which would allow his majesty that repose which is indispensable to the restoration of his finances and his army, and at the same time procure to the neighboring states a period of repose, which, if managed with prudence and activity, might prepare the way to more fortunate results. Such a peace, under the existing circumstances of danger, was the only one to be obtained by an extraordinary effort. The emperor was sensible of it, and made this effort for the preservation of the empire, for its most sacred interests of mankind, as a security against immeasurable evils, as a pledge of the future order of things, his majesty sacrificed what was dearest to his heart. With this view excited a host of common enemies, aimed against every administration of the moment, an alliance was formed which was intended by a sense of some security to terminate the weaker and more sniffling party, and the rise of an unsuccessful struggle to incline the stronger and victorious one to a course of moderation and justice, without which, the community of states can only be considered as a community of misery.

His majesty was the more justified in these expectations, because at the time of the consummation of his Union the emperor Napoleon had attained that point of his career when the preservation of his conquests was a more natural and desirable object than a restless struggle after new possessions—Any further extension of his dominions, long since outstretching their proper limits, was attended with evident danger, not only to France, severely sinking under the burden of his conquests but even to his own personal interests. What his authority gained in extent, it necessarily lost in point of security. By an union with the most ancient and powerful family in Christendom, the allies of his grandfather, he had increased the power of the French empire, and the world, such an addition of strength and protection, that any ulterior scheme of aggression must only weaken and destroy its stability. What France, what Europe, what so many oppressed and despoiled nations earnestly demanded of Heaven, a sound policy prescribed to the triumphant ruler as a law of self preservation—and it was allowed to hope that so many great and united motives would prevail over the ambition of an individual.

If these flattering prospects were destroyed, it is not to be imputed to Austria. After many years fruitless exertions, after boundless sacrifices of every description, there existed sufficient motives for the attempt to procure a better order of things by confidence and concession, when streams of blood had hitherto produced nothing but misery and destruction; nor can his majesty ever regret that he has been induced to attempt it.

The year 1810 was not yet closed, the war still raged in Spain, the people of Germany had scarce been allowed a sufficient time to recover from the devastations of the two former wars, when, in an evil hour the emperor Napoleon resolved to unite a considerable portion of the North of Germany with the main body which bore the name of the French empire, and to rob the ancient free commonwealths of Hesse, Bremen and Lubec, the last of them political, and shortly after their commercial and naval independence, and their means of subsistence. This violent step was executed without even any possible pretensions, in contempt of every recent treaty, without any previous declaration, or communication with any other powers, under the arbitrary and futile pretext that the war with England required it.

This encroachment, which was intended to destroy the commerce of the world, and the expense of the independence, the prosperity, the rights of liberty, and the interests of the public and private property of the continental powers, was pursued with an impudent severity. In the vain expectation of forcing a result [the submission of England] which had not fortunately proved successful, would have plunged Europe for a long time to come into a state of poverty, impotence and barbarity.

The decree by which a new French frontier was established on the German coast, and the title of a thirty-second military division, was in itself sufficiently calculated to raise the suspicions of the adjacent states, and it was the more alarming to them as the latitudes of future and greater largesse. By this decree it became evident that the step which was to be executed in France, (although previously managed so as yet still proclaimed to be a necessity) the system of the projected national liberties of the French empire, was without any further justification or explanation, overthrown, and even to the emperor's military acts was to be the same ordinary unannounced method—the princes of the Rhenish Confederacy had the name of Westphalia as territory, great or small, was spared in the accomplishment of this illegal usurpation. The boundary drawn by blind captives, without either labor or plea, without any consideration of honor or morality, political relations, intersected rivers and countries, cut off the middle and southern states of Germany from all communication with the German sea coast, the Elbe's period Denmark from its coast, laid its provinces open to the Baltic, and seemed to be rapidly approaching the line of Prussia's possessions still occupied in the Oder, and so forth. In this act of usurpation (however unworthy it affected all rights and possessions, all geographical, political and ordinary complete possessions of territory) that it was impossible to write it any other than the plain language of self greater usurpations, by which one half of Germany was to become a French province, and the other half of Germany the salute ruler of the continent.

To Russia and Prussia this unannounced extension of the French territory could not fail of producing the most serious alarm. The latter, surrounded on all sides no longer capable of free action, displayed every means of obtaining fresh strength, appeared intending to its destination. Russia, already in war for her west-province by the conversion of the city of Danzig, declared a friend by the treaty of Tilsit, into a French military post, and of a great part of Poland into a French province, could not but see, the advance of the French dominion along the sea coast, and in the new chains prepared for Prussia, the imminent danger of her German and Polish possessions. From this moment therefore, the rupture between France and Russia was as good as decided.

Not without deep and just anxiety did Austria observe the storm which was gathering. The scene of hostilities would in every case be contiguous to her provinces, which owing to the financial system which had crumpled the restoration of her military means, were in a very defenceless state. In a higher point of view, the struggle which awaited Prussia appeared still more doubtful, as it commenced under the same unavoidable conjuncture of affairs, with the same want of co-operation on the part of other powers, and with the same disproportion in their relative means, consequently was just as hopeless as all former struggles of the same nature. His majesty the emperor made every effort in his power by friendly mediation with both parties to avert the impending storm. No human judgment could at that time foresee that the period was so near at hand, when the failure of these friendly attempts should prove more injurious to the emperor Napoleon than to his opponent. Thus however, it was resolved by the wisdom of Providence,

When the commencement of hostilities was no longer doubted, his majesty was compelled to have recourse to measures which, in so unnatural and dangerous conjuncture, might combine his own security with just consideration for the real interests of neighboring states. The system of unarméd inaction the only neutrality which the emperor Napoleon, according to his own declarations, would have profited by, was every maxim of policy wholly inadmissible, and would at least have proved only a vain endeavor to shrink from the approaching trial. A power so important as Austria could not renounce all participation in the interest of Europe, nor could she place herself in a situation in which, equally in active in peace or war, she would lose her voice and influence in all great negotiations, without acquiring any guarantee for the security of her own frontiers. To prepare for war against France would have been, as with the existing circumstances, as little consistent with equity as with prudence. The emperor Napoleon had given his majesty no personal ground for hostile proceedings; and the prospect of attaining many beneficial results by a skilful employment of the established friendly relations, by confidential representations, and by conciliatory overtures, had not been abandoned as hopeless. And with regard to the immediate interests of the state, such a revolution would certainly have been attended with this consequence—that the Austrian territory would have become the first and principal seat of war, which with its well known deficiency of means of defence could, in a short time, have overthrown the monarchy.

In this painful situation his majesty had no other resource than to take the field on the side of France. To take up arms for France, in the real sense of the word, would have been a measure not only in contradiction with the duties and principles of the emperor, but even with the repeated declarations of his cabinet, which had, without any reserve, disapproved of this war. On the signature of the treaty of the 12th March, 1812, his majesty proceeded upon two distinct principles: The first as is proved by the words of the treaty, was to leave no means untried which might sooner or later obtain a peace; the other was to be ready to meet himself, and eventually to take a position, which if it should grow impossible to effect a peace, or if a case should occur in the war, would render decisive measures in this part necessary, would enable Austria to act with independence, and in either of these cases to adopt the measures which a just and wise policy should require. Upon this principle it was that only a fixed and nominally very small part of the army was destined to co-operate in the war, and the other military resources, at that time in a state of readiness, or that still remained to be prepared, were not called forth for the prosecution of this war. By a kind of tacit agreement between the belligerents, the Austrian territory was to be treated as neutral. The real end and views of the system adopted by his majesty, could not escape the notice of France, Russia, or any belligerent observer.

The campaign of 1812 furnishes a memorable example of the failure of an undertaking supported by gigantic powers, conducted by a coalition of the first rank, when, in the confidence of great military talents, he despises the rules of prudence, and oversteps the bounds of nature. The illusion of glory carried the emperor Napoleon into the heart of the Russian empire; and a false political view of things induced him to imagine that he should dictate a peace in Moscow, should compel the Russian power to halt a century, and the French invasions. When the magnanimous constancy of the emperor of Russia, the glorious deeds of his warriors, and the unshaken fidelity of his people, put an end to his dream, it was too late to repent of it with impunity. The whole French army was scattered and destroyed; in less than four months, we have seen the theatre of war transferred from the Dnieper and the Dniester to the Oder and the Elbe.

This rapid and extraordinary change of fortune was the forerunner of an important revolution in all the political relations of Europe. The confederacy of Russia, Great Britain and Sweden, presented a point of union to all neighboring states. Prussia when a report had long declared terminated to resist all, to prefer even the danger of immediate political destruction to the lingering sufferings of continued oppression, seized the favorable moment and threw herself into the arms of the allies. Many greater and smaller princes of Germany were ready to do the same. Every where the ardent desire of the people anticipated the regular proceedings of their governments. Their impatience to live in peace and order, and under their own laws, the sentiment of wounded national honor, and the hatred of a foreign dominion, broke out to bright flames on all sides.

His majesty the emperor, too intelligent not to consider this change of affairs, as the natural and necessary consequences of a previous violent political convulsion, and too just to view it in anger, was solely bent upon securing, by deep digested and well combined measures, the real and permanent interests of the European commonwealths. Already in the beginning of December, considerable steps had been taken on the part of the Austrian cabinet to dispose of the emperor Napoleon to quit and peacefully relinquish grounds which equally justify the world and posterity in blaming. These steps were from time to time renewed and renewed. His Majesty had been entertained that the impression of his own campaign, the recollection of the fearful sacrifice of an immense army, the severe character of every description that would be necessary to replace that loss, the decided disinclination of France, and of all those nations connected with her to a war which without any prospect of future indemnification exhausted and ruined her internal strength; that lastly, even a calm reflection on the doubtful issue of this new and highly luminous crisis, would move the emperor to listen to the representations of Austria.

The tone of these representations was carefully adapted to the circumstances of the times, as regards the greatness of the object, moderate as the basis of a favorable issue, and as the existing friendly relations required.

That this overture flowing from so pure a motive should be decidedly rejected, could not be certainly be foreseen. But the manner in which they were received, and still more the striking contrast between the sentiments entertained by Austria and the whole conduct of the emperor Napoleon, to the period of this unsuccessful endeavor for peace soon destroyed the best basis that were entertained. Instead of endeavoring by a moderate language to improve at least our view of the future, and to lessen the general despondency, it was on every occasion solemnly declared, in foretelling the consequences in France, that the emperor would bear no proposition for peace, not should violate the integrity of the French empire, in the French sense of the world, or that should undertake any pretension to the sovereignty incorporated provinces.

At the same time, essential conditions, with which this offer of a boundary did not appear to have any relation, were spoken of, as if they were increasing indignation, at another with less acceptance. One of these conditions was possible to declare in terms sufficiently distinct, the renunciation of the emperor Napoleon, of the right to make to the Emperor of the world even one single annual sacrifice.

These hostile demonstrations were attended with this particular mortification to Austria, that they placed even the invitations to peace with this respect, with the knowledge and appear to consist of France, made to other courts, in a false and highly disadvantageous light. The sovereigns of Europe, in answer to Austria's propositions for negotiation, and her offers of mediation, had before her the public declarations of the French emperor. And when in the month of March, his majesty sent a minister to London, to visit the Emperor, to share in a negotiation for peace, the British ministry replied, that they would not believe Austria still entertained any hopes of peace, when the emperor Napoleon had in the same time expressed sentiments which could only tend to the preparation of war; a declaration which was the more painful to his majesty, the more it was just and well founded.

Austria, however, did not upon this account, cease to express in her councils, and distinct professions, the sincerity of her views upon the conduct of the emperor Napoleon; but in all her measures by the principles of a balance of power in Europe, she had been destroyed by the boldness of the policy of France, and a peace was tried. At the end of six or seven months, his majesty in the mean time adapted every necessary measure, to strengthen and consolidate his arms, as possible; that Austria might be prepared for war if her mediation were to be entirely unavailing. His Majesty had no more or been being seen, proceeded, the probability of an immediate share in the war, would no longer be excluded from his calculations. The actual state of things could not be continued; of this the emperor was convinced; this conviction was the mainspring of his actions, and was naturally strengthened by the failure of any attempt to procure a peace. The result was apparent. By one means or the other, either by negotiation or by force of arms, a new state of things must be effected.

The emperor Napoleon was not only aware of the Austrian preparations for war, but even acknowledged them as necessary, and justified them in more than one instance. He had sufficient reason to believe, that this policy of the emperor, and said since a peace for the benefit of the whole world, would lay aside all personal and momentary feelings, would lay aside the lasting welfare of Austria, and of the countries by which she is surrounded, and would survive nothing but what this great nation should impose upon you. The Austrian cabinet had never expressed itself in terms that would warrant any other construction, and yet the French did not only acknowledge that the Austrian intention could only be an arm of rebellion, but declared upon more than one occasion, that Austria, under existing circumstances, ought no longer to confine herself to act a secondary part, but should appear in force upon the stage and take as a great and independent power. What ever the French government could either hope or fear from Austria, this acknowledgment it was of its previous justification of the whole intended and hitherto adopted measures of his imperial majesty.

This far were given instances developed when the emperor Napoleon left Paris, in order to make head against the progress of the allied armies—Even their enemies have done homage to the valor of the Russian and Prussian troops in the supplementary actions of the month of May. That, however, the result of the first period of the campaign was not more favorable to them, was owing, partly to the great moral superiority of the French force, and to the universally acknowledged military talents of their leaders, and to the political combinations by which the allied sovereigns were guided in all their undertakings. They acted under the just supposition, that a cause like the one in which they were engaged could not possibly be destined to themselves, that sooner or later, whether successful or unfortunate, every state which still preserved a shadow of independence must join their confederacy, every independent army must act with them. They therefore did not allow further scope to the bravery of their troops than the moment required, and preserved a considerable part of their strength for a period, when, with more extended means, they might look to the attainment of greater objects. For the same cause, and with a view to the development of events, they consented to the armistice.

In the mean time, the retreat of the allies had for the moment given an appearance to the war which daily became more interesting to the emperor, from the impossibility, if it should proceed, of his remaining an inactive spectator of it. The fate of the Prussian monarchy was a point which peculiarly attracted the attention of his majesty, feeling as the emperor did, that the restoration of the Prussian monarchy was the first step towards that of the whole political system of Europe, and he viewed the danger which he now stood as equally affecting himself. Already in the month of April had the emperor Napoleon suggested to the Austrian cabinet, that he considered the dissolution of the Prussian monarchy as a natural consequence of her defeat from France, and of the continuation of the war; and that it now only depended upon Austria to take the most important and most flourishing her provinces to its own state; a suggestion which showed distinctly enough, that no means could properly be neglected to save that power. If this great object could not be obtained by a just peace, it was necessary to support Russia and Prussia by a powerful co-operation. From this natural view of things, upon which even France could not contradict itself, his majesty continued his preparations with unwearying activity; he quitted in the early part of July his residence and proceeded to the vicinity of the scene of action, in order the more effectually to labor for the negotiation of peace, which still continued to be the object of his most ardent desires, and partly to be able the more effectually to concert the preparations for war, if no other choice should remain for Austria.

At a short time before, the emperor Napoleon had declared, that he had proposed a congress to be held at Prague, where plenipotentiaries from France, the United States of North-America, Denmark, the Kingdom of Spain, and the other allied princes on the one hand, and on the other, plenipotentiaries of England, Russia, Prussia, and the Spanish colonies, and the other allies of this hostile mass, should meet, and by the ground work of a durable peace. To whom this proposition was addressed, in what manner, in what diplomatic form, through whose organ, it could have been done, was positively unknown to the Austrian cabinet; which only was made acquainted with the circumstance through the publication of the public prints. How too, such a project could be brought to bear—how from the combination of such dissimilar elements, without any previously arranged plan, a negotiation for peace was to be set on foot, was so little to be comprehended, that it was very allowable to consider the whole proposition rather as a play of the imagination, than as a serious invitation to the adoption of any great political measure.

Partly acquainted with all the obstacles to a general peace, Austria had long considered whether this distant and difficult object was not rather to be attained progressively, and in this opinion, had expressed herself both to France, and to Russia and Prussia, upon the subject of a continental peace. Not that a strict court had pronounced a veto for a moment, the necessity and the importance of such a peace were among all the great powers and in Europe, and without which there was no hope of either safety or happiness, nor had imagined that there was no hope of either safety or happiness of England, nor that the continental coalition, if it should be concluded, would not be entirely considered as a most deadly evil. The negotiation which Austria proposed, after the armistice declaration of France had nearly destroyed all hopes of England entering her endeavors in the attempt to procure a general peace, was an essential part of the general approaching negotiation, for a general and effective congress to be held; it was intended as preparatory to this, to draw up the preliminary articles of the future treaty, to pave the way by a long continental armistice to a more extended and durable negotiation. Had the principle upon which Austria advanced been other than this, neither Russia nor Prussia, bound by the strong ties to England, would ever have listened to the proposition of the Austrian cabinet.

After the Russian and Prussian courts, animated by a confidence in his majesty, highly flattering to the emperor, had already declared their concurrence in the proposed congress under the mediation of Austria, it became necessary to obtain the formal assent of the emperor Napoleon, and to determine upon what principle the negotiations for peace were to be carried on. For this purpose, his imperial majesty resolved towards the end of the month of June to send a minister to Dresden. The result of this mission was a convention concluded on the 30th June accepting the mediation of his imperial majesty in the negotiation of a general, and if that could not be effected, of a preliminary continental peace. The city of Prague was fixed upon for the meeting of congress, and the 5th of July for the day of its opening. In order to obtain a sufficient time for a negotiation, it was determined by the same convention that the emperor Napoleon should not give notice of the rupture of the armistice which was to terminate on the 20th of July, at that time existing between him and Russia, till the 10th of August; and his majesty the emperor took upon himself to obtain a similar declaration from the Russian and Prussian courts.

The points which had been determined in Dresden, were hereupon imparted to the two courts. Although the confirmation of the armistice was attended with many negotiations, and with much serious inconvenience to them, and a loss of living to his imperial majesty another proof of their confidence, and at the same time to satisfy the world that they would not refuse any prospect of peace, however distant it might be, that they would not refuse any attempt which might prepare the way to it, overcame every objection. The only alteration made to the convention of the 30th June was, that the term of opening the congress, since the final regulations could not so soon be determined, should be deferred until the 12th of July.

In the mean time his majesty, who would not as yet abandon all hopes of completely terminating by a general peace, the sufferings of mankind and the convulsions of the political world, had also resolved upon a new attempt with the British government. The emperor Napoleon not only revived the proposal with apparent approbation, but even voluntarily offered to expedite the business, by allowing the persons to be dispatched for that purpose to England, a passage through France. When it was to be carried into effect, unexpected difficulties arose, the passports were delayed from time to time, under trifling pretexts, and at length entirely refused. This proceeding afforded a fresh and important ground for entertaining just doubts as to the sincerity of the assurances which the emperor Napoleon had more than once publicly expressed of his disposition to peace, although several of his expressions at that particular period, afforded just reason to believe that a maritime peace was the object of his most anxious solicitude.

During that interval their majesties the emperor of Russia and the king of Prussia had nominated their plenipotentiaries to the congress, and had furnished them with very decisive instructions. On the 12th July they both arrived at Prague, as well as his majesty's minister, charged with the concerns of the mediation.

The negotiations were not to be protracted beyond the 14th of August, except in the event of their assuming such a character as to induce a confident hope of a favorable result. To that day the armistice had been extended through the mediation of Austria, the political and military situation of the allied sovereigns, the condition of the countries to be occupied, and their anxious wish to terminate an irksome period of uncertainty prior to any further extension of it. With all these circumstances the emperor Napoleon was acquainted; he well knew that the period of the negotiations was necessarily defined by that of the armistice; and he could not moreover conceal from himself how much his own determinations would influence the happy abridgement and successful result of the pending negotiations.

It was therefore with real sorrow that his majesty soon perceived not only that no serious step was taken by France to accelerate this great work, but, on the contrary, it appeared as if a procrastination of the negotiations, and evasion of a favorable issue had been decidedly intended.—There was indeed a French minister at the place of congress, but without any orders to proceed to business, until the appearance of the first plenipotentiary.

The arrival of that plenipotentiary was in vain expected from day to day. Nor was it until the 21st July that it was ascertained, that a demand which took place on settling the removal of the armistice between the French and Russian and Prussian commissioners an obstruction of very subordinate importance, having no influence whatever upon the congress, and which might have been very easily and speedily removed by the interference of Austria, was made use of as the justification of this extraordinary delay. And when this last pretext was removed, it was not until the 28th of July, sixteen days after that appointed for the opening of the congress that the first French plenipotentiary arrived.

Even on the very first day after this minister's arrival, no doubt remained as to the fate of the congress. The form in which the full powers were to be delivered and mutual explanations should be conducted, a point, which had already been treated by all parties, became the object of a discussion, which rendered all the endeavors of the mediating powers abortive. The apparent insufficiency of the powers entrusted to the French negotiator, occasioned a silence of several days. Nor was it until the 9th of August that this minister gave in a new declaration, by which the difficulties with respect to forms were by no means removed, nor the negotiation by one step brought nearer to its object. After a useless exchange of notes upon every preliminary question, the 19th of August arrived. The Prussian and Russian negotiators could not exceed this term; the congress was at an end, and the resolution which Austria had to form was previously determined, by the progress of this negotiation—by the actual conviction of the impossibility of peace—by the no longer doubtful point of view in which his majesty examined the great question in dispute—by the principles and intentions of the allies, wherein the emperor recognized his own—and finally, by the former positive declarations, which left no room for misconception.

Not without sincere affliction, and alone consoled by the certainty that every means to avoid the war had been exhausted, does the emperor now find himself compelled to action. For three years has his majesty labored with unceasing perseverance to effect, by mild and conciliatory measures, real and durable peace for Austria and for Europe. All his endeavors have failed: there is now no remedy, no resource to be had but to arms. The emperor takes then up without any personal animosity; from a painful necessity, from an irresistible duty, upon grounds which any faithful citizen of his realm, which the world, which the emperor Napoleon himself in a moment of tranquility and reason, will acknowledge and justify. The necessity of this war is engraven in the heart of every Austrian, of every European, under whosever dominion he may live, in such legible characters that no art is necessary to distinguish them. The nation and the army will do their duty. A union established by common necessity, and by the mutual interest of every power that is in arms for its independence, will give due weight to our exertions; and the result, with the assistance of Heaven, will be such as must fulfil the just expectations of every friend of order and of peace.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Army of the United States.—By the act of the 30th of March, 1812, the frigates Cheesapeake, Constellation, and Adams, are to be immediately put into actual service, 300,000 dollars appropriated, and 200,000 annually, for 3 years, for the purchase of ship timber—and the frigates Philadelphia, General Green, New-York and Boston, to be re-built.

Gun-boats to be laid up, and distributed in the harbors of the maritime frontier.

By the act of 2nd January 1813, four ships of 74 guns, and six ships of 44 guns, are to be built—2,500,000 dollars appropriated.

By the acts of March 3, 1813, six sloops of war are to be built, and such a number of sloops of war or other armed vessels to be manned, &c. as the public service on the lakes, may require—300,000 dolls. appropriated—100,000 dollars appropriated for a dock-yard.

Sale of the gun boats unfit for service, authorized.

Which, with $4,033,788 55 expenses of the navy and marine for 1813, is $8,433,788 55 cents, for a navy, and twenty new vessels to be built."

Practical gunnery.—Gen. Morton's brigade of N. Y. state artillery, was exercised at a target (a small vessel of 60 tons, anchored at the distance of 1000 yards) last week; of the 90 shot fired, 50 struck the vessel, and she was sunk. It was universally believed that every shot would have "hold" had the object been a ship of war. It is pleasant to see that New-York has such expert defenders.

Commerce of the Enemy.—The British have had 80 sail of vessels captured in the European seas, within a few months past by the frigate President the brig Argus, and five of our privateers: though no sail is spread but by permission of the lords of the admiralty.

A letter from Erie, states, that the following Indians having made peace with the United States, were furnished with provisions at Detroit:

Pottawatamies,	- - - - -	854
Miamies, Eel river Miamies, and Weaws,	- - - - -	942
Kickapooos,	- - - - -	323
Tawas and Chippeways,	- - - - -	920
Wyandots,	- - - - -	400

Total, - - - - - 3419

After being supplied, they were sent off to their respective villages, and we hope and believe will be quiet.

The same letter says—"Of those who followed the northwestern army, now remaining at Detroit, there are—

Senecas,	- - - - -	75
Wyandots,	- - - - -	31
Shawanees,	- - - - -	35
Delawares,	- - - - -	50

Total, - - - - - 171

There have been near 300 altogether attached to the N. W. army.

I have conversed with several officers who were in the army when Proctor's army was captured on the river La Trench, on the 5th inst. It is certain that Tecumseh was killed in the action; his body was viewed by many of the British officers, who all acknowledged it.

The principal stand that was made was by the Indians; the regulars threw down their arms and called for quarters, after one or two fires, which had done but little execution to our troops. The whole number of British regulars surrendered, was something rising 600, and the number of Indians engaged was about 1200, who scattered in all directions after they were routed; 45 of them were killed, and 12 regulars. Our loss was but 8 or 10 killed."

The vestry of the Hebrew Synagogue, at Charleston, S. C. "feeling grateful towards the Almighty Disposer of Events, for having pleased to crown with success the arms of the United States, both by land and sea," appointed Sunday, the 31st ult. as a day of thanksgiving and prayer.

The following is given in a Lexington paper as the speech of the Indians who submitted to J. Arthur—

"Father—we are now unarmed; we are at your mercy, go with us as you think proper. Our squaws and children are perishing; we, ourselves, are perishing—if you take us by the hand, we are willing to take up the tomahawk against any power, either white or red, which you may direct."

They were immediately taken by the hand; tobacco was distributed among them, and they were directed to bring up their squaws and children—and were promised that they and their tribes should be fed at the expense of the U. States.

Captain Brooke, of the British brigate Shannon, has been created a baronet, by the Prince Regent.—Gen. Blesop, who was on board the Java, has also been created a baronet.

The British have of Naval officers, 220 admirals, 824 captains, 651 commanders, 3267 lieutenants.

It is stated that 4000 troops have been enlisted in the state of Vermont, since the war. On which it has been jocosely observed, that well might the peace party carry their point at the polls, as so many of the war party had went forth to effect the will of the nation at the point of the bayonet.

A N. Y. paper has the following paragraph: "Col. GALT, a British prisoner, while on his way from Sacket's Harbor to Greenbush, happened in conversation with a gentleman in Champlain, who asked the colonel how they liked the war in Canada: the colonel replied, "when our government says war, we never stand to talk about politics."

Russian Mediation.—We have nothing certain as to the probable success or failure of the mission to Russia, though an abundance of speculations are afloat in the papers. One of them says, that Mr. Munroe has written to a relative in Virginia, informing him that the British had appointed an envoy to meet our ministers.

Retaliation in Extensio.—We republished, a short time since, from a Salem paper, a paragraph stating, that ten English prisoners in our possession, had been closely confined at Ipswich, in this district, in retaliation for sixteen American prisoners held in dungeons in Halifax, by the enemy. We have since ascertained, from a correct source, that the number of prisoners retaliated on are sixteen; and we take occasion, for the information and alleviation of the relatives and friends of our unfortunate one hundred and one countrymen who have been torn from their wives, children and parents, and sent to England under the false pretence of their being British subjects, to state that a like number of English prisoners of war have been designated, and are now detained by order of the President as hostages for the security and good treatment of our countrymen, and that they will not be liberated, until our citizens are restored to their connections and country, in safety.—Boston Chron.

From the National Intelligencer.

Having been informed, from more than one quarter, that a false statement has been in circulation, that every barrel of flour furnished to the North-Western Army during the last year, has cost the United States from fifty to sixty dollars, we have thought it our duty to enquire into the facts. With this view we have applied to the officer at the head of the department of purchases and supplies of the North-Western army, who is fortunately now in this city, from whom we have received the following satisfactory official information. Since the declaration of war, we learn that Mr. Piatt has been distinguished as a public agent for his talents, zeal, integrity, and unwearied application in the public service. His statement is fully corroborated by another respectable and well informed gentleman, whose statement not having been reduced to writing, we do not think it necessary to avail ourselves of it. Mr. Piatt's letter completely puts down the slander.

TO THE EDITORS.

Washington City, Nov. 6, 1813.

Gentlemen—In answer to your enquiries relative to the cost of flour for the Western army, I am able to give you the most correct information.

I was appointed deputy commissary of purchases in the service of the U. States, in September 1812—and since that time have been constantly employed at the head of the purchasing department for the army under general Harrison, until after a defeat of the whole British and Indian forces under general Proctor in Upper Canada. The cost of flour for the North-Western army has varied at different seasons and at different posts. The average prices have been as follows, viz: at Cincinnati, on the Ohio, 6 dollars per bbl. at Piqua, 8 dollars—at St. Mary's 10 dolls. 50 cts. at Amanda 11 dolls. at fort Defiance and fort Wayne 14 dollars, and at fort Meigs on the Miami, the most remote post, the highest price at which flour has been supplied, including all incidental expenses, has not exceeded 15 dolls. per barrel.

I take the liberty to state, for your further information, that, at the last mentioned post, the average cost to the U. States of beef and pork, has been 3 dolls. per hundred—at the other posts mentioned, the meat part of the ration, has cost from 3 dolls. 50 cts. to 4 dolls. 50 cts. per hundred.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, sirs, your obedient servant,

JOHN H. PIATT.

Deputy commissioner of purchases in the service of the U. States, attached to the North-Western army.

MESSES. GALE & SEATON.

THE MICHIGANIANS.—The day may not have arrived, but it must ere long come, when the American republic will be under a necessity of demanding; and, by proper perseverance, of obtaining redress for every injury done to her citizens, whether in relation to their persons, or their commercial or other property; and in whatever quarter or region of the world committed.

At the present moment, the violation of the capitulation of Detroit will claim the first attention.—Ample indemnity ought to be extended to the sufferers; and if our nation cannot, by arms, obtain a counter-indemnification, perhaps it ought magnanimously to sustain the loss. The fidelity of our citizens is not of a nature to be trampled with; and, where they are true to us, we must be true to them. We lay this day before our readers the protest of the inhabitants of the territory of Michigan, in relation to the violation of the third article of the capitulation which ignobly subjected them to British domination.—Nat. Int.

THE PROTEST.—Whereas it has been signified to us, the undersigned citizens of the United States, resident at Detroit in the territory of Michigan by col. Henry Proctor, the British commanding officer, that it is his will and pleasure we should depart from and leave the said territory, and he so orders and directs it; leaving behind at the same time as we necessarily must do our dearest relatives exposed to all the cruelties and evils incident to a state of war, and our property at the mercy of the marauding savage:

Resolved therefore, that we consider the said order of the said col. Henry Proctor, as a flagrant and gross violation of the 3d article of the capitulation, made and concluded at Detroit, on the sixteenth day of August last, and by reason whereof this place was surrendered to the British flag.

Resolved 2dly, that it is a duty we owe to ourselves and to our country, to resist manfully, and spiritedly, by all the powers of reason and argument, every unwarrantable attempt upon our personal rights, that is not strictly compatible with the articles of capitulation.

And whereas we entertain a very sensible, and thorough conviction, that a military officer, by an unjustifiable and wanton invasion of the private rights of an individual, may not only incur the displeasure of his own government, but will lay himself personally responsible to the individual injured:

Resolved therefore, 3dly, That for every violation of our rights and privileges, attended with an injury to our person or property, we will make a solemn appeal in the dernier resort to the empire of the law.

Resolved 4thly, That we entertain a high sense of the honor of a military parole and the virtuous and delicate use that ought to be made of it; as likewise of the necessity and the propriety of a strict and exemplary neutrality so long as we remain under the British flag, and are protected in our persons and property agreeable to the true spirit and letter of the articles of the capitulation.

Resolved 5thly, That if there are any amongst us whose conduct and behaviour does not strictly comport with the spirit and meaning of the preceding resolution, they ought not to be screened from punishment, but, that it is our duty to assist in exposing them to the just animadversion and censure of their own improper conduct.

And whereas we entertain a high sense of the manly, dignified and spirited conduct of Augustus B. Woodward, Esq. whose services have heretofore been so pre-eminently useful to the inhabitants.

Resolved therefore, 6thly, That he be presented with these resolutions, with a request to lay them before the said col. Henry Proctor, and to use all lawful and honorable intreaty with him to obtain a revocation of his aforesaid order, so diametrically opposite to the aforesaid 3d article of the capitulation, and so manifestly injurious at this particular season of the year to our persons and property.

MILITARY.

Northern armies.—We are without any regular intelligence from either of the northern armies; and the reports in the newspapers are so desultory that we hardly dare to notice them. It is stated, however, that on the 27th ult. the British and Indians, 5000 strong, under gen. Proves, attacked the advanced corps of gen. Hampton's army, then a few miles from Montreal, which brought up the main body, who repulsed the enemy at the point of the bayonet, and drove him from the field. Our loss is reported at between 30 and 40 killed and wounded—That of the enemy is not stated. After which our army returned to "Chatague Four corners." It is intimated that the sole object of Hampton at present is to keep sir George Prevost in check while Wilkinson finishes the business at Kingston, &c. for he has not passed down the St. Lawrence, as reported last week. Our last account from m. j. gen. Wilkinson's force is of the 23d ult. when they were on Grenadier Island; their movements are said to have been retarded by continual torrents of rain. Chambray was off Kingston blocking up Foe.

Washington City, Nov. 9.—The 36th regiment of infantry, lately encamped near this city, have marched. Capt. Joseph Hook's company to garrison fort Washington, on the Potomac: captains Merrick and Deacales' companies, of 100 men each, to garrison forts Madison and Severn: the residue of the 36th regiment, under the command of colonel Cullberry, to winter quarters at Fredericktown barracks.

A detachment of the 38th regiment, of 400 men, under the command of major Fraley, will strike their tents on Friday, and embark for forts Nelson and Norfolk. The residue of the 38th regiment, we understand, are to garrison fort Mifflin.

Near a thousand men of those regiments have been encamped within a mile of the Capitol, since the first day of September, and in that time only four men have died.

NEW ORLEANS, Oct. 9.

From Mobile, we learn that Gen. Flournoy was about to take the field at the head of about 1800 men, consisting of the 3d, and part of the 7th regiment U. S. volunteers, a detachment of cavalry from Natchez, and the local militia.

Two Choctaw chiefs had visited Gen. F. and offered their services against the Creeks—the general accepted their offer, and they returned home to prepare their young men for the war.

The following is a copy of a letter from general Harrison to governor Meigs:

Head-quarters, Detroit, Oct. 11, 1813.

DEAR GOVERNOR—You will have heard before this reaches you, that I was fortunate enough to overtake general Proctor, and his tawny allies, and to give them a complete drubbing. I have six hundred and one prisoners of the British regulars, officers included, among which there are two colonels.

Nothing but misfortune could have governed gen. Proctor's conduct. The day that I landed below Malden he had at his disposal upwards of 3000 Indian warriors: his regular force, reinforced by the militia of the district, would have made his numbers nearly equal to my aggregate; which, on the day of landing, did not exceed 4500. The papers have greatly exaggerated the number of militia from Kentucky: those which embarked with me at Portage, did not amount to three thousand rank and file, and several hundred of them were left in the islands.

The Indians were extremely desirous of fighting us at Malden. I enclose you Tecumseh's speech to Proctor: it is at once an evidence of the talents of the former, and the great defect of them in the latter. His inferior officers say that his conduct has been a continued series of blunders. He manifested, indeed, some judgment, in the choice of his field of battle, as he was so posted that I could not turn him, and could only oppose a line of equal extent to his. However, the contest was not for a moment doubtful. The greater part of his Indians were in the air (according to the Persian military phraseology) and his regulars broken and made prisoners by a single charge of mounted infantry. We took up on the ground, or near it, a fine brass field train of artillery. Several of the pieces are the trophies of the revolution, taken at Saratoga and York, and surrendered by gen. Hull. The number of small arms and military stores taken by us or destroyed by the enemy is immense. My force in the action, of all descriptions, was short of 2500.

I am preparing an expedition to Michilimackinac, and another to Long Point, to destroy at the latter a depot of provisions.

I shall send orders to general Gano, by this conveyance. It is probable that the greater part of his troops may be dismissed in a short time. The Indians in this neighborhood, are submitting at discretion. I am your friend,

WM. H. HARRISON.

His excellency Gov. Mengs.

NAVAL.

The Horatio frigate, with her guard, the Venerable of 74 guns, was lately off the Western islands, cruising for American vessels. The Sea-horse frigate, with her convoy, the Royal Oak, 74, has returned to Ban-ry bay, from a cruise after com. Rodgers. Two frigates that sailed in company to catch him, have also fortunately returned together. Some of the 74's that went after him, are yet to be heard of. How great would be the glory of taking that hated man!

The phrase, "cruising frigates," seems blotted from the naval vocabulary of the enemy. Determined not to expose their 'defective masts' and 'worm eaten cannon' to the hazard of meeting one of our 'terrible non-descripts,' the frigates now always sail in pairs, or under cover of at least a 74 gun ship. Two of them have been dispatched to catch the Essee—and if they do meet her, perhaps, may capture her.

A person from Halifax mentions the arrival at that place, of several vessels of war from England. He also states that the Chesapeake is to be sent there for a raze—and that admiral Warren was to winter at Bermuda.

The Majestic (raze) appeared off Provincetown, (Maine) on the 16th ult. when her captain, having seized three small vessels, made a proposition to give them up, provided he received as their ransom a supply of water; and if refused, threatened to destroy every house in the place. After some negotiation, 200 puncheons were carried to the ship by the inhabitants. The water was not paid for; but the commander of the Majestic observed, that the Nymph frigate would soon be there for a supply, and that they should lose nothing by it, &c.

Several American privateers are on the British coasts. The Lion and 2 others, is cruising on the coast of Spain. The Scourge and Rattlesnake, released 180 prisoners, which they took in the fleet from Archangel.

The U. States' brigs Enterprise and Rattlesnake sailed from Portsmouth, some days ago, to ascertain the character of two British vessels that were off the harbor. They approached within three miles of the enemy, and finding them too heavy, returned.—They are said to be the Antonie and Epervier, very stout sloops of war, rating 18 guns each, and probably carrying 22.

Sackett's Harbor, 10th October, 1813.

"Captain Morgan, of our riflemen, was sent a few days ago with his company to Gravelly Point, between here and Kingston, near the latter place, seeing an English schooner gun boat, he concealed his men in the woods, about 60, and sent a small boat along the shore, which the enemy espying, gave chase to it, and when they came near, the small boat landed, and the men ran into the woods; the gun boat came near shore and sent a party after the fugitives, on which Morgan's company rushed out and peppered them so well with rifle balls, (killing or wounding whoever appeared on deck) that the Englishmen lay down close, and the wind drove their gun boat ashore, when the riflemen waded out in the water and took possession of her, with about 50 prisoners, having killed three and wounded seven of the enemy, without the loss of a man on our side."

BLOCKADE OF THE CHESAPEAKE.

An enemy frigate, brig and sloop, on the 28th ultimo, appeared off the Potomac, and have since committed the usual depredations on the shores and the bay craft. They have plundered much and burnt many small vessels. A 74 has since come up—an "bulwark" of civilized war.

692. A brig captured by ditto and manned for the United States—wrecked on the coast of Florida.

693. Brig President, with a valuable cargo of sugar, molasses and rum, sent into Savannah, by the Polly, of Salem.

The Yankee in her last cruise of 49 days, captured the brig Ann, with rum, salt and dry goods, for Newfoundland, valued at $340,000; brig Mary, salt, coals and crockery, worth 20,000; brig Dispatch, dry goods, cutlery, &c. &c. invoiced at 180,000 sterling; brig Telemachus, with rigging, coals, provisions, &c. $40,000; brig Favorite, of little value, given up to release the prisoners; sch. Katy, laden with wine; barque Paris, 10 guns, captured after 35 minutes fight, a very valuable vessel; brig Howe, 6 guns—threw the guns on board and gave up the vessel to the prisoners; John and Mary, shot, provisions, &c. worth $49,000. These loaded vessels were part of a fleet from Cork; two of them were ordered for France, and the rest for different ports of the United States, where we shall greet their arrival. * * It is possible the greater part of the Yankees prizes may be recaptured. If she had belonged to the United States, sailing under orders to destroy the commerce of the enemy, the loss of property would have been equal to half a million of dollars on his part, and the gain of 180 prisoners on our's, in the space of 49 days.

Law of Treason.

From the Democratic Press.

CIRCUIT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Pennsylvania District, October 7, 1813.

On Saturday the grand jury returned a true bill against William Peyer, a citizen of Massachusetts, for treason against the United States, by adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. William Peyer was accordingly, bound in a recognizance, with two sureties to take his trial, at the next April term; Judge Washington's absence, on account of severe indisposition, rendering a postponement of the trial necessary.

Judge Peters, at the opening of the session, delivered a charge to the grand jury, expounding the law of treason, in a clear and forcible manner. We hope to obtain a copy of the charge for publication, in the meantime we cannot forbear presenting the following Extracts, by way of solemn admonition, to citizens resident every where, as well as to aliens, resident within the jurisdiction of the United States.

"The wise and virtuous framers of our constitution were aware of the evils attendant on multiplied items of charges, which might be construed into treason. They knew the agitations into which free governments are liable to be thrown; and they endeavored to guard, as far as human systems will permit, against the consequences of such agitations. In establishing a happy improvement of the system of government, they remained conscious, that they could not change the nature of man; prone, in the vicissitudes of power, to use for his own purposes, the means which he reprobated, while employed by other hands.

"By our constitution, then, it is declared that "treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," &c. &c.

"The law, in regard to the point, which I have deemed it necessary, at this time, to discuss, appears to be:

"1. Joining with enemies, in acts of hostility, by sea or land, will make a man a traitor, within both the clauses of our constitution; relating to levying war, and adhering to enemies. But if this be done through fear of death (not slight apprehension) and while the party is under actual force; and he takes the first opportunity of escaping; he is excused. But the mere apprehension of having houses burned or property destroyed, furnishes no ground of excuse.

"2. Furnishing enemies with money, arms, ammunition or other necessaries, will be prima facie evidence of treason. But if the means come with a superior force, and exact contributions, subsistants are not criminal.

"As to remuneration, made and received, for blunder or any acts of violence; it must be left to the jury, as a fact of intention and precedent; exciting suspicion, but not absolutely conclusive.

"The bare sending money or provisions (except under the circumstances before stated) or, worst of all, sending intelligence, to enemies engaged in hostile operations; will amount to treason, in giving aid and comfort; though the money, provisions or intelligence, be intercepted. The act was complete, on the part of the traitor, though it had not the intended effect.

"Supplying with provisions or refreshments, hostile ships, fleets, or troops, blockading our ports, and being aiding and raving our coasts, is a most aggravated offence. It tends immediately and directly, to promote and assist hostile operations; and is a species of aid and comfort, peculiarly deserving condign punishment. Intelligence given to such ships, fleets or troops, is doubly reprehensible, for evident reasons.

"The merchants of an European nation, who in times long past, supplied their enemy with gun powder, to batter down the walls of their own cities; are hung up, by history, to everlasting infamy. Yet their cupidity and defecation, were not more has, than are the conduct and motives of those, who are now guilty of the offences I have just mentioned.

"Writing letters, containing intelligence of a hostile nature, and only putting them in the post office, where they were stopped; has been adjudged to be treason, under the words giving aid or comfort. But merely expressing opinions, though they may be avowed to public measures, (unless done with a view to influence and direct the enemy in hostile enterprises) is not the kind of intelligence considered this criminal; though it were better omitted.

"Necessary correspondence, with an enemy, is not treasonable, nor unlawful. The subject matter alone, gives it a character. In our situation, epistolary correspondence, and other innocent intercourse, are indispensable to the business and affairs of those whose lawful pursuits and connections, have been suddenly and unexpectedly, cut off by the war.

"4. Enlisting, or procuring persons to enlist in the service of the enemy, is treason; though no actual hostility be committed. But marching or some other overt act, must be shewn.

"5. Taking a commission to cruise in an enemy's ship against the United States is treason; if the party go on board that ship; which is an act of hostility, although he commit no other. So is it with an engagement in enemy's service, in any capacity, if there be any advance, or overt act, in execution of the agreement.

"6. A conspiracy, with intent to aid and comfort is not an overt act of adherence; unless aid and comfort be afterwards given. And then it is treason, in every one of the conspirators; for there are no accessories in treason, all are principals; according to English authorities adopted here, though some respectable opinions are otherwise.

"7. Words or writings, are not overt acts.—But if such acts be afterwards actually committed by the party, they may be evidence of intention; upon which the jury must decide. Acts, and not words are the ingredients.—Writings never promulgated, are less than all evidence of treason. Algernon Sidney's case is well known. His sacrifice continues to excite unqualified detestation.

"8. Mere residence in a state at war, is not of itself, an act of adherence.

"9. There can be now, no doubt of the meaning of the term enemies, however it might have been, heretofore, disputable."

A case of Impressment.

To the editors of the National Intelligencer.

Observing in your paper some anecdotes respecting press gangs, I will relate to you one which I had an opportunity of observing personally, and in which much pleasantry was used at my expense.

In the month of Feb. 1797, I belonged to the ship

Fidelity, capt. Charles Weems, lying in the harbor of St. Pierre's, Martinique. About 1 o'clock Sunday morning, I was awakened by a noise on the deck, and on going up, found the ship in possession of a press gang. In a few minutes all hands were forced out and ordered into their boat, and in a heavy shower of rain conveyed on board the Ceres frigate. We were ordered on the gun deck until daylight, by which time about 80 Americans were collected. Soon after sunrise, each ship's crew was ordered into the cabin to be overhauled—each was questioned as to his name, &c. when I was called on for my place of birth, and answered Newcastle, Delaware. The captain affected not to hear the last, but said eye, Newcastle, he's a collier, the very man; I warrant him a sailor, send him down to the doctor.—Upon which a petty officer, whom I recognized as one of the press gang, made answer, sir, I know this fellow—he is a school-mate of mine and his name is Kelly—he was born in Belfast—and, Tom, you know me well enough, so don't shan you take any more. I thought, says the captain, he was a countryman of my own, but an Irishman's all one—take him away. The next was a Prussian, who had shipped in Hamburg, as carpenter of the Fidelity, in Sept. 1796—He affected, when questioned, to not understand English, but answered in Dutch. Upon which the captain laughed and said, this is no yankee, send him down and let the quartermaster put him in the mess with the other Dutch in that wardrobe and I him, and the boatswain will learn him to talk English. He was accordingly kept. I was afterwards discharged by an order from admiral Harvey, on the application of Mr. Craig, at that time American agent or vice-consul.

I further observed that full one-third of the crew were impressed Americans.

JOHN DAVIS, of Abel,

THE CHRONICLE.

M. de Kan z w has been received by the President of the United States, as minister from the court of Sweden.

There was an unprecedented snow storm at Erie, on the 11 h and 12th Oct. last. It fell to the depth of 12 inches on a level; but soon melted away.

Our enemy's war—A London paper of August 30, says—"The subsidy to Austria, contingent on her alliance, is already in progress of payment. Four bills of £25,000 each, drawn on Vienna, at three days sight, have actually been paid in London under instructions from the Treasury.

On lake Champlain there is reason to believe that a hard battle has been fought before this date, between the flotillas. A number of choice seamen from Quebec, are said to have reinforced the enemy. But we have full confidence in com. McDonough, and his officers and men, and do not fear the result.

In general, there is a great lack of news from the armies. We are content that it is so, knowing it to be in consequence of the orders of the commanders. There was too much scribbling.

A son of the late Toussaint l'Ouverture, of St. Domingo, is in London, and understood to be a preacher of talents.

It was reported in England, that Mr. Kenble, of the theatre, was coming to the United States.

The place of Poet Laureat, has, it is said, been conferred on Mr. Southey.

Of the twenty-seven millions, forming the amount of the late loan, the sum of 21,152,674¹/₂ has been paid, according to accounts made up at the 10th Saturday.

Hamilton's Report.

The secretary of the treasury, in obedience to the order of the house for representatives of the 15th of January, 1793, has applied his attention at as early a period as his other duties would permit, to the subject of manufactures; and particularly to the means of promoting such as will tend to render the United States independent on foreign nations, for military and other essential supplies: and he thereupon respectfully submits the following report:

There is evidently, as far as regards the annuity, no destruction nor transfer of any other capital, than that portion of the income of each individual, which goes to make up the annuity. The land, which furnishes the farmer with the sum which he is to contribute, remains the same; and the like may be observed of other capitals. Indeed, as far as the tax, which is the object of contribution (as frequently happens, when it does not oppress by its weight) may have been a motive to a greater exertion in any occupation: it may even serve to increase the contributory capital: this idea is not without importance in the general view of the subject.

It remains to see, what farther deduction ought to be made from the capital which is created, by the existence of the debt, on account of the coin, which is employed in its circulation. This is susceptible of much less precise calculation than the article which has been just discussed. It is impossible to say what proportion of coin is necessary to carry on the alienations which any species of property usually undergoes. The quantity, indeed, varies according to circumstances. But it may still, without hesitation, be pronounced, from the quickness of the rotation, or rather of the transitions, that the medium of circulation always bears but a small proportion to the amount of the property circulated. And it is thence satisfactorily deducible, that the coin employed in the negotiations of the funds, and which serves to give them activity, as capital, is incomparably less than the sum of the debt negotiated for the purpose of business.

It ought not, however, to be omitted, that the negotiation of the funds becomes itself a distinct business; which employs, and by employing, diversifies a portion of the circulating coin from other pursuits. But making due allowance for this circumstance, there is no reason to conclude, that the effect of the diversion of coin in the whole operation bears any considerable proportion to the amount of the capital to which it gives activity. The sum of the debt in circulation is continually at the command of any useful enterprise, the coin itself which circulates it, is never more than momentarily suspended from its ordinary functions. It experiences an incessant and rapid flux and reflux to and from the channel of industry to those of speculations in the funds.

There are strong circumstances in confirmation of this theory. The force of monied capital which has been displayed in Great Britain, and the height to which every species of industry has grown up under it, defy a solution from the quantity of coin which that kingdom has ever possessed. Accordingly it has been, coeval with its funding system, the prevailing opinion of the men of business, and of the generality of the most sagacious theorists of that country, that the operation of the public funds as capital has contributed to the effect in question.—Among ourselves appearances thus far favor the same conclusion. Industry in general seems to have been re-animated. There are symptoms indicating an extension of our commerce. Our navigation has certainly of late had a considerable spring, and there appears to be in many parts of the union a command of capital, which, till lately, since the revolution at least, was unknown. But it is at the same time to be acknowledged, that other circumstances have concurred (and in a great degree) in producing the present state of things, and that the appearances are not yet sufficiently decisive to be entirely relied upon.

In the question under discussion, it is important to distinguish between an absolute increase of capital, or an accession of real wealth and an artificial increase of capital, as an engine of business, or as an instrument of industry and commerce. In the first sense, a funded debt has no pretensions to being deemed an increase of capital; in the last, it has pretensions which are not easy to be controverted.—Of a similar nature is bank credit, and, in an inferior degree, every species of private credit.

But though a funded debt is not in the first instance, an absolute increase of capital, or an augmentation of real wealth; yet by serving as a new power in the operations of industry, it has, within certain bounds, a tendency to increase the real wealth of a community; in like manner as money borrowed by a thrifty farmer, to be laid out in the improvement of his farm, may, in the end, add to his stock of real riches.

There are respectable individuals, who, from a just aversion to an accumulation of public debt, are unwilling to concede to it any kind of utility, who can discern no good to alleviate the ill with which they suppose it pregnant; who cannot be persuaded, that it ought in any sense to be viewed as an increase of capital, lest it should be inferred, that the more debt be more capital, the greater the burdens the greater the blessings of the community.

But it interests the public councils to estimate every object as it truly is; to appreciate how far the good in any measure is compensated by the ill; or the ill by the good; either of them is seldom un-mixed.

Neither will it follow, that an accumulation of debt is desirable, because a certain degree of it operates as capital. There may be a plethora in the political, as in the natural body; there may be a state of things in which any such artificial capital is unnecessary. The debt too may be swelled to such a size, as that the greatest part of it may cease to be useful as a capital, serving only to pamper the dissipation of idle and dissolute individuals: as that the sums required to pay the interest upon it may become oppressive, and beyond the means which a government can employ, consistently with its tranquillity, to raise them; as that the resources of taxation, to face the debt, may have been strained too far to admit of extensions adequate to exigencies, which regard the public safety.

Where this critical point is, cannot be pronounced; but it is impossible to believe, that there is not such a point.

And as the vicissitudes of nations beget a perpetual tendency to the accumulation of debt, there ought to be in every government, a perpetual, anxious, and unceasing effort to reduce that which at any time exists, as fast as shall be practicable, consistently with integrity and good faith.

Reasonings on a subject comprehending ideas so abstract and complex, so little reducible to precise calculation as those which enter into the question just discussed, are always attended with a danger of running into fallacies. Due allowance ought therefore to be made for this possibility—but as far as the nature of the subject admits of it, there appears to be satisfactory ground for a belief that the public funds operate as a resource of capital to the govern-of the United States, and, if they are a resource at all, it is an extensive one.

To all the arguments which are brought to evince the impracticability of success in manufacturing establishments in the United States, it might have been a sufficient answer to have referred to the experience of what has been already done: it is certain that several important branches have grown up and flourished with a rapidity which surprises; affording an encouraging assurance of success in future attempts; of these it may not be improper to enumerate the most considerable—

I. Of skins.—Tanned and tawed leather, dressed skins, shoes, boots and slippers, harness and saddlery of all kinds, portmanteaus and trunks, leather breeches, gloves, muffs and tippets, parchment and glue.

II. Of iron.—Bar and sheet iron, steel, nail rods and nails, implements of husbandry, stoves, pots and other household utensils, the steel and iron work of carriages, and for ship building, anchors, scale beams, and weights, and various tools of artificers, arms of different kinds, though the manufacture of these last has of late diminished for want of demand.

III. Of wood.—Sups, cabinet wares and turnery, wool and cotton cards, and other machinery for manufactures and husbandry, mathematical instruments, coopers wares of every kind.

IV. Of flax and hemp.—Cables, sail-cloth, cordage, twine and packthread.

V. Bricks and coarse tiles, and potters' wares.

VI. Ardent spirits, and malt liquors.

VII. Writing and printing paper, sheathing and wrapping paper, pasteboards, fullers' or press papers, paper hangings.

VIII. Hats of fur and wool, and of mixtures of both. Women's stuff and silk shoes.

IX. Refined sugars.

X. Oils of animals and seeds, soap, spermaceti and tallow candles.

XI. Copper and brass wares, particularly utensils for distillers, sugar-refiners and brewers, andirons and other articles for household use—philosophical apparatus.

XII. Tin wares, for most purposes of ordinary use.

XIII. Carriages of all kinds.

XIV. Snuff, chewing and smoking tobacco.

XV. Starch and hair powder.

XVI. Lambskack and other painters' colours.

XVII. Gunpowder.

Besides manufactories of these articles, which are carried on as regular trades, and have attained to a considerable degree of maturity, there is a vast scene of household manufacturing, which contributes more largely to the supply of the community, than could be imagined, without having made it an object of particular enquiry. This observation is the pleasing result of the investigation to which the subject of this report has been, and is applicable as well to the southern, as to the middle and northern states; great quantities of coarse cloths, coatings, serges, and flannels, husey warseys, hosiery of wool, cotton and thread, coarse rustans, jeans and muslins, checked and striped cotton and linen goods, bed-ticks, coverlets and counterpanes, tow lincens, coarse shirtings, sheetings, toweling and table lincen, and various mixtures of wool and cotton, and of cotton and flax, are made in the household way, and in many instances to an extent not only sufficient for the supply of the families in which they are made, but for sale, and even in some cases, for exportation. It is computed in a number of districts that two-thirds, or three-fourths, and even four-fifths of all the cloathing of the inhabitants, are made by themselves. The importance of so great a progress, as appears to have been made in family manufactures, within a few years, both in a moral and political view, renders the fact highly interesting.

Neither does the above enumeration comprehend all the articles that are manufactured as regular trades. Many others occur, which are equally well established, but which not being of equal importance have been omitted. And there are many attempts still in their infancy, which, though attended with very favorable appearances, could not have been properly comprised in an enumeration of manufactories already established. There are other articles also of great importance, which, though strictly speaking, manufactures, are omitted, as being immediately connected with husbandry: such are flour, pot and pearl ash, pitch, tar, turpentine, and the like.

There remains to be noticed, an objection to the encouragement of manufactures, of a nature different from those which question the probability of success—this is derived from its supposed tendency to give a monopoly of advantages to particular classes, at the expense of the rest of the community, who, it is affirmed, would be able to procure the requisite supplies of manufactured articles, on better terms from foreigners, than from our own citizens, and who, it is alleged, are reduced to a necessity of paying an enhanced price for whatever they want, by every measure, which obstructs the free competition of foreign commodities.

It is an unreasonable supposition, that measures which serve to abridge the free competition of foreign articles, have a tendency to occasion an enhancement of prices, and it is not denied, that such is the effect of a number of cases: but the fact does not uniformly correspond with the theory. A reduction of prices has, in several instances, immediately succeeded the establishment of a domestic manufacture. Whether it be that foreign manufacturers endeavor to supplant by underselling our own, or whatever else be the cause, the effect has been such as is stated, and the reverse of what might have been expected.

But though it were true, that the immediate and certain effect of regulations controuling the competition of foreign with domestic fabrics, was an increase of price, it is universally true, that the contrary is the ultimate effect with every successful manufacture. When a domestic manufacture has attained to perfection, and has engaged in the prosecution of it a competent number of persons, it invariably becomes cheaper. Being free from the heavy charges which attend the importation of foreign commodities, it can be afforded, and accordingly seldom or never fails to be sold cheaper, in process of time, than was the foreign article for which it is a substitute. The internal competition, which takes place, soon does away every thing like monopoly, and by degrees reduces the price of the article to the minimum of a reasonable profit on the capital employed. This accords with the reason of the thing and with experience.

Whence it follows, that it is the interest of the community, with a view to eventual and permanent economy, to encourage the growth of manufactures, in a national view, a temporary enhancement of price must always be well compensated by a permanent reduction of it.

It is a reflection, which may with propriety be indulged here, that this eventual diminution of the prices of manufactured articles, which is the result of internal manufacturing establishments, has a direct and very important tendency to benefit agriculture. It enables the farmer to procure, with a smaller quantity of his labor, the manufactured produce of which he stands in need, and consequently increases the value of his income and property.

The objections which are commonly made to the expediency of encouraging, and to the probability of succeeding in manufacturing pursuits, in the United States, having now been discussed, the considerations, which have appeared in the course of the discussion, recommending that species of industry, to the patronage of the government, will be materially strengthened by a few general and some particular topics, which have been naturally reserved for subsequent notice.

I. There seems to be a moral certainty that the trade of a country, which is both manufacturing and agricultural, will be more lucrative and prosperous, than that of a country which is merely agricultural.

One reason for this is found in that general effort of nations (which has been already mentioned) to procure from their own soils, the articles of prime necessity requisite to their own consumption and use; and which serves to render their demand for a foreign supply of such articles in a great degree occasional and contingent. Hence, while the necessities of nations exclusively devoted to agriculture, for the fabrics of manufacturing states, are constant and regular, the wants of the latter for the products of the former, are liable to very considerable fluctuations and interruptions. The great inequalities, resulting from difference of seasons, have been elsewhere remarked: this uniformity of demand, on one side, and unsteadiness of it on the other, must necessarily have a tendency to cause the general course of the exchange of commodities between the parties, to turn to the disadvantage of the merely agricultural states. Peculiarity of situation, a climate and soil adapted to the production of peculiar commodities, may, sometimes, contradict the rule; but there is every reason to believe that it will be found, in the main, a just one.

Another circumstance, which gives a superiority of commercial advantages to states that manufacture, as well as cultivate, consists in the more numerous attractions, which a more diversified market offers to foreign customers, and in the greater scope which it affords to mercantile enterprise. It is a position of indisputable truth in commerce, depending, too, on very obvious reasons, that the greatest resort will ever be to those marts, where commodities, while equally abundant, are more various. Each difference of kind, holds out an additional inducement: and it is a position not less clear, that the field of enterprise must be enlarged to the merchants of a country, in proportion to the variety, as well as the abundance of the commodities which they find at home for exportation to foreign markets.

A third circumstance, perhaps not inferior to either of the other two, conferring the superiority which has been stated, has relation to the stagnations of demand for certain commodities which, at some time or other, interferes more or less with the sale of all. The nation which can bring to market but few articles, is likely to be more quickly and sensibly affected by such stagnations, than one which is always possessed of a great variety of commodities: the former frequently finds too great a portion of its stock of materials, for sale or exchange, lying on hand—or is obliged to make injurious sacrifices to supply its wants of foreign articles, which are numerous and urgent, in proportion to the smallness of the number of its own.—The latter commonly finds itself indemnified, by the high prices of some articles, for the low prices of others—and the prompt and advantageous sale of those articles which are in demand, enables its merchants the better to wait for a favorable change, in respect to those which are not. There is ground to believe, that a difference of situation, in this particular, has immensely different effects upon the wealth and prosperity of nations.

From these circumstances collectively, two important inferences are to be drawn; one, that there is always a higher probability of a favorable balance of trade, in regard to countries, in which manufactures, founded on the basis of a thriving agriculture, flourish, than in regard to those, which are confined wholly, or almost wholly, to agriculture; the other, (which is also a consequence of the first) that countries of the former description are likely to possess more pecuniary wealth, or money, than those of the latter.

Facts appear to correspond with this conclusion: The importation of manufactured supplies, seem invariably to drain the merely agricultural people of their wealth. Let the situation of the manufacturing countries of Europe, be compared in this particular, with that of countries which only cultivate, and the disparity will be striking. Other causes, it is true, help to account for this disparity between some of them; and among these causes, the relative state of agriculture; but between others of them, the most prominent circumstance of dissimilitude arises from the comparative state of manufactures. In corroboration of the same idea, it ought not to escape remark, that the West India islands, the soils of which are the most fertile, and the nation, which in the greatest degree supplies the rest of the world, with the precious metals, exchange to a loss with almost every other country.

As far as experience at home may guide, it will lead to the same conclusion. Previous to the revolution, the quantity of coin, possessed by the colonies, which now compose the United States, appeared to be inadequate to their circulation; and their debt to Great Britain was progressive. Since the revolution, the states, in which manufactures have most increased, have recovered fastest from the injuries of the late war, and abound most in pecuniary resources.

It ought to be admitted, however, in this as in the preceding case, that causes, irrelative to the state of manufactures, account, in a degree, for the phenomenon remarked. The continual progress of new settlements, has a natural tendency to occasion an unfavorable balance of trade; though it indemnifies for the inconvenience, by that increase of the national capital, which flows from the conversion of waste into improved lands: and the different degrees of external commerce, which are carried on by the different states, may make material differences in the comparative state of their wealth. The first circumstance has reference to the deficiency of coin and the increase of debt previous to the revolution: the last to the advantages which the most manufacturing states appear to have enjoyed, over the others since the termination of the late war.

But the uniform appearance of an abundance of specie, as the concomitant of a flourishing state of manufactures, and of the reverse, where they do not prevail, afford a strong presumption of their favorable operation upon the wealth of a country.

Not only the wealth, but the independence and security of a country, appear to be materially connected with the prosperity of manufactures. Every nation, with a view to those great objects, ought to endeavor to possess within itself all the essentials of national supply. These comprise the means of subsistence, habitation, clothing and defence.

The possession of these is necessary to the perfection of the body politic, to the safety as well as the welfare of the society: the want of either, is the want of an important organ of political life and motion; and in the various crisis which await a state, it must severely feel the effects of such deficiency. The extreme embarrassments of the United States, during the late war, from an incapacity of supplying themselves, are still matter of keen recollection: a future war might be expected again to exemplify the mischiefs and dangers of a situation, to which that incapacity is still in too great a degree applicable, unless changed by timely and vigorous exertions. To effect this change, as fast as shall be prudent, merits all the attention, and all the zeal of our public counsels; 'tis the next great work to be accomplished.

The want of a navy to protect our external commerce, as long as it shall continue, must render it a peculiarly precarious reliance, for the supply of essential articles, and must serve to strengthen prodigiously the arguments in favor of manufactures.

To these general considerations are added some of a more particular nature.

Our distance from Europe, the great fountain of manufactured supply, subjects us, in the existing state of things, to inconvenience and loss in two ways.

The bulkiness of those commodities which are the chief productions of the soil, necessarily imposes very heavy charges on their transportation, to distant markets. These charges, in the cases, in which the nations, to whom our products are sent, maintain a competition in the supply of their own markets, principally fall upon us, and form material deductions from the primitive value of the articles furnished. The charges on manufactured supplies, brought from Europe, are greatly enhanced by the same circumstance of distance. These charges, again, in the cases in which our own industry maintains no competition, in our own markets, also principally fall upon us; and are an additional cause of extraordinary deduction from the primitive value of our own products; these being the materials of exchange for the foreign fabrics, which we consume.

The equality and moderation of individual property, and the growing settlements of new districts, occasion, in this country, an unusual demand for coarse manufactures; the charges of which being greater in proportion to their greater bulk, augment the disadvantage, which has been just described.

As in most countries domestic supplies maintain a very considerable competition with such foreign productions of the soil, as are imported for sale; if the extensive establishment of manufactories in the U. States does not create a similar competition in respect to manufactured articles, it appears to be clearly deducible, from the considerations which have been mentioned, that they must sustain a double loss in their exchanges with foreign nations; strongly conducive to an unfavorable balance of trade, and very prejudicial to their interests.

These disadvantages press with no small weight, on the landed interest of the country. In seasons of peace, they cause a serious deduction from the intrinsic value of the products of the soil. In time of a war, which should either involve ourselves, or another nation, possessing a considerable share of our carrying trade, the charges on the transportation of our commodities, bulky as most of them are, could hardly fail to prove a grievous burden to the farmer, while obliged to depend in so great degree as he now does, upon foreign markets for the seat for the surplus of his labor.

As far as the prosperity of the fisheries of the United States is impeded by the want of an adequate market, there arises another special reason for desiring the extension of manufactures. Besides the fish, which, in many places, would be likely to make a part of the subsistence of the persons employed; it is known, that the oils, bones, and skins of marine animals, are of extensive use in various manufactures. Hence the prospect of an additional demand for the produce of the fisheries.

One more point of view only remains, in which to consider the expediency of encouraging manufactures in the United States.

It is not uncommon to meet with an opinion, that though the promoting of manufactures, may be the interest of a part of the union, it is contrary to that of another part. The northern and southern regions are sometimes represented as having adverse interests in this respect. Those are called manufacturing, these agricultural states; and a species of opposition is imagined to subsist between the manufacturing and agricultural interest.

This idea of an opposition between those two interests is the common error of the early periods of every country; but experience gradually dissipates it. Indeed they are perceived so often to succor and to benefit each other, that they come at length to be considered as one; a supposition which has been frequently abused, and is not universally true. Particular encouragements of particular manufactures may be of a nature to sacrifice the interests of landholders to those of manufacturers; but it is nevertheless a maxim well established by experience, and generally acknowledged where there has been sufficient experience, that the "aggregate" prosperity of manufactures, and the "aggregate" prosperity of agriculture are intimately connected. In the course of the discussion which has had place, various weighty considerations have been adduced operating in support of that maxim. Perhaps the superior steadiness of the demand of a domestic market for the surplus produce of the soil, is alone a convincing argument of its truth.

Ideas of a contrariety of interests between the northern and southern regions of the union, are in the main unfounded as they are mischievous. The diversity of circumstances, on which such contrariety is usually predicated, authorises a directly contrary conclusion. Mutual wants constitute one of the strongest links of political connexion: and the extent of these bears a natural proportion to the diversity in the means of mutual supply.

Suggestions of an opposite complexion, are ever to be deplored, as unfriendly to the steady pursuit of one great common cause, and to the perfect harmony of all the parts.

In proportion as the mind is accustomed to trace the intimate connexion of interest, which subsists between all the parts of a society, united under the same government—the infinite variety of channels which serve to circulate the prosperity of each to and through the rest—in that proportion it will be little apt to be disturbed by solitudes and apprehensions, which originate in local discriminations.—

Having frequently experienced the trouble of many references, (in periodical publications in general) to find the whole of a subject too long for insertion in one number and continued through several, the editor has adopted a plan to lessen the evil, by commencing such matter at the close of one number, to be resumed at the beginning of the next, and thereby diminishes the number of breaks in a volume.

This change in the order of the matter, has produced no change in the matter itself; as may be seen by referring to the preceding pages.

It is a truth as important as it is agreeable, and one to which it is not easy to imagine exceptions, that every thing tending to establish substantial and permanent order, in the affairs of a country, to increase the total mass of industry and opulence, is ultimately beneficial to every part of it. On the credit of this great truth, an acquiescence may safely be accorded, from every quarter, to all institutions, and arrangements, which promise a confirmation of public order, and an augmentation of national resources.

But there are more particular considerations which serve to fortify the idea, that the encouragement of manufactures is the interest of all parts of the union. If the northern and middle states should be the principal scenes of such establishments, they would immediately benefit the more southern, by creating a demand for productions, some of which they have in common with the other states, and others of which are either peculiar to them, or more abundant, or of better quality, than elsewhere.—These productions, principally, are timber, flax, hemp, cotton, wool, raw silk, indigo, iron, lead, furs, hides, skins, and coals: of these articles, cotton and indigo are peculiar to the southern states; as are, hitherto, lead and coal; flax and hemp are, or may be raised in greater abundance there, than in the more northern states; and the wool of Virginia is said to be of a better quality than that of any other state: a circumstance rendered the more probable by the reflection, that Virginia embraces the same latitudes with the finest wool countries in Europe. The climate of the south is also better adapted to the production of silk.

The extensive cultivation of cotton, can, perhaps, hardly be expected, but from the previous establishment of domestic manufactories of the article; and the surest encouragement and vent for the others, would result from similar establishments in respect to them.

If, then, it satisfactorily appears, that it is the interest of the United States, generally, to encourage manufactures, it merits particular attention, that there are circumstances which renders the present a critical moment for entering with zeal upon the important business. The effort cannot fail to be materially seconded by a considerable and increasing influx of money, in consequence of foreign speculations in the funds, and by the disorders which exist in different parts of Europe.

The first circumstance not only facilitates the execution of manufacturing enterprises: but it indicates them as a necessary means to turn the thing itself to advantage, and to prevent its being eventually an evil. If useful employments be not found for the money of foreigners, brought to the country to be invested in purchases of the public debt, it will quickly be re-exported to defray the expense of an extraordinary consumption of foreign luxuries; and distressing drains of our specie, may hereafter be experienced, to pay the interest and redeem the principal of the purchased debt.

This useful employment, too, ought to be of a nature to produce solid and permanent improvements. If the money merely serves to give a temporary spring to foreign commerce—as it cannot procure new and lasting outlets for the products of the country—there will be no real or durable advantage gained. As far as it shall find its way in agricultural ameliorations, in opening canals, and in similar improvements, it will be productive of substantial utility. But there is reason to doubt, whether in such channels it is likely to find sufficient employment, and still more, whether those who possess it, would be as readily attracted to objects of this nature, as to manufacturing pursuits; which bear greater analogy to those to which they are accustomed, and to the spirit generated by them.

To open the one field, as well as the other, will at least secure a better prospect of useful employment, for whatever accession of money there has been or may be.

There is, at the present juncture, a certain fermentation of mind, a certain activity of speculation and enterprise, which, if properly directed, may be made subservient to useful purposes; but which, if left entirely to itself, may be attended with pernicious effects.

The disturbed state of Europe, inclining its citizens to emigration, the requisite workmen will be more easily acquired, than at another time; and the effect of multiplying the opportunities of employment to those who emigrate, may be an increase of the number and extent of valuable acquisitions to the population, arts, and industry of the country.

To find pleasure in the calamities of other nations, would be criminal: but to benefit ourselves, by opening an asylum to those who suffer, in consequence of them, is as justifiable as it is politic.

A full view having now been taken of the inducements to the promotion of manufactures in the U. States, accompanied with an examination of the principal objections which are commonly urged in opposition, it is proper, in the next place, to consider the means by which it may be effected, as introductory to a specification of the objects, which, in the present state of things, appear the most fit to be encouraged, and of the particular measures which it may be advisable to adopt, in respect to each.

In order to a better judgment of the means proper to be resorted to by the United States, it will be of use to advert to those which have been employed with success in other countries. The principal of these are—

I. Protecting duties—or duties on those foreign articles which are the rivals of the domestic ones intended to be encouraged.

Duties of this nature evidently amount to a virtual bounty on the domestic fabrics, since, by equalizing the charges on foreign articles, they enable the national manufacturers to prevail against their foreign competitors. The propriety of this species of encouragement, need not to be dwelt upon; as it is not only a clear result from the numerous topics which have been suggested, but is sanctioned by the laws of the United States, in a variety of instances: it has the additional recommendation of being a resource of revenue. Indeed, all the duties imposed on imported articles, though with an exclusive view to revenue, have the effect in contemplation, and, except where they fall on raw materials, wear a beneficent aspect towards the manufactures of the country.

II. Prohibitions of rival articles, or duties equivalent to prohibitions.

This is another, and an efficacious mean of encouraging national manufactures: but in general it is only fit to be employed when a manufacture has made such a progress, and is in so many hands, as to insure a due competition, and an adequate supply, on reasonable terms. Of duties equivalent to prohibitions, there are examples in the laws of the United States, and there are other cases, to which the principle may be advantageously extended: but they are not numerous.

Considering a monopoly of the domestic market to its own manufacturers, as the reigning policy of manufacturing nations, a similar policy, on the part of the United States, in every proper instance, is dictated, it might almost be said, by the principles of distributive justice: certainly by the duty of endeavoring to secure to its citizens, a reciprocity of advantages.

III. Prohibitions of the exportation of the materials of manufactures.

The desire of securing a cheap and plentiful supply for the national workmen, and, where the article is either peculiar to the country, or of peculiar quality there, the jealousy of enabling foreign workmen, to rival those of the nation, with its own materials, are the leading motives to this species of regulation. It ought not to be affirmed, that it is in no instance proper; but it is certainly one which ought to be adopted with great circumspection, and only in very plain cases. It is seen at once, that its immediate operation is to abridge the demand and keep down the price of the produce of some other branch of industry, generally speaking, of agriculture, to the prejudice of those who carry it on; and though, if it be really essential to the prosperity of any very important national manufacture, it may happen that those who are injured, in the first instance, may be eventually indemnified, by the superior steadiness of an extensive domestic market, depending on that prosperity; yet in a matter, in which there is so much room for nice and difficult combinations, in which such opposite considerations combat each other, prudence seems to dictate, that the expedient in question, ought to be indulged with a sparing hand.

IV. Pecuniary bounties.

This has been found one of the most efficacious means of encouraging manufactures, and it is, in some views, the best. Though it has not yet been practised upon by the government of the United States (unless the allowance of the exportation of dried and pickled fish and salted meat could be considered as a bounty) and though it is less favored by public opinion, than some other modes—its advantages are these—

1. It is a species of encouragement more positive and direct than any other, and for that very reason, has a more immediate tendency to stimulate and uphold new enterprizes, increasing the chances of profit, and diminishing the risques of loss, in the first attempts.

2. It avoids the inconvenience of a temporary augmentation of price, which is incident to some other modes, or it produces it to a less degree; either by making no addition to the charges on the rival foreign article, as in the case of protecting duties, or by making a smaller addition. The first happens when the fund for the bounty is derived from a different object, (which may, or may not, increase the price of some other article, according to the nature of that object); the second, when the fund is derived from the same or a similar object of foreign manufacture. One per cent. duty on the foreign article, converted into a bounty on the domestic, will have an equal effect with a duty of two per cent. exclusive of such bounty; and the price of the foreign commodity is liable to be raised, in the one case, in the proportion of one per cent. in the other, in that of two per cent. Indeed, the bounty, when drawn from another source, is calculated to promote a reduction of price; because, without laying any new charge on the foreign article, it serves to introduce a competition with it, and to increase the total quantity of the article in the market.

3. Bounties have not, like high protecting duties, a tendency to produce scarcity. An increase of price is not always the immediate, though, where the progress of a domestic manufacture does not counteract a rise, it is commonly the ultimate effect of an additional duty. In the interval, between the laying of the duty and a proportionable increase of price, it may discourage importation, by interfering with the profits to be expected from the sale of the article.

4. Bounties are sometimes not only the best, but the only proper expedient, for uniting the encouragement of a new object of agriculture with that of a new object of manufacture. It is the interest of the farmer to have the production of the raw material promoted, by counteracting the interference of the foreign material of the same kind. It is the interest of the manufacturer to have the material abundant and cheap. If, prior to the domestic production of the material, in sufficient quantity, to supply the manufacturer on good terms, a duty be laid upon the importation of it from abroad, with a view to promote the raising of it at home, the interest both of the farmer and manufacturer will be disserved. By either destroying the requisite supply, or raising the price of the article, beyond what cannot be afforded to be given for it, by the conductor of an infant manufacture, it is abandoned or fails; and there being no domestic manufactories to create a demand for the raw material, which is raised by the farmer, it is in vain, that the competition of the like foreign article, may have been destroyed.

It cannot escape notice, that a duty upon the importation of an article can no otherwise aid the domestic production of it, than by giving the latter greater advantages in the home market. It can have no influence upon the advantageous sale of the article produced, in foreign markets; no tendency, therefore, to promote its exportation.

The true way to conciliate these two interests, is to lay a duty on foreign manufactures of the material, the growth of which is desired to be encouraged, and to apply the produce of that duty by way of bounty, either upon the production of the material itself, or upon its manufacture at home, or upon both. In this disposition of the thing, the manufacturer commences his enterprise, under every advantage, which is attainable as to quantity or price of the raw material; and the farmer, if the bounty be immediately given, is enabled by it to enter into a successful competition with the foreign material; if the bounty be to the manufacturer on so much of the domestic material as he consumes, the operation is nearly the same; he has a motive of interest to prefer the domestic commodity, if of equal quality, even at a higher price than the foreign, so long as the difference of price is any thing short of the bounty, which is allowed upon the article.

Except the simple and ordinary kinds of household manufacture, or those for which there are very commanding local advantages, pecuniary bounties are in most cases indispensable to the introduction of a new branch. A stimulus and a support not less powerful and direct as, generally speaking, essential to the overcoming of the obstacles which arise from the competitions of superior skill and maturity elsewhere. Bounties are especially essential, in regard to articles, upon which those foreigners who have been accustomed to supply a country, are in the practice of granting them.

The continuance of bounties on manufactures long established, must almost always be of questionable policy: because a presumption would arise in every such case, that there were natural and inherent impediments to success. But in new undertakings, they are justifiable, as they are oftentimes necessary.

There is a degree of prejudice against bounties, from an appearance of giving away the public money, without an immediate consideration, and from a supposition, that they serve to enrich particular classes, at the expense of the community.

But neither of these sources of dislike will bear serious examination. There is no purpose to which public money can be more beneficially applied, than to the acquisition of a new and useful branch of industry; no considerations more valuable than a permanent addition to the general stock of productive labor.

As to the second source of objection, it equally lies against other modes of encouragement which are admitted to be eligible. As often as a duty upon a foreign article makes an addition to its price, it causes an extra expense to the community, for the benefit of the domestic manufacture. A bounty does no more. But it is the interest of the society, in each case, to submit to a temporary expense, which is more than compensated, by an increase of industry and wealth—by an augmentation of resources and independence—and by the circumstances of eventual cheapness, which has been noticed in another place.

It would deserve attention, however, in the employment of this species of encouragement in the United States, as a reason for moderating the degree of it in the instances in which it might be deemed eligible, that the great distance of this country from Europe imposes very heavy charges on all the fabrics which are brought from thence, amounting from 15 to 30 per cent. on their value, according to their bulk.

A question has been made, concerning the constitutional right of the government of the United States to apply this species of encouragement; but there is certainly no good foundation for such a question. The national legislature has express authority "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare," with no other qualifications than that "all duties, imposts and excises, shall be uniform throughout the U. States; that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to numbers ascertained by a census or enumeration taken on the principles prescribed in the constitution; and that no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state."

These three qualifications excepted, the power to raise money is plenary and indefinite; and the objects, to which it may be appropriated, are no less comprehensive than the payment of the public debts and the providing for the common defence and general welfare. The terms "general welfare" were doubtless intended to signify more than was expressed or imported in those which preceded; otherwise, numerous exigencies, incident to the affairs of a nation, would have been left without a provision. The phrase is as comprehensive as any that could have been used; because it was not fit that the constitutional authority of the union, to appropriate its revenues, should have been restricted within narrower limits than the "general welfare;" and because this necessarily embraces a vast variety of particulars which are susceptible neither of specification nor of enumeration.

It is therefore of necessity left to the discretion of the national legal cure, to pronounce, upon the objects, which concern the general welfare, and for which, under that description, an appropriation of money is requisite and proper. And there seems to be no room for a doubt, that whatever concerns the general interests of learning, of agriculture, of manufactures, and of commerce, are within the sphere of the national councils, as far as regards an application of money.

The only qualification of the generality of the phrase in question, which seems to be admissible, is this,—that the object, to which an appropriation of money is to be made, be general and not local; its operation, extending in fact, or by possibility, throughout the union, and not being confined to a particular spot.

No objection ought to arise to this construction, from a supposition that it would imply a power to do whatever else should appear to congress conducive to the general welfare. A power to appropriate money, with this latitude, which is granted to in express terms, would not carry a power to do any other thing, not authorised in the constitution, either expressly or by fair implication.

V. Premiums.

These are of a nature allied to bounties, though distinguishable from them in some important features.

Bounties are applicable to the whole quantity of an article produced or manufactured, or exported, and involve a correspondent expense; premiums serve to reward some particular excellence or superiority, some extraordinary exertion or skill, and are dispensed only in a small number of cases. But their effect is to stimulate general effort: contrived so as to be both honorary and lucrative, they address themselves to different passions; touching the chords as well of emulation as of interest. They are accordingly a very economical mean of exciting the enterprise of a whole community.

There are various societies in different countries, whose object is the dispensation of premiums for the encouragement of agriculture, arts, manufactures, and commerce: and though they are, for the most part, voluntary associations, with comparatively slender funds, their utility has been immense. Much has been done by this mean in Great Britain; Scotland, in particular, owes materially to it a prodigious amelioration of condition. From a similar establishment in the United States, supplied and supported by the government of the union, vast benefits might reasonably be expected. Some further ideas on this head, shall accordingly be submitted in the conclusion of this report.

VI. The exemption of the materials of manufactures from duty.

The policy of that exemption, as a general rule, particularly in reference to new establishments, is obvious. It can hardly ever be advisable to add the obstructions of fiscal burdens to the difficulties which naturally embarrass a new manufacture; and where it is matured and in condition to become an object of revenue, it is, generally speaking, better that the fabric, than the material, should be the subject of taxation. Ideas of proportion between the quantum of the tax and the value of the article can be more easily adjusted in the former than in the latter case. An argument for exemptions of this kind in the United States, is to be derived from the practice, as far as their necessities have permitted, of those nations whom we are to meet as competitors in our own and in foreign markets.

There are, however, exceptions to it; of which some examples will be given under the next head.

The laws of the union afford instances of the observance of the policy here recommended; but it will probably be found advisable to extend it to some other cases. Of a nature, bearing some affinity to that policy, is the regulation which exempts from duty the tools and implements, as well as the books, clothes, and household furniture of foreign artists, who come to reside in the United States; an advantage already secured to them by the laws of the union, and which, it is in every view, proper to continue.

VII. Drawbacks of the duties which are imposed on the materials of manufactures.

It has already been observed, as a general rule, that duties on those materials ought, with certain exceptions, to be forborne. Of these exceptions, three cases occur, which may serve as examples—one, where the material is itself an object of general or extensive consumption, and a fit and productive source of revenue; another, where a manufacture of a simpler kind, the competition of which with a like domestic article is desired to be restrained, partakes of the nature of a raw material, from being capable by a farther process, to be converted into a manufacture of a different kind, the introduction or growth of which is desired to be encouraged; a third, where the material itself is a production of the country, and in sufficient abundance to furnish a cheap and plentiful supply to the national manufacturers.

Under the first description comes the article of molasses. It is not only a fair object of revenue, but being a sweet, it is just that the consumers of it should pay a duty as well as the consumers of sugar.

Cottons and linen in their white state fall under the second description—a duty upon such as are imported is proper to promote the domestic manufacture of similar articles in the same state—a drawback of that duty is proper to encourage the printing and staining at home of those which are brought from abroad. When the first of these manufactures has attained sufficient maturity in a country, to furnish a full supply for the second, the utility of the drawback ceases.

The article of hemp either now does or may be expected soon to exemplify the third case, in the United States.

Where duties on the materials of manufactures are not laid for the purpose of preventing a competition with some domestic production, the same reasons which recommend, as a general rule, the exemption of those materials from duties, would recommend, as a like general rule, the allowance of drawbacks in favor of the manufacturer; accordingly, such drawbacks are familiar in countries which systematically pursue the business of manufactures; which furnishes an argument of the observance of a similar policy in the United States; and the idea has been adopted by the laws of the union, in the instances of salt and molasses. It is believed that it will be found advantageous to extend it to some other articles.

VIII. The encouragement of new inventions and discoveries, at home, and of the introduction into the United States of such as may have been made in other countries; particularly those which relate to machinery.

This is among the most useful and unexceptionable of the aids which can be given to manufactures. The usual means of that encouragement are pecuniary rewards, and, for a time, exclusive privileges.—The first must be employed, according to the occasion, and the utility of the invention or discovery.—For the last, so far as respects “authors and inventors,” provision has been made by law. But it is desirable, in regard to improvements and secrets of extraordinary value, to be able to extend the same benefit to introducers, as well as authors and inventors; a policy which has been practised with advantage in other countries. Here, however, as in some other cases, there is cause to regret, that the competency of the authority of the national government to the good, which might be done, is not without a question. Many aids might be given to industry—many internal improvements of primary magnitude might be promoted, by an authority operating throughout the union, which cannot be effected, as well, if at all, by an authority confined within the limits of a single state.

But if the legislature of the union cannot do all the good that might be wished, it is at least desirable, that all may be done which is practicable.—Means for promoting the introduction of foreign improvements, though less efficaciously than might be accomplished with more adequate authority, will form a part of the plan intended to be submitted in the close of this report.

It is customary with manufacturing nations to prohibit, under severe penalties, the exportation of implements and machines, which they have either invented or improved. There are already objects for a similar regulation in the United States; and others may be expected to occur from time to time. The adoption of it seems to be dictated by the principle of reciprocity. Greater liberality, in such respects, might better comport with the general spirit of the country; but a selfish and exclusive policy in other quarters will not always permit the free indulgence of a spirit, which would place us upon an unequal footing. As far as prohibitions tend to prevent foreign competitors from deriving the benefit of the improvements made at home, they tend to increase the advantages of those by whom they may have been introduced; and operate as an encouragement to exertion.

IX. Judicious regulations for the inspection of manufactured commodities.

This is not among the least important of the means, by which the prosperity of manufactures may be promoted. It is indeed in many cases one of the most essential. Contributing to prevent frauds upon consumers at home, and exporters to foreign countries—to improve the quality and preserve the character of the national manufactures, it cannot fail to aid the expeditious and advantageous sale of them, and to serve as a guard against successful competition from other quarters. The reputation of the flour and lumber of some states, and of the potash of others, has been established by an attention to this point.—And the like good name might be procured for those articles, wheresoever produced, by a judicious and uniform system of inspection, throughout the ports of the United States. A like system might also be extended with advantage to other commodities.

X. The facilitating of pecuniary remittances from place to place—

Is a point of considerable moment to trade in general, and to manufactures in particular; by rendering more easy the purchase of raw materials and provisions, and the payment for manufactured supplies. A general circulation of bank paper, which is to be expected from the institution lately established, will be a most valuable mean to this end.—But much good would also accrue from some additional provisions respecting inland bills of exchange. If those drawn in one state payable in another, were made negotiable, every where, and interest and damages allowed in case of protest, it would greatly promote negotiations between the citizens of different states, by rendering them more secure; and, with it, the convenience and advantage of the merchants and manufacturers of each.

XI. The facilitating of the transportation of commodities.

Improvements favoring this object intimately concern all the domestic interests of a community; but they may without impropriety be mentioned as having an important relation to manufactures. There is perhaps scarcely any thing, which has been better calculated to assist the manufactures of Great Britain, than the amelioration of the public roads of that kingdom, and the great progress which has been of late made in opening canals. Of the former, the United States stand much in need; for the latter they present uncommon facilities.

The symptoms of attention to the improvement of inland navigation, which have lately appeared in some quarters, must fill with pleasure every breast warmed with a true zeal for the prosperity of the country. These examples, it is to be hoped, will stimulate the exertions of the government and citizens of every state. There can certainly be no object more worthy of the cares of the local administrations; and it were to be wished, that there was no doubt of the power of the national government to lend its direct aid on a comprehensive plan. This is one of those improvements, which could be prosecuted with more efficacy by the whole, than by any part or parts of the union. There are cases in which the general interest will be in danger to be sacrificed to the collision of some supposed local interests. Jealousies, in matters of this kind, are as apt to exist, as they are apt to be erroneous.

The following remarks are sufficiently judicious and pertinent to deserve a literal quotation: "good roads, canals, and navigable rivers, by diminishing the expense of carriage, put the remote parts of a country more nearly upon a level with those in the neighborhood of the town. They are, upon that account, the greatest of all improvements. They encourage the cultivation of the remote, which must always be the most extensive circle of the country. They are advantageous to the town, by breaking down the monopoly of the country in its neighborhood. They are advantageous even to that part of the country. Though they introduce some rival commodities into the old market, they open many new markets to its produce. Monopoly, besides, is a great enemy to good management, which can never be universally established, but in consequence of that free and universal competition, which forces every body to have recourse to it, for the sake of self-defence. It is not more than fifty years ago that some of the counties in the neighborhood of London petitioned the parliament, against the extension of the turnpike roads, into the remoter counties. These remoter counties, they pretended, from the cheapness of labor, would be able to sell their grass and corn cheaper in the London market, than themselves, and they would thereby reduce their rents and ruin their cultivation. Their rents, however, have risen, and their cultivation has been improved, since that time."

Specimens of a spirit, similar to that which govern the counties, here spoken of, present themselves too frequently to the eye of an impartial observer, and render it a wish of patriotism, that the body in this country, in whose councils a local or partial spirit is least likely to predominate, were at liberty to pursue and promote the general interest, in those instances, in which there might be danger of the interference of such a spirit.

The foregoing are the principal of the means, by which the growth of manufactures is ordinarily promoted. It is, however, not merely necessary, that the measures of government, which have a direct view to manufactures, should be calculated to assist and protect them; but that those, which only collaterally affect them in the general course of the administration, should be guarded from any peculiar tendency to injure them.

There are certain species of taxes, which are apt to be oppressive to different parts of the community; and, among other ill effects, have a very unfriendly aspect towards manufactures. All poll or capitation taxes are of this nature. They either proceed according to a fixed rate which operates unequally, and injuriously to the industrious poor; or they vest a discretion in certain officers, to make estimates and assessments, which are necessarily vague, and conjectural, and liable to abuse. They ought, therefore, to be abstained from, in all but cases of distressing emergency.

All such taxes (including all taxes on occupations) which proceed according to the amount of capital supposed to be employed in a business, or of profits supposed to be made in it, are unavoidably hurtful to industry. It is in vain that the evil may be endeavoured to be mitigated by leaving it, in the first instance, in the option of the party to be taxed, to declare the amount of his capital or profits.

Men engaged in any trade or business have commonly weighty reasons to avoid disclosures, which would expose, with any thing like accuracy, the real state of their affairs. They most frequently find it better to risk oppression, than to avail themselves of so inconvenient a refuge. And the consequence is, that they often suffer oppression.

When the disclosure, too, if made, is not definitive, but controllable by the discretion, or, in other words, by the passions and prejudices of the revenue officers, it is not only an ineffectual protection, but the possibility of its being so, is an additional reason for not resorting to it.

Allowing to the public officers the most equitable dispositions—yet where they are to exercise a discretion without certain data, they cannot fail to be often misled by appearances. The quantity of business which seems to be going on, is, in a vast number of cases, a very deceitful criterion of the profits which are made; yet it is, perhaps, the best they can have, and it is the one on which they will most naturally rely. A business, therefore, which may rather require aid, from the government, than be in a capacity to be contributory to it, may find itself crushed by the mistaken conjectures, of the assessors of taxes.

Arbitrary taxes, under which denomination are comprised all those, that leave the quantum of the tax to be raised on each person, to the discretion of certain officers, are as contrary to the genius of liberty as to the maxims of industry. In this light they have been viewed by the most judicious observers on government, who have bestowed upon them the severest epithets of reprobation; as constituting one of the worst features usually to be met with in the practice of despotic governments.

Progress of the enemy.

We insert the following "project for the restoration of peace to New-England," to shew honest men the progress of the enemy, and to perpetuate to infamy the faction that subserves his iniquitous purposes. I call it a faction, aye, a base and profligate faction, that every reflecting American, whether he be a "republican" or a "federalist" must reprobate and despise.

But such are the doctrines of a very extensive "knot of knaves," who have their confidential friends and fellow laborers scattered through the United States. Of themselves, they are contemptible; but, through the blind adherence of many to perjury, of some consideration in the republic; pretending to humanism, to a love of peace, to REPUBLICANISM!—and more than all, of a reverence for the practice and precepts of WASHINGTON!!!—a name of such talismanic virtue, as, in the eyes of some, to purge of his crime the basest wretch that calls upon it; through the attributes that belong to it are as different from the qualities of his affected follower, as the ministrations of an angel to the machinations of a devil.

WASHINGTON told us to "FROWN INDIGNANTLY ON THE FIRST DAWNING OF EVERY ATTEMPT TO ALIENATE ANY PORTION OF THE COUNTRY FROM THE REST, OR TO EXFEEBLE THE SACRED TIES THAT NOW LINK ITS VARIOUS PARTS." I shall obey this injunction, let he be offended that will. I would purchase no man's patronage by an apparent insensibility to this most vile proposition. There is danger in becoming familiar with such things—no man grows instantly vile; and he who terminates a horrid life on the gallows unrepented of the past, and careless of the future, might have been saved, if he had been checked on his first step from virtue. It is criminal to look at those proceedings with indifference, or smile at them as the ravings of infuriated men—we should "frown" upon them,—particularly at their "rises new wars;" nipping in its bud, the terrible mischief that must follow the treason, if suffered to come to maturity. It is no question between the "republican" and the "federalist;" but a plain case at issue between the American and his enemy—a desperate foreign faction, led on by an ambition, that would

"Rather reign in hell than serve in heaven."

I have no fear of what this faction may do, further than demoralize the people, and gradually undermine their veneration for the constitution; though I know very well that Great Britain has counted much on "her party" in the United States. For, in the present state of things, the bravey arm of the farmer, mechanic and manufacturer is every where ready to seize the traitor by the throat, and make his soul shrink into the darkness that belongs to the infernal passions that influence him. Yet I think it right to hold up their movements to execration; for

"Vice is a monster of such hideous mien,
That to be hard needs but to be seen."

Let every American read the proposition; and if he yet doubts what he should do, let him turn to and carefully peruse the last legacy of Washington, being his farewell address to the people of the United States, and he will not fail to reprobate it as it deserves—and "frown" into annihilation the troubled spirit that devised, or aided and assisted in offering it to public consideration.

We should despise ourselves for proposing a remark, by way of argument, on the doctrines advanced by the factionist. Every position is false; and their impudence is equalled only by the total disregard of truth in the writer and publisher. But it shews the verity of the matters that John Henry disclosed, and the following extract from one of his letters to governor Craig [of Canada] is so exactly in point, that, while we refer to the whole correspondence [see WEEKLY REGISTER, vol. II, page 18,] we cannot refuse to reinsert it here: It is dated at Boston, March 7, 1809—

"I have now ascertained with as much accuracy as possible, the course intended to be pursued by the party in Massachusetts that is opposed to the measures and politics of the general government. I have already given a decided opinion that a declaration of war is not to be expected: but, contrary to all reasonable calculation, should the congress possess spirit and independence enough, to place their popularity in jeopardy by so strong a measure, the legislature of Massachusetts will give the tone to the neighboring states; will declare itself REPLENISHED, until a new election of members; invite a congress to be composed of delegates from the federal states, and ERECT A SEPARATE GOVERNMENT. This congress would probably begin by abrogating the offensive laws, and adopting a plan for the maintenance of the power and authority thus assumed. They would, by such an act, be in a condition to make or receive proposals from Great Britain; and I should seize the first moment to open a correspondence with your excellency. Scarce any other aid would be necessary, and perhaps none required than a few vessels of war from the Halifax station, to protect the maritime towns from the little navy which is at the disposal of the national government. What permanent connection between Great Britain and this section of the republic would grow out of a civil commotion, such as might be expected, no person is prepared to describe; but it seems that a strict alliance must result of necessity."

Since the commencement of the present volume of the REGISTER wherein, in the "ways and wherefores" that have governed me, I promised some notice of the population, resources, future prospects, &c. of the several states, many correspondents have urged the task. But all the documents necessary for the purpose are not yet collected, and some may not be obtained until after the meeting of congress—when they are had, I shall attempt to shew, and feel confident to demonstrate, the utter contempt and insignificance of the seat of the faction, separated from and compared with the other parts of the confederacy—to explain how their "consumer," the great god they worship, would leave them, because they have nothing wherewith to feed his avarice; nor can they command it, though like the Dutch, they might "trample on the cross" to have it.—to shew, that their population now rapidly declining (and every day losing its influence by an increase in other parts) would leave them by thousands for more fertile countries and less oppressed states, where bread enough is raised for the consumption, with a great surplus for exportation. The folks at Boston, who seize on the revolutionary fane of Massachusetts, shall see that things have greatly altered since 1776—as for instance, Kentucky and Ohio were then wildernesses—they now have as great a population as Massachusetts, including the district of Maine. Nor is there less change in the relative wealth and resources of the several states. Many silly people thought if Boston would not support the government with money, the "wheels must stop;" and, to prevent supplies, very ungenerous and un gentlemanly means were used. In 1776, Baltimore, compared with Boston, was a mere speck in the political scale; but now the latter has a greater population and much more capital, (good honest specie, or bank notes circulating the same as specie) than the former; not to mention New-York and Philadelphia. On the loans we may say more hereafter; but we venture the opinion, that Pennsylvania has the ability to raise more money, real money, than the whole of the boasted "New-England States." Improved land in that state sells within from 50 to 70 miles of a seaport, at from 200 to 250$ per acre,* by the hundred acres, entire plantations, if of good quality; and money was never so plenty as now. Why are these changes? We shall shew they are the natural result of soil, situation and climate; and that they will yet proceed to an extent far more alarming to the faction, if it shall remain to fret and vex itself.

It is with sincere regret we apprehend the necessity of these remarks. We would speak of all parts of the union as having a community of interest, as indeed they have; and have it supposed as impossible to dissolve the confederacy as to stop the courses of the planets. We are decidedly opposed to all "geographical distinctions," which Washington so severely reprehended, and avoid mentioning them, even in common conversation: but it seems right to bring down the "high blown pride" of the faction that deceives honest "New-England," and arrogates to itself all the talents, all the wealth, and all the respectability of the nation—and we shall pursue the matter, we trust, equally to the satisfaction of all true Americans.

From the Boston Daily Advertiser.

PROJECT FOR THE RESTORATION OF PEACE TO NEW ENGLAND.

It being now pretty well ascertained that all New England, that is to say, all that part of the United States which has a homogeneous, uniform, national character, is opposed to this unjust and ruinous war, it remains now to consider by what means they can restore to themselves the blessings of peace consistently with the constitution and the preservation of internal quiet.

We enter on this discussion upon the supposition, that the people of New England will not alter their views on account of any partial successes in Canada. Should the United States or its unjust and unwise administration succeed with seven millions of people, whose resources they command, to conquer Upper or even Lower Canada, an event that we have always deemed probable, the situation of New England, instead of being in any degree ameliorated, will be rendered most dreadful.

Their commerce, on which they rely, will be more vigorously assailed and more certainly destroyed—their fisheries will be annihilated, and their new neighbors who have plunged them into this war, the very men who have often threatened to cut their throats because they did not agree with them in the expediency of destroying their birth-right. Commerce, will be in an armed attitude as victors on their frontiers. The conquest then of all Canada including Quebec, will be deemed by all enlightened people in New England as only the signal of their downfall and ruin.

They will therefore be more desirous of peace than ever. How is this to be obtained? The constitution has provided them with direct, regular and easy means. Means, which render unnecessary civil commotions, separation, or any of the other extreme remedies which might be worse than the disease.

By the constitution of the United States it is provided that all powers not expressly delegated, are referred to the states respectively or to the people.

* Some farms, in York county, have sold for $275 an acre.

By the same instrument it is provided, that "no state shall without the consent of congress enter into any treaty with any foreign state or power." This provision is therefore tantamount to a declaration, that any state with the consent of congress may enter into a treaty with any foreign power.

The constitution then has authorized us, and our necessities and interest invite us, to endeavor to make a separate treaty with Great Britain, asking however the consent of congress. This I think we ought to do, and this I presume they will not on their own principles refuse.

Timid men ought not to be alarmed at a proposition which it seems was contemplated in the formation of our constitution. There ought to be nothing to alarm us in the exercise of a constitutional right, especially when its exercise is so important, and is to restore to us the blessings of peace.

The prudent and moderate state of Connecticut has already availed itself of another of these negative clauses of the constitution. The constitution provides that "no state, except in time of war, shall keep on foot troops," &c.

Connecticut has construed this into an express admission that any state in time of war may keep on foot troops, and has organized a corps of elite for their defence against foreign or domestic foes.

Some may think it inconsistent with the federal union, for one or more states to make a separate peace, but if they will look into history they will find many examples of confederated republics or states in which a part of them maintained a perfect neutrality.

There have been times in which the province of Holland alone, without the other six provinces, has been engaged in war. The Germanic body offers many such examples. Our own country exhibits one instance very striking. During our revolutionary war it was agreed that the Island of Bermuda should remain neutral, and acts of the then congress were passed directing our cruisers to respect that neutrality.

It was not considered by Great Britain a crime in Bermuda to request it, nor against their policy to grant it.

It cannot therefore be deemed in New-England an indecorous request to ask that they may be permitted to stand neuter in a war which they opposed unambiguously, which is fatal to their interests, and which may ultimately destroy their liberties.

The states in favor of the war urged it from one or the other of all the following motives.

1st. To drive the Indians out of lands which they wanted to purchase and which they could not in any other way so cheaply acquire.

2dly. To rob the poor Canadians, and acquire a new and easier outlet for the production of the western states.

3dly. To divert the forces of Great Britain, and thus favor the progress of Bonaparte in his conquest of Spain and Russia. The expeditions into Spanish America are made with the same view.

Lastly. To add new territories to the United States to be held by right of conquest in which not only votes would be obtained, but a military force might be kept to insure the submission of the Eastern States.

It is not perceived that our neutrality would affect either these objects.—The war may still be prosecuted by the heroes of the west—Canada may be subdued—its inhabitants honorably plundered—The Indians destroyed and exterminated—Great Britain weakened and her force diverted—and New-England surrounded with victorious, and mercenary, and devoted troops, much more ready and willing to cut our throats than either the British or the Indians.

I ask, then, seriously, why New-England should not unite as one man, and ask permission to make a separate peace pursuant to the constitution, leaving all their obligations and connections with the United States in full force, and why the other states who are left in possession of all the blessings and advantages of war and all its fruits, which we do not ask to divide with them, should not agree to our proposal.

This is no sudden thought, nor is it done without the most serious and solemn reflection.

I hope every legislator in New England will ponder upon and be prepared to meet the question this winter.

If we unite, and congress agree as they ought to do, to it, we shall once more be happy. If they do not agree to it, but unreasonably refuse it, it will then remain for the wise and prudent to decide what we ought to do when a just and reasonable and constitutional request is refused.

— CONSTITUTIONALIST.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Brig Argus.—We have always considered captain Mables' account of the capture of the Argus by the Pelican as a pure "British official;" or, in other words, as a great falsehood. We are yet to learn the facts from our own officers—one, however, of high importance, has leaked out in the London papers in these words:—"Is the action closed, his majesty's ship Lembitz, [rated 38] captain Seymour, fell in with them," [the Argus and Pelican.] It was not convenient for captain Mables to state this incident; which, doubtless, led to the surrender of our vessel.

The Scourge privateer is still doing a great business off the North Cape. Not a vessel for Archangel escapes her (says a letter from Lisbon.) "Every thing taken is sure of being saved, as three hours sail will send them in behind a chain of islands, and on the one at the entrance, the privateer has erected, or rather repaired and supplied an old battery, strong enough to keep off small cruisers. The Danes take possession of them immediately, and conduct them to Donthem, so that the crew of the Scourge remains complete; as Danes are hired to man the fortress they have erected.

Commodore Perry was received with great respect by the corporation of Albany, on the 8th inst. and the common council voted him the freedom of the city in a gold case, with an elegant sword. He has since arrived at Newport, R. I. where he was received with rapture. It is said he is to command on that station until a frigate is provided for him.

The corporation of New York have given the name of "Perry-street" to one of the new streets of that city, in honor of the hero of Erie.

By our latest accounts from Halifax, it appears that the British have 16 vessels of war, carrying 5139 guns, on the North American station. A pretty handsome armament to manage "five or six first built frigates."

All the reports agree in stating the usage of our people, prisoners there, as horrible. A late Portland paper has the following, which we believe is literally true—"It is well that the public should have an idea of the place where our Americans are confined. To give a full description is not in our power; but agreeably to information received, Melville Island where TWELVE HUNDRED Americans are confined, is little above the surface of the water, and from its low situation is generally very unhealthy—its circumference, about sixteen hundred feet—on this nauseous spot is situated a building of two stories—130 feet in length and 40 feet broad—and of the upper room 30 feet is set apart for the sick—the remainder of this apartment now contains 180 American prisoners. In the lower room are 770 more crowded up to breathe the same breath and generate disease by this narrow confine—350 more are near this island on board a prison ship. In this situation, under the most rigorous treatment, our brethren remain—the brave tars of our navy and many of the soldiers of our country are here doomed to breathe their last from a pestilence which carries off three or four of a day—and to heighten the poignancy of their reflections, they are told by the British agent, Miller; "to die and be damned."—The king has 150 acres of land to bury them."

We have also many anecdotes like the annexed—certain British officers at Halifax were endeavoring to entice a boy, an apprentice to an American merchant, to enter their service—on which an officer of the late Yorktown privateer who stood by said, "Joe don't go." For his impudence, he was put ten days in the black hole, on short allowance.

They have impressed fifteen men from the prison ship at Quebec, and forced them to do duty in their ships. Among them are two citizens of Maryland; to wit, William Kelly, a soldier of the revolution, who again entered to serve his country, and John Todd, a native of Prince George's county, both of the 14th regiment of infantry.

The fact is, if the barbarities of the enemy beggar all description, the venality and baseness of our own citizens forms a fair counterpart to them. In the month of September, in the course of one day, 17,000 barrels of flour arrived at Halifax from the United States. It is transported from the grain-growing states, by internal conveyances, to eastern ports "not blockaded;" from whence, by Swedish flags and other means, it goes immediately to feed the enemy. A gentleman who has just arrived home, says, that when he left Halifax, there were upwards of two hundred "moral and religious" Americans, in that city, in open and direct communication with the British—smuggling backwards and forwards. Will congress hesitate to deny the exportation of provisions? Had this been done at the last session, the present state of things would have been materially different. We pray to heaven, that, while the war lasts, we may have no half-way measures. They are disgraceful to the age we live in. What is it if our seamen and soldiers are brave, if the legislative power of the country fights against them?

The London Pilot of the 11th of August, says that thirteen vessels belonging to the United States, have been seized by the British in the port of Canton. This, we suppose is the respect of the enemy for "neutral rights."

The Tenedos frigate, and her guard, La Hogue of 74 guns, has returned to Halifax, from a cruise of about 3 months for commodore Rodgers. They captured nothing but one Spanish vessel.

Several British vessels of war have lately arrived at Quebec, said to have on board considerable reinforcements. Among them the brave sir Sidney Beckwith, and 1600 of his gallant marines, so famous for their deeds in the Chesapeake. 300 seamen for the lake flotillas have also arrived there. Some troops are also reported to have arrived at Halifax from England.

Mr. Croker, (says the Aurora) in his late panegyric in the British parliament, upon the British navy, [see page 138] mentions John Humble, boatswain of the late frigate Java. There is an anecdote of Humble which may never have come to Mr. Croker's ears. It is related by the officers of Constitution who were present when the circumstance took place. It is this:

Two or three evenings after the crew of the Java were taken on board the Constitution, Humble was sitting in a corner of a ward room, in which there were a number of officers of both ships. A British lieutenant of marines observed, "He wished to heaven that the crew of the Java were again on board of her in good condition, and that they might again fall in with the Constitution—he had no doubt they would give a very different account of her." Humble looked up, and said—"Sir, whenever in the Java, or any other British frigate, you may fall in with, as an enemy, such a ship and such a ship's company as this, I had rather be on yonder hills (pointing to the hills on the coast of South America) looking at ye, than to be on board of ye!"

British naval glory.—From the London Morning Chronicle:—It is one of the peculiar traits in the character of the present naval administration, that a line of battle ship, with an admiral's flag flying (that of lord Amelius Beauclerk), is now appointed to cruise, in hopes of encountering an American frigate!"

A good remark.—An eastern editor asks the "moral and religious people," who hold it wrong to make war upon the "innocent Canadians"—if Great Britain did not conquer that country by the aid of our ancestors?

A Boston paper says, that the commander of the fort at Newport, R. I. has issued an order, stating that no American vessel will be permitted to leave that place with more provisions on board than is sufficient for the crew.

A Newburyport paper says, "The elegant mansion-house, late of gen. Peabody, built a few years since at an expence of 31,900 dollars, (land &c. included) went off under the hammer, last Tuesday, at 7,550 dollars!—O tempora!"

In Pennsylvania, entire plantations, hundreds of acres, 50 or 60 miles from a sea-port, are selling for $250 per acre. O MORSES!

Brigadier-general Cass, has been appointed provisional governor of the Michigan territory.

Steele's navy list. There never was a set of creatures so wretchedly deceived as the British. We were not acquainted with the extent of this delusion till the "events of the war" brought to us their "official accounts" of things with which we also were acquainted. John Bull is to be pitied; for every chance of information is so polluted, that he cannot discern the truth of passing events, strive as much as he may. He has no source of private information, for every letter and newspaper arriving in his country is examined by the government, who give out such parts as may conveniently be made known. In Steele's list we did expect something of honesty, but it is like the rest. Take the following cases—

When the Guerriere was captured from the French, she was called a forty four gun frigate of the first class. The British added five guns to her complement, making forty-nine in all, and, when we took her, called her a thirty-eight gun frigate, captured by the Constitution of fifty-eight.

The capture of the Chesapeake of forty-nine guns, is announced by the Shannon of thirty-eight guns, though each had the same number of guns.

The Argus is said to have carried twenty-four guns, and to be taken by the Pelican of eighteen guns; though there is no fact more notorious than that the latter was by far the most powerful vessel.

The Majestic, a razee, now on our coast, having all the strength and efficient armament of a 74 gun ship, and carrying about 70 guns, is called a fifty-four. Now what a boast would be if this "fifty-four" should capture the President frigate of fifty-eight!

There is no doubt but that these razees were fitted out for the express purpose of gulling the British nation; and, prostituted as the press is, if one them should succeed in taking an American frigate, the design will be partially effected.

By a British general order inserted below, it appears that "his majesty's" government has directed the close imprisonment of forty-six American officers and non-commissioned officers, to be retained as hostages for the safety of twenty-three soldiers we hold in security for the release of as many of our citizens, taken at Queenstown, and sent to England, on the pretence of their being British born subjects, &c.

Commodore DeCatur fired a salute at New-London, for Harrison's victory; but brigadier-general Barbeck (of the U. S. army) did not.

MONTREAL, October 30.

Yesterday sixty-two American prisoners arrived here, which were taken in the upper province and at Chateauguay.

We see by the Quebec Gazette of the 21st inst. that the embargo on all articles of grain and provision which had been continued to the 5th of the present month, is extended, (with the exception of supplies necessary for the fisheries on the coast of Labrador, and the settlements on the Anticosti,) till the 15th of December next.

MILITARY.

From the Northern Armies.—We have no official information, nor, indeed, any other account that can be relied upon. It is stated, that Gen. Wilkinson left Grenadier island, about the 1st inst. with his whole force 8,700 men, to proceed down the St. Lawrence. Besides those, he had three regiments of light dragoons at Ogdensburg. It is further said, that the advance under gen. Brown had had a skirmish with the enemy, whom he directly dispersed. The troops from fort George had joined. Chauncey still employed in waiting on sir James L. Yeo. It is uncertain whether Kingston or Montreal was aimed at. Montgomery took the latter on the 12th of November, 1775. Of Hampton's skirmish we have no additional information worthy of note. A Buffalo paper of Nov. 2, says that on the preceding Wednesday the troops under Harrison crossed the Niagara, at Black Rock, and marched for Fort George—the enemy are said yet to have some troops in the vicinity. It seems as if Harrison himself had afterwards went on to join Wilkinson. We think that for next week's paper, we shall have an account of the late movements, &c. worthy of record. The following letter from Sacket's Harbor throws a little light upon the proceedings—

Extract of a letter from Sacket's Harbor, dated November 5.

"I have procured for you and enclose a copy of a letter from gen. Brown to the colonel commanding at this post. Gen. Wilkinson left Grenadier island on the 3d, with the last division of the army, accompanied with commodore Chauncey and his fleet. The weather since the 3d has been much more favorable than we have had for the last five weeks. It is understood here, the British have been concentrating at Prescott, with a view to make all the resistance possible. Eight Canadians deserted to this place two days ago. The militia, since the capture of Proctor's army, are very unwilling to do duty. Those who refuse, even though born within the United States, are treated with great cruelty. They deny our right to employ British subjects in our army or navy, even with their own approbation, yet they force American citizens to fight their battles both by sea and land, whether they will or not."

Head-quarters, French Creek, Nov. 2, 1815.

SIR—We were attacked last evening by the enemy. He shewed two brigs, and two schrs with some gun and other boats. He was repulsed. This morning the attack was renewed with the same success. The enemy did not succeed in landing any where in the neighborhood of our position, that I have yet learned. We have lost, say ten men in killed and wounded. The enemy must have suffered very considerably, as we saw many bullets take effect.

He is now making the best of his way into Kingston Channel. Our boats have sustained no injury whatever.

By order of general Brown,

L. AUSTIN, aid-de-camp.

Col. Richard Dennis, commanding Sackett's Harbor.

It is agreed that Tecumseh was killed in the battle on the Thames. He was, perhaps, the greatest "Indian warrior that ever lifted a tomahawk." More than 100 of his followers, it seems, were slain on the field, for they fought bravely and stood their ground manfully. The survivors who have come in and received protection, speak much of the cowardice of Proctor and the British. The chief Walk-in-the-water was second in command, and has come in, as a condition of his pardon, he sat out to catch his "father," major-general Proctor—but, unfortunately, failed; not, we believe, for want of a disposition to seize the royal murderer. The fruits of Harrison's victory, independent of its eventual advantages, are thus stated—500 British regulars prisoners, 2 colonels, 4 majors, and 17 officers of the line; 12 pieces of cannon; 6000 stand of arms; and an immense quantity of ammunition and stores valued at one million of dollars.

Extract of a letter to the editor of the Weekly Register, dated Chillicothe, Nov. 9.

"About six hundred prisoners captured from 'His majesty' in Canada, by the gallant Harrison and his brave backwoodsmen, arrived here this evening under the care of a 'boy,' immortalized as the 'hero of Fort Stephenson'—(L. Sandusky)—the gallant, the intrepid Croghan. They will join their comrades, taken with the Eric British fleet, to-morrow, at 'Camp Bull,' about 3-4 of a mile above our town, on the bank of the Scioto river. There are several families of women and children with them. The officers, I believe, with the exception of one or two, left sick, are all in town, on parole—they are in general, dashing young bucks. The whole number of prisoners now at this place, including officers, and the families of soldiers, amounts probably, to upwards of one thousand. I understand they are to remain here all winter, and perhaps, till exchanged. Extensive barracks are erecting at 'Camp Bull' for their accommodation. Their guard is composed of militia from this town and neighborhood. I shall endeavor to send you in my next a complete roll of the officers names, rank, &c. with the number and description of troops at camp.

"Col. Campbell, lieutenant-col. Croghan, and several other officers from the army, are in town. I was as much astonished as pleased in beholding, this evening, the youthful hero. Indeed, to think of the mighty deed which he performed, and of the immortal fame that deed has gained him, and then behold his very youthful appearance, you would almost involuntarily exclaim, with the British officer at Seneca—'Gracious God! is it possible!'"

The Peterburg Volunteers have been discharged in the most honorable manner by brigadier-general Cass. He says—

"In granting a discharge to this patriotic and gallant corps, the general feels at a loss for words adequately to convey his sense of their exalted merits. Almost exclusively composed of individuals, who had been nursed in the lap of ease, they have for 12 months borne the hardships and privations of a military life, in the midst of an inhospitable wilderness, with a cheerfulness and alacrity which has never been surpassed; their conduct in the field has been excelled by no other corps."

The same "general order" also "grants an honorable discharge" to the Pennsylvania militia, under col. Hill.

The Creeks.—We have no important incidents from the Creek country since our last. The editor of the Register acknowledges the receipt of a communication from Pondigbe, which he designs to insert in his next number. It contains some interesting facts of the past, with many important remarks as to the future dispositions of this people.

The editor of the Register is indebted to a venerable friend residing near the Canada line, for a Montreal paper of the 50th ult. containing the two following "general orders."—

HEAD-QUARTERS,

A Pounce, on Chateauguay river, Oct. 27th, 1813.

GENERAL ORDERS.—His excellency the governor in chief and commander of the forces has received from major-general De Watteville, the report of the affair which took place at the advanced position of his post, at 11 o'clock on Tuesday morning, between the American army under the command of major-general Hampton, and the advanced pickets of the British thrown out for the purpose of covering working parties, under the direction of lieutenant-col. De Salisbury; the judicious position chosen by that officer, and the excellent disposition of his little band, composed of the light company of Canadian fencibles, and two companies of Canadian voltigeurs, repulsed with loss the advance of the enemy's principal column, commanded by gen. Hampton in person and the American light brigade under col. McCarty, was in a like manner checked in its progress on the south side of the river, by the gallant and spirited advance of the flank company 3d battalion embodied militia under captain Daly, supported by captain Bruyere's company of Seditary militia. Captains Daly and Bruyere being both wounded, and their companies having sustained some loss, their position was immediately taken up by a flank company of the first battalion embodied militia. The enemy rallied and repeatedly returned to the attack, which terminated only with the day in his complete disgrace and defeat, being foiled by a handful of men not amounting to a twentieth part of the force opposed to them, but which nevertheless by their determined bravery maintained their position, and effectually protected the working parties, who continued their labors unmolested. Lieut. col. De Salisbury reports having experienced the most able support from captain Ferguson in command of the light company Canadian Fencibles, and also from captain Jean Bapt. Duchesnay of the two companies of Voltigeurs; from captain Lamotte and adjutants Hebdenn and O. Sullivan, and from every officer and soldier engaged, whose gallantry and steadiness were conspicuous and praise-worthy in the highest degree.

His excellency the governor in chief and commander of the forces having had the satisfaction of himself witnessing the conduct of the troops on this brilliant occasion, feels it a gratifying duty to render them that praise which is so justly their due; to major-general De Watteville for the admirable arrangement established by him, for the defence of his post; to lieutenant-col. De Salisbury for his judicious and officerlike conduct displayed in the choice of position and arrangement of his force; to the officers and men engaged with the enemy, the warmest acknowledgments of his excellency are due, for their gallantry and steadiness, and to all the troops at the station the highest praise belongs, for their zeal, steadiness and discipline and for the patient endurance of hardship and privation which they have evinced. A determined perseverance in this honorable conduct cannot fail of crowning the brave and loyal Canadians with victory, and hurling disgrace and confusion on the head of the enemy that would pollute their happy soil.

By the report of prisoners, the enemy's force is stated at 7,500 infantry, 400 cavalry and ten field pieces. The British advanced force actually engaged, did not exceed three hundred. The enemy suffered severely from our fire, as well as from their own; some detached corps having fired upon each other by mistake in the woods.

Canadian light company had 3 rank and file killed

—1 sergeant, 3 rank and file wounded.

Voltigeurs, 4 rank and file wounded.

Third battallian flank company, 1 captain wounded, 2 rank and file killed, 6 wounded and four missing.

Chateauguay Chasseurs, 1 captain wounded.

Total—5 rank and file killed—2 captains, 1 sergeant, 13 rank and file wounded, and 4 missing.

Officers wounded—captain Daley, 3d embodied militia, twice wounded severely, but not dangerously.—Captain Bruyere, Chateauguay chasseurs, slightly.

(Signed) EDWARD BAYNES, adj. gen.

Head-quarters—Montreal, 27th Oct. 1815.
GENERAL ORDERS.

His excellency, the governor general and commander of the forces, having transmitted to his majesty's government a letter from major-general Dearborn, announcing that the American commissary of prisoners, resident at London, had informed his government that twenty-three soldiers of the 1st, 6th and 13th regiments U. S. infantry, taken prisoners, had been sent to England, and were detained in rigorous confinement, as British subjects; and that the said major-general Dearborn had received instructions from his government to place in close confinement twenty-three British subjects to be kept as hostages and exchange of the aforesaid United States' soldiers sent to England; and that, in obedience to his said instructions, he had caused twenty-three British subjects to be closely confined, and kept as hostages. And the persons mentioned in the letter of major-general Dearborn, being soldiers serving in the American army, made prisoners at Queenstown, who declared that they were born British subjects, having been sent in confinement to England to be tried according to law: his excellency the commander of the forces has received orders from his royal highness the Prince Regent, through the office of the right hon. lord Bathurst, secretary of state, to announce without delay to major-general Dearborn, that he had transmitted to his government a copy of that letter, and that in consequence he had received instructions to give explicit notice to major-general Dearborn, that his excellency had been commanded by his royal highness the Prince Regent, to forthwith closely imprison and detain forty-six American officers and non-commissioned officers as hostages for the safety of the twenty-three British soldiers who have been closely confined by order of the American government. At the same time, his excellency is directed to give notice, that he is authorised, in case any of the said British soldiers should suffer death under the pretext that the soldiers, now prisoners in England, and whom not only the laws of Great Britain but of every independent state, placed under the same circumstances, would condemn, have been found guilty and in consequence been executed, to select from among the American officers and non-commissioned officers, double the number of British soldiers who shall have been so unjustly put to death, and to immediately execute the said officers and non-commissioned officers.

And his excellency is further authorised to make known to major-general Dearborn, that the commanders of the armies and of the fleets of his majesty on the American coasts, have received orders to prosecute the war with uninterrupted vigor against all the towns, cities or villages, belonging to the United States, and against the inhabitants thereof, if, after the due communication of these presents to major-general Dearborn, and the grant of a reasonable time for transmitting them to the American government, that government should unhappily refuse to abandon its design of taking away the lives of any of its soldiers who are at present, or who may hereafter, be kept as hostages, for the causes mentioned in the letter of major-general Dearborn.

His excellency the commander of the fleets, in announcing to the troops the orders of his royal highness the Prince Regent, declares him to be that they will be sensible of the paternal solicitude which his royal highness has shown for the protection of the person and honor of the British soldier, which, in contempt of justice, of humanity, and the law of nations, have been grossly outraged in the persons of twenty-three soldiers now closely confined as hostages for an equal number of traitors who have been guilty of the infamous and inhuman crime of raising their baneful arms against the country which gave them birth, and who will be tried according to the equitable laws of their original country.

The British soldier will view this outrage, which is an abandonment of all principle, and an aggravation of the atrocious insults and cruel barbarities daily and maliciously practised on many of his unhappy comrades, who have fallen into the hands of the enemy, as an additional incitement to confirm his resolution never to yield, but with his life, his liberty to an enemy, who is a stranger to every principle of honor, of justice, and of the laws of war.

EDWARD BAYNES,

Adjutant-general of British North America.

[A letter from governor Prevost to maj. gen. Wilkinson, to the same purport as the preceding "general order" appears in the National Intelligencer of the 18th inst. On inserting which, the editor observes—

"We are not a little pleased to learn, from an official source, that as soon as these measures of the enemy were made known to our government, the President gave orders to have forty-six of the principal officers of the enemy in our possession put in close confinement. We presume these officers will be selected from those who were taken by com. Perry and general Harrison, and are now in Ohio and Kentucky. This just measure of retaliation is not so severe as it might be: but it will teach the British government that republics possess energy when the times require it"]

COLONIAL DEPARTMENT,

Doabing-Street, Sept. 7.

A despatch, of which the following is an extract, has been received by lord Bathurst, one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, transmitted by sir George Prevost, Bart.

Kingston, U. C. July 3, 1815.

"I have the honor to transmit to your lordship copies of letters from colonel Vincent and lieutenant colonel Bissop, and of the papers accompanying them, containing the highly gratifying intelligence of the capture, on the 24th ultimo, of a body of the enemy's forces, consisting of two field officers, 21 other officers of different ranks, 27 non-commissioned officers, and 452 privates, together with a stand of colors, and 2 field pieces. The details of this gallant affair, which reflects so much credit on our Indian allies as well as upon lieutenant Fitzgibbon, for the promptitude and decision with which he availed himself of the opportunity their attack had made upon the enemy, will, I have no doubt, be read by your lordship with great satisfaction. Since the surprise of the enemy's camp at Stony Creek, on the 6th ultimo, and their subsequent retreat from the forty-mile Creek, in which almost the whole of their camp baggage, together with a quantity of stores and provisions, fell into our hands, Major-general Dearborn has withdrawn the troops from Fort Erie, and has concentrated his forces at Fort George. Colonel Vincent has in consequence made a forward movement from the head of the lake, in order to support the light infantry and Indian warriors, who are employed in encircling the enemy, so as to compel them to make use of their own resources for the maintenance of their army. Major-general de Rottenburg has assumed the command of the Centre Division of the army of Upper Canada. After the squadron under commodore sir James L. Yeo had shown itself off the Forty-mile Creek, which principally determined the enemy to retreat from that position, it was very successfully employed in interrupting and cutting off the supplies going from the Genesee river, and their other settlements upon the southern shore of the lake: five small vessels, with provisions, clothing and other articles were taken, and several loaded boats were captured and some destroyed.

[Transmitted by colonel Vincent.]

Prevost, Dec. 21, 1815.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you, that the troops you have done me the honor to place under my command, have succeeded this day in taking prisoners a detachment of the United States' army, under the command of lieutenant col. Boerstler. In this affair the Indian warriors, under the command of captain Kerr, were the only force actually engaged; to whom great merit is due, and to them I feel particularly obliged, for their gallant conduct on this occasion. On the appearance of the detachment of the 27th regiment, under lieutenant Fitzgibbon, and the light company of the 6th or 10th regiment, the two field companies of the 64th, under major de Hasden, and the provincial cavalry under captain Hall,

* To have made "this official account" complete, the British should have surrounded Hampton's army of 7,900 men with their 300, and made the whole prisoners. But lest some, from the monstrous lies contained in this account, may suspect it a forgery, the editor of the REGISTER assures his readers, that he copied it immediately from the Montreal paper, in which it first appeared.

the whole surrendered to his majesty's forces. To the conduct of lieutenant Fitzgibbon, through whose address the capitulation was entered into, may be attributed the surrender of the American force. To major de Harden, for his speedy movement to the point of attack, and execution of the arrangements I had previously entered into with him, I am very much obliged. I have the honor to enclose the capitulation entered into between colonel Boerstler and myself, and a return of prisoners taken, exclusive of wounded, and yet unascertained. I lost no time in forwarding my staff adjutant, lieutenant Barnard, to communicate this intelligence. He has been particularly active and useful to me upon all occasions. I have the opportunity of mentioning him to you, and beg the favor of you to command him to sir George Prevost, as an active and promising young officer.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Brig. gen. Vincent, &c.

Township of Louth, June 24, 1813.

SIR—At 6 o'clock, this morning about 7 o'clock, I received in formation, that about 1000 of the enemy, with two guns, were advancing towards me from St. David's. I soon after heard a fire of cannon and musketry, and in consequence rode in advance, two miles on the St. David's road; I discovered by the firing, that the enemy was moving fast the road on the mountain. I sent off colonel McKenney to order out my detachment of the 40th, consisting of a subaltern and 16 rank and file, and closed upon the enemy to reconnoitre. I discovered him on the mountain road, and took a position on an eminence to the right of it. My men arrived at, and pushed on in his front to cut off his retreat under a fire of his guns, which, however, did no execution. After examining his position, I was informed he expected reinforcements; I therefore decided upon surrounding him to surrender. After the exchange of several propositions, between lieutenant col. Boerstler and myself, in the name of lieutenant col. de Harden, lieutenant col. B. agreed to surrender on the terms stated in the articles of capitulation. On my return to my men to send out an officer to superintend the details of the surrender, you arrived.

I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed)

J. FITZGIBBON.

Lieut. 4th foot.
To major de Harden, &c.

June 24, 1813.

Particulars of the capitulation made between captain McDowell, on the part of lieutenant col. Boerstler, of the United States' army, and major de Harden, of his Britannic majesty's Canadian regiment, on the part of lieutenant col. Bishopp, commanding the advance of the British, respecting the force under lieutenant col. Boerstler.

- 1. That lieutenant col. Boerstler, and the force under his command, shall surrender prisoners of war.
- 2d. That the officers shall retain the fit arms, horses and baggage.
- 3d. That the non-commissioned officers and soldiers shall lay down their arms at the head of the British column, and become prisoners of war.
- 4th. That the militia and volunteers, with lieutenant col. Boerstler, shall be permitted to return to the U. States.

The loss of the enemy is supposed to be about 100 in killed and wounded.

From the Buffalo Gazette.

The following interesting extract of a letter, was written by a captain in the British dragons (addressed to his parents in England) and found among Gen. Proctor's papers—and we are assured by an officer in the army, that it was found with a broken seal; probably having been entrusted to a distinguished officer of the British army, who fearing it might contain something concerning his own conduct, his curiosity led him to examine its contents:

Extract from a letter written at Detrola, Sept. 26, 1813.

"Our fleet upon the lake sailed about 20 days ago, from our port into that of the Americans, after a close action of 3 hours and a half, without one making their escape; the consequence of which is, we have lost all hopes of ever regaining the command of the lake; and our army, consisting of 550 regulars and 2500 wild Indians, who have declared that they will not budge one inch further, and would us of our general having promised to conquer or leave their bones with them; as we are now completely in the savage's power, we are obliged, in a great measure, to act as they think proper. The celebrated chief Tecumseh, dined with me last Friday, and assured me his Indians were determined to give battle the moment the Americans approach. Our general should he act contrary to their wishes, may repent his rash disposition;—however prudent he may conceive a retreat at such an awful crisis. These savages have no mercy. The tomahawk and scalping knife decide immediately the wretch who falls in their hands, and many dread the only hellish may sound in our ears, if we set contrary to their idias, which are as wild as themselves. We have spread a net which may catch us. I hate these savage barbarians. You cannot please confidence in them; and without a sufficient force to keep them in check, they are more plague than profit."

The subjoined document was found among Gen. Proctor's papers taken at the Battle of the Flagges, which we have obtained the permission of Gen. Harrison to publish. It will be read with considerable interest.

COPY

Of a Letter from Sir George Prevost to Commodore Sir James Lucas Yeo.

Head-quarters—Kingston, 10th September, 1813.

SIR—The Centre Division of the Upper Canada army is placed in a situation very critical and one novel in the system of war, that of investing a force vastly superior in numbers, within a strongly intrenched position. It was adopted and has been maintained from a confident expectation, that with the co-operation of the squadron under your command, a combined attack, or this, could have been effected on the enemy at Fort George, with every prospect of success. But the local disadvantages of the position occupied by our army, have been added disease and desertion to a degree calling for immediate remedy. You are therefore required to proceed with the fleet under your command, with the least possible delay, to the head of the lake, a large sufficient convoy to the small vessels containing stores and supplies of which the army is in the most pressing want. Upon your arrival near the headquarters of the Centre Division, you will consult with major-general De Rottenburg, who will reside in his person, the civil and military command of the Upper Canada, upon my withdrawing from the province upon the eligibility of a combined attack, for the purpose of dislodging the enemy from the position of Fort George, by a rapid forward movement of the army, bringing up in battery at the same time, the heavy ordnance, mortars and howitzers now embarked. This attack must be supported by the co-operation of your squadron and the fire of such vessels as are armed with a description of ordnance favorable to it. Should this attempt appear to you to be attended with too great hazard to the squadron, under the possible circumstance of the enemy appearing on the lake, you will in that case distinctly state your sensations to major-general De Rottenburg, who will immediately upon ascertaining your inability to assist him, take measures for evacuating the position he now occupies. In the execution of which movement you will give his army every support and assistance consistent with the safety of your vessels; and having performed this service, you will pursue such measures as shall appear most probable speedily to ensure the acquisition of the naval ascendancy.

You are already acquainted with the decided line of conduct which I wish to be observed on Lake Erie, by capt. Barclay, and you will not fail to impress on that officer the absolute necessity of regaining the naval superiority, and to prevent uninterrupted intercourse between Amherstburg and Long Point, in order that the supplies and stores in depot at the latter place, and at the head of the lake, may be transported in safety to the Right Division.

The flotilla of transports on Lake Ontario are to be kept employed, as long as the season will admit, in the conveyance of the provisions and other supplies collected at Kingston, and destined for the Right and Centre Divisions of the army, and they are to receive from your force the necessary protection.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant.
(Signed) GEORGE PREVOST,
Commander of the forces.

Com. Sir J. L. Yeo.

GROANINGS.—From the Quebec Gazette.—"The victory gained by the Americans on Lake Erie, has excited an enthusiastic joy throughout the United States. The two great political parties in that country are viewed with equal ardor for the triumph of that victory, and all opposition to the war seems for a time to be forgotten in the gratification of national pride which it has afforded.

"The contest, if it ought ever to have been so called, between Great-Britain and the United States, on the water, has indeed been gratifying to the Americans, and mortifying to British subjects, beyond any thing that could have been figured by the utmost stretch of imagination. Vessels of an inferior class, very badly manned, fresh from port, fully prepared, and manned with picked seamen, so as to afford them, at least, a semblance of superiority, over British officers and seamen, beyond what was ever obtained by the most powerful and brave of the numerous nations with whom they have contended.

"How long this disgraceful state of things is to last, we cannot tell; but it is not quickly remedied, we are sure that it will not only prove ruinous to these provinces, but dangerous to the naval existence of British greatness, which has arisen from the superiority of her naval officers and seamen over those of every other nation; for though the Americans cannot for the present with their eight frigates, destroy the two hundred ships of the line of Great Britain, their successes will infuse fresh vigor into all her enemies, which ought always to be counted as consisting, or likely to consist of every nation that navigates the ocean.

The good citizens of London may triumph in their victories in Spain and Portugal; but the conquests of Victoria and the P's yeses will not long defend England, should she suffer the sceptre of the ocean to slip out her hands. Then, in the insulting language of one who hates her, "she must take the rank among nations to which her population and territorial resources entitle her;" the rank from which her trade and commerce raised her; we must receive governors from Rome and kings from Normandy.

The following extracts on the preceding article are from a Hollis paper of the 20th ult.

"We cannot stretch what power is to wrest from us the sceptre of the ocean." A handful of American frigates have evaded our cruizers, but without taking from their deserts, we can safely say, they have been extremely favored by fortune. To such celebrity have they arrived, that the destruction of their world would cause more rejoice, than the battle of the Nile or Trafalgar.
 "The extracts to have given from the Quebec Gazette has great merit, though they are a mixture of truthfulness, which, perhaps, local interests may excuse. So far from questioning the right of our countrymen of London may have for triumphing for the battles of Utaida and the Pyrenees, we hold them as our glory, to our national character, honor, and possibly salvation; the only thing we have to console us in the event of the sceptre of the ocean slipping from our hands, is the heroism of our army; posterity will be justly, and its leader, in the future pages of history, will have a less distinguished place than the immortal Nelson.

"We have no doubt but the citizens of Canada, should a contest take place on shore, will have cause to join chorus with those of London, for battles won by our army."

A Montreal paper of October 16, says—"At Sackett's Harbor, the Americans have laid the keels of two vessels equal in length to the Pike; and we are a little farther advanced in one that was begun some three months ago! The fate of commodore Boree, was cannot be sufficiently lamented; sixty or seventy additional sailers would have enabled that brave officer to have saved a country larger than the empire of Alexander the great."

Sauvageur and Treason—The following is a copy of a letter found on board one of the Tanker's prizes:

MORLEY, Eng. 3d Aug. 1813.
 DUPLICATE.

Mr. James Webster—Quebec.

SIR—Have your letter of the 19th June to hand a few days ago, in which you say the goods you have sold in Canada, except a few pieces, amount 200 or 400, which has got to Albany. If these be all the goods you have unsold, I am convinced you might have made me a remittance; but I am informed by a gentleman from the United States, that you had twice the above amount in Albany. I am assure you I have never been so disappointed since I began the business, as I have been this summer. The goods in New York and Philadelphia we know were lacked fast, but knowing what goods were in Canada unsold, I had as much confidence as man could have that I should have remittances for them as soon as any money could be transferred from thence; but you have disappointed us in a manner no person could have made me believe you would have done; other persons have met with good market in Canada for their goods, and made remittances for nearly the whole of them since; when at the same time I could not hear one word of you, either from yourself, or by any other person where you was; indeed I have been so completely at a loss to know what they were on the land of the living or not, having never heard from you from January to June, and then you neither say where you have been, or what you have been doing. Have received 400l. per favor of Messrs. Fishson and Dickerson, but their letter don't say where you was; only please hand the within bill to Mr. Dixon on Mr. Webster. You surprise me by saying you can sell the goods in Albany any day, but you think it better to let them lay till next fall, when, at the same time you must be certain that the money would have been worth double to me here than what you can get extraordinary in the fall, if you only considered what goods are lacked fast in the States, and what I had on hand manufactured for there. Herewith have enclosed you invoices and papers of eight bales of cloth; and should wish you to make them into money as soon as possible, but not to sacrifice them; though I am particularly straitened for money, yet should not wish the goods sacrificed to relieve me, but leave it entirely to your own judgment how low you are to go, as they are valued as usual. I sent you seven bales by the vessel with Mr. Isaac Fishson, who I hope has arrived safe and in good health, and hope the goods are sold and a remittance on its way to this country. Messrs. Wm. Gilder and Sons, I believe, have sent you nine or ten bales cloth, and instructions along with them; your father has also sent you three bales cloth; hope you will not have left Quebec before the first part arrives. I have sent you an account of what goods were in the hands of Mr. Merrick, also the state of my accounts with him, except the difference of exchange in purchasing bills; since writing you that account, have received letters from Mr. Merrick and Mr. John Vaughan, desiring I would send on such accounts as would pass them Mr. Merrick's property, otherwise the bonds could not be given up; accordingly have sent them such documents as will enable them to get them out of the hands of government; in such case about see a power of attorney would be of any use, but when you can leave Quebec. Before winter sets in, would have you go on to Philadelphia. If you can with safety, see both Mr. Merrick and Mr. John Vaughan, and endeavor to get what money you can, if they have got the goods liberated, and forward it as soon as possible; you will see by the account, that I have received very little on account of these goods sent him when my former account is balanced; hope you will use every exertion you can to get what money from them you can, but have the way and manner to your own judgment; only to take care to take no paper along with you that will do any harm if they are taken from you. Wishing you health and prosperity, and am, sir, yours respectfully,

•We took more prisoners on her, than we had men engaged in the fight.

For JOSEPH DIXON,

J. O. ASQUETH.

Extracts from a letter from William Hodgson and Co. merchants at Sheffield, Eng. to Henry Cox, merchant, Quebec. This letter was intercepted by the Yankee privateer—date

Sheffield, 28th mo. 5d. 1813.

"We have shipped to thy care a considerable proportion of the goods we had in Liverpool, and which would amount to about 4000l. This we are induced to do by what thou says in thy No. 3, and in hopes thou wilt be able to get quit of most or all of them pretty directly on arrival, on advantageous terms—and should not in the case, the remainder which are not disposed of, may lay over in Quebec until the ensuing spring, and should they not be disposed of, and an opening should take place with the United States, thou might then, if necessary, be re-shipped for Philadelphia. If thou does attempt to get any goods into the country, thou should be in thy No. 3, it will require great care and caution on thy part, and thou must be sure to act wisely, or not at all."

NAVAL.

The London Gazette, (the British official paper) of the 13th September is stated to contain a list of "one hundred and twenty-nine vessels taken from the Americans by the squadron under admiral Warren, between the 30th of March and 22nd July last." What a glorious list for John Bull—129 VESSELS! —Off hats and huzzas for Britain's omnipotence! —But softly, how many of those "vessels" were oyster boats, and wood flats, and batteau—Sir John has not told that.

By turning to the account of the capture of "his majesty's" schr. Dominica, by the Decatur privateer, it will appear that the Queen Charlotte packet was in company; and, seeing the result of the battle, made her escape. Well, this packet has arrived in England, and reported that she left the Dominica in chase on an American privateer!

The United States have on the southern coast, a cutter called the Young Boxer, carrying 9 guns, and commanded by sailing master Mork. This vessel is not mentioned in our navy list.

Baltimore has now at sea a good many stout privateers and well armed letters-of-marque. We do not expect however, that they will burn villages in the West Indies, steal negroes, or rob old women. If any were known to do, what Cockburn and the "mild" Warren did—they would be kicked out of a society of scavengers.

Copy of a letter from commodore Lewis to the secretary of the navy.

NEW-YORK, November 7, 1813.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you of the recapture of the American schr. Sparrow, of Baltimore, from New-Orleans, bound to this port, laden with sugar and lead. On the third, the enemy's ship Piantagniet chased the said vessel on shore near Long Branch, six miles distant from where the flotta is stationed, and took possession of her with about one hundred men. A detachment from the flotilla marched against them, attacked them, drove them from on board the vessel, and took possession under a fire from the enemy's ship and barges. In this affair we lost one man; the enemy's loss must have been considerable, as many were seen to fall. The whole cargo, together with sails, rigging &c. have been saved, vessel bilged.

I have the honor, &c.

J. LEWIS.

Hon. William Jones, secretary of the navy.

The salvage of the cargo of the Sparrow was a very gallant affair. The 74 came near enough to fire grape shot at our people; having no sort of shelter, they laid down on the sand, and presented their heads to the enemy; and when his barges neared the shore they rose and beat them off. To the shame of the people of the neighborhood, they refused any assisttance; nay, it is said, even denied a spade to dig a grave for the man that was killed.

BLOCKADE OF THE CHESAPEAKE.

From a journal kept at Point Look Out, (mouth of the Potomac) it appears that the barbarians frequently conflagrate the dwellings of the people near the shores. This is what some call "magnanimity."

Always ready with an excuse.—A Boston paper, after inserting two or three articles from the Alexandria Gazette, respecting the state of things near the mouth of the Potomac, has the following excuse.

"Nota. Letters from England state that in consequence of the destruction of the Irish and English coasters, by the U. S. brig Argus, (which had been ascertained, it was said, to have been in consequence of pre-emptory orders from the American government) the admiralty had given orders for the most severe retaliation on the American coasting trade and craft. The following instance is thus complained of—"Waterford, Aug. 18. Mr. John Lewis, a dealer in cattle, informs us that the Dinah-and-Betty, a coaster, in which he was passenger, having thirty head of cattle on board, was taken by the Argus on Wednesday, near the Smalls, in sight of two other coasters then burning; that the enemy killed three of the cattle for the use of the crew, and burned the rest with the vessel."

Now it would be implied by this, that the destruction of the vessels of an enemy, was something new to the usages of war, though it has been practiced, and held lawful, by all nations in every age of the world. How very pitiful!—Do not all men recollect, that admiral Cockburn went a-boat-hunting in many of the rivers and creeks of the Chesapeake. Did he spare the most miserable craft that he could lay hold of? No—every thing was burned or destroyed. Were these things done "in consequence" of the orders given to the Argus? They happened before that vessel sailed! As to the paragraph quoted from Waterford, the Boston editor is morally certain that it is false—a base and wicked lie. Yet he inserts it without a remark. Captain Allen was distinguished for his humanity—but the sopora of a "Mr. John Lewis" an Irish "dealer in cattle," is to impeach the character of the illustrious dead! For shame! We owe nothing to the forbearance of the enemy—he has done all that the laws of war allowed, and added thereto the proceedings of a savage. Whatever we might think of a British admiral employed to destroy oyster boats and wood flats, we never complained of what he done in this respect. It is barbarisms on the shore that have stamped him with eternal disgrace.

About 1500 American prisoners remained at Hali-fax on the 30th ult. reported very sickly. A cartel is expected at Salem with 300 of these unfortunate men.

To-day and to-morrow.

The following pointed paragraph, extracted from a letter to the editor of the Weekly Register, from one of the most distinguished characters that this or any other country has produced, affords so fine a hint on the general concerns of life, and so feelingly applies to our own matters, that we record it with pleasure:

"Your indulgence has been infinitely beyond my desert in failing to make the remittance so justly due for your valuable repository of the Weekly Register. I know that the good rule is, not to put off to to-morrow what you can do to-day; but the practice is, too often not to do to-day what you can put off to to-morrow, and to this I am sometimes obliged to plead guilty."

Difference

The whole naval force of the United States, in service at the commencement of the war, exclusive of the gun boats, carried rather less than 450 guns—of which we lost, by captures, 141 guns, while we took from the enemy 453 guns. The vessels now in commission carry more than 860 guns, of which about 150 are on the lakes.

Speaking of the losses of the enemy, the National Advocate has the following remarks—

"No conflict in Europe has ever presented such a display in loss on the part of Great Britain; we can find nothing like it. In the war between France and Great Britain, in 1755, the loss up to the year 1760, is as follows:

The following, certainly not important at present, may amuse many some time hereafter. If such lists were published in all the chief cities and towns of the United States, the contrast would be very interesting. These things belong to the domestic history of a country; and, though now despised for their familiarity, will, at a future day, be regarded with much attention by the curious observer of the progress of society.

To Independence.

Cotton manufactures at Baltimore.—There are now running in Baltimore, or rather in the city and its vicinity, about 2,000 spindles, or 1,000 or 2,000 more go into operation before the first of January next, and from the works generally in great progress, there will be about 2,000 in the whole, by the end of the ensuing year. Three years ago we did not make a thread.

These works, on the average, will require 350,000 lb. of cotton per day, to keep them a going; and reckoning 300 days in the year, will consume, per annum, 1,050,000 lb. of cotton, rather more than one-eighth of the whole export of that article from the United States in the year 1805; when trade, in general, was nearly at its height; though the cultivation of that commodity has greatly increased since then.

This cotton will make about one million lbs. of yarn, which sells for an average price of 70 cents, equal to $700,000 per annum for the cotton, in its first state of improvement.

But this yarn will be wove into three millions of yards of cloth, worth on the average 45 cents per yard, making a final value of $1,620,000 per annum.

So much for the "devoted city." Besides, the Union Manufacturing company will commence the third mill, as soon as the building of the second is done; and begin to count upon the fourth. They have seats for sixteen mills in the space of a few hundred yards, to be turned by the Patuxent. Other works by other companies are contemplated.

We have also many valuable manufactories in the neighborhood, the property of which is in citizens of Baltimore, as well as several in the city. We shall at this time only notice a machine at Ellicott's mills that cuts (please to observe, I do not say will cut, but cuts) twelve hundred nails in one minute, more perfect than any heretofore furnished.

From the facts that have come to my knowledge (and though I am very curious about such things, I am convinced that I am not fully informed) I venture to say, that the domestic manufactures of cotton, wool, copper, brass, nails and glass, (ONLY SIX ARTICLES) appertaining to Baltimore, will give an ultimate value of more than two millions of dollars for the year 1815, without taking into calculation any other than those works now in operation or actually finishing or erecting; wresting that mighty sum immediately from the enemies of the United States. And much is done in a small way in making many other goods that three years ago were received from Great Britain, to the amount of, perhaps, $150,000 a year.

Verily, verily, these things will provoke a "Home Independence," and hasten the political millennium when we shall regard all nations as enemies or as friends, as they may behave themselves to us. In addition to these more weighty considerations, we exultingly make the remark, that every person engaged in these manufactures is rapidly adding to his wealth.

THE CHRONICLE.

Though the breed of Merino sheep is now very numerous in the United States, the great profits accruing on them, and the consequent desire of many to possess them, still keep them very high—68 full blooded ewes brought at New York, a few days ago, an average price of $127 98 each! the three fourth blooded ewes brought $26 28—the half blooded $10 59.

Stephen H. Moore, late captain of the Baltimore Volunteers, who lost his leg at York, where FIRE WAS KILLED, has received, (without application on his behalf) from the President of the United States, the office of collector of the revenue for the city and county of Baltimore. This prompt attention of the administration to a faithful soldier, has a happy aspect.

Hamburg is represented to be in a deplorable state, by the re-occupation of the French, against whom that city had, in kingly phrase, rebelled. The contribution has been excessively severe, and thousands of the people have been compelled to labor on the fortifications. The place has not, however, been committed to general plunder, rape and conflagration, as Cockburn would have seized Baltimore and Norfolk, and, indeed, as was desired in respect to the former, by some very charitable people of our own. Let us note to all tyrants and villains by the same measure. Suppose Bonaparte had burned Hamburg as Cockburn burned Havre-de-Grace, what would we say of it? The extent of the calamity could not alter its principle.

Amendment to the constitution proposed.—The following amendment to the constitution of the United States is proposed by the legislature of Tennessee:

Resolved by the general assembly of the state of Tennessee, That our senators in congress be instructed, and our representatives requested to use their best endeavors to prevail upon congress to propose to the several states, for their adoption, an amendment to the constitution of the United States, so as to reduce the term of service of the senators in congress from six to that of four years, from the time they enter upon the duties of their appointments.

Resolved, That the governor of this state be required to transmit to the executives of the different states, a copy of the resolution passed this general assembly relative to reducing the term of service of senators in congress from six to four years, with a request that the same be laid before the legislatures of their different states for their consideration.

There have been two riots in two of the eastern cities, which if they had happened in Baltimore, would have filled a thousand volumes in the newspapers.

The valuable prize of the Yankee, see last prize list, has been recaptured by the Ramilies, and sent to Halifax—as have also the barque of 10 guns, and the brig Telemachus. The Yankee, however, was as full of their most valuable goods as she could swim.

698. An American schooner, from one of the Eastern ports, laden with 700 barrels of flour, bound for Halifax, sent into New Bedford, by the Water Witch of Bristol, R. I.

The Shannon, a prize to the President frigate, has been recaptured.

The London papers give a doleful account of the proceedings of an American privateer off the mouth of the Tagus, [Portugal.] They report that she had captured thirty-two British vessels, many of them richly laden.

POSTSCRIPT.

We have at length some accounts from the Northern armies, that appear worthy of reliance. The New-York National Advocate mentions the receipt of a letter by the secretary at war (at Albany) from general Hampton, dated at Plattsburg on the 12th, which positively says he should join Wilkinson at Montreal, in two days, or sooner. The Albany Argus of the 16th, says that Wilkinson passed Prescott (about 80 miles below Kingston) on the night of the 6th inst. with the loss of 2 killed and 3 wounded.—He crossed into Canada, at Hamilton, (say 30 miles lower down) on the 8th, without opposition. The plan of the campaign is now fully developed, and we hope has effected all that we expected this season.—The skirmish between Hampton and sir George Prevost, so foolishly spoken of in the "general order" of the latter [see page 202,] was exactly what we have represented it to be; a something to divert the enemy. Our killed, wounded and missing in the affray was only 33; though from certain papers of Boston, it would have appeared, that sir George with his 300 had actually devoured the 8000 of Hampton, hardly suffering a "remnant to be saved." The united forces of Wilkinson and Hampton, who must have joined to act in concert on or before the 15th instant, would amount to about 15,000 men. Sufficient to beat sir George, and intercept the whole enemy force in the upper country. The British force near Montreal is stated to be 6 or 7000, regulars and militia.

"The cause of the army passing Prescott with so trivial a loss, (says the Argus) is stated to have been the following expedient adopted by the general: the old and damaged boats were collected, and in the early part of the night sent down the river with a bare sufficiency of men to conduct them; the enemy, mistaking them for the army, commenced a tremendous cannonade, and continued it till towards morning, when their fire ceased, and the troops passed down in safety."

A late London paper contains a regular account of the capture of the Macedonian frigate by the Tenedos; and states that we had 127 killed and wounded, but that the British loss was trifling!!

After announcing the victory, the same paper has the following paragraph—

"Division of the United States.—In addition to the above gratifying intelligence, we learn that the eastern states of America have, in the most unanimous manner, expressed their determination of seceding from their allegiance, unless the government make peace with England."

ALEXANDRIA, November 1.

Five!—We are sorry to state that on Friday night last, the draw house, belonging to the Washington Bridge, together with about two hundred feet of the bridge, was consumed by fire. This will occasion a very serious interruption to the travellers and waggons, of which there are a vast number daily passing north and south. The bridge we hope and expect it will speedily be refitted; as it has, since the war, made a handsome interest to the stockholders, besides creating a large surplus fund which the directors have prudently husbanded for exigencies.

The want of room, to get in as we wish, all the matter that presents itself for insertion, has induced the editor to resolve on an important proposal to be submitted to his readers next week.

GOVERNOR MITCHELL'S MESSAGE TO THE LEGISLATURE,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, GEORGIA,
Milledgeville, Nov. 1, 1813.

Fellow citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives.

The period at which you are now assembled is, in my opinion, the most important of any which has occurred since the establishment of our independence; engaged as we are in hostilities with a nation, the maritime resources and naval power of which has no parallel in the history of the world; and whose government is as base and corrupt as it is powerful. Accustomed to tyrannize over the ocean, and by her wealth and intrigue to keep one half of Europe cutting the throats of the other half, she flattered herself the United States would not dare to resist her unfounded claims to maritime supremacy. In this she no doubt derived encouragement, as well from the forbearance manifested by our republican administration, and their known and acknowledged aversion to war and bloodshed, which she mistook for timidity, as from a conviction of having a party sufficiently powerful in the United States to control the government if it dared to resist. This is known to every man who has attended to facts and passing events.

This haughty nation has however been mistaken, as well in the firmness, stability and energy of our own government, as in the power of the party she relied upon in this country to promote her views and oppose those of their own government. And here permit me to remark the contrast between the minority in the British parliament and the minority in congress. In the former they no sooner found that war was declared, than they united with ministers, and by an unanimous vote declared they would support the war with a view to obtain an honorable peace; in the latter our minority thought of nothing so much as how they were to embarrass the government, and by what means they could defeat their measures.—Unaccountable as the fact is, it is nevertheless true; it is no fiction, but established by the public proceedings of the British parliament, and the congress of the United States. How shameful for freemen to act thus! what! oppose their own government for resisting by force of arms those tyrannic acts of a corrupt and venal ministry, which had for their object, and if submitted to, must have resulted in placing the United States in a worse condition than they could be as colonies of the British crown.

It is not to be inferred that I admit, that because the minority in the British parliament pledged themselves to support the war until an honorable peace could be obtained, that the British ministry might not procure such a peace with our government; that is an object which has been, I venture to say, at all times within their reach. Our government has manifested an anxious desire of terminating hostilities by a peace honorable to both parties; and if the British cabinet had been as sincerely disposed for peace, the war would never have commenced, and either would it have continued to this day. But it is evident to the whole world, that peace is not the object of the enemy, unless accompanied by a surrender of those rights on our part which would entail infamy and disgrace upon us and our country forever. The policy of the minority in the British parliament is therefore the more remarkable, and makes the contrast between their conduct and the minority in congress the more striking, since our object has been uniformly before the war to preserve peace, and since to obtain it; the enemy has had no other object but to find pretexts for evading a compliance with our just demands, and provoking us by new aggressions, whilst professing a disposition to do justice. If the just principles on which the war was commenced were insufficient to produce equal unanimity amongst us to that which appears to have prevailed in the British parliament, can the minority not find in the conduct of the enemy at Hampton and elsewhere, motives sufficiently powerful to stimulate them to unite with the majority, and by a bold and manly effort to inflict merited chastisement upon the authors of such barbarous and brutal wrongs? I venture to pronounce, that he who cannot, and who at the same time claims to be an American, is a cold blooded traitor.

At the commencement of the present contest, our old revolutionary heroes had nearly all dropt off the stage of life; and from our long habits of peace, the handful of troops kept on our frontier, had afforded but little opportunity for the display of military genius. Our navy also was as it were in a state of infancy; yet with this handful of force, were we compelled in defence of our inestimable rights to encounter, as I have before observed, the most powerful and at the same time the most abandoned government that ever tyrannized over any country.

Notwithstanding this apparent disparity of force, yet with our numerous and brave population, and a country abounding in all the resources necessary either for offensive or defensive warfare, we cannot for a moment doubt of our final success. With a little experience in the art of war, which we are gaining daily, our officers and men will soon teach the British legions the difference between the energies of freemen fighting the battles of the republic, and mercenary slaves contending for injustice and oppression under the orders of a despot. But what shall be said of our navy! our infant navy! its achievements in a relative point of view are unparalleled in the history of any country upon the face of the globe. The enemy with his thousand ships of war was to boast but of two triumphs over it, whilst we can claim almost as many as we have ships. May we not hope that the late victory gained so gallantly by commodore Perry and his brave associates on Lake Erie, over a superior British fleet, and the command of Lake Ontario now obtained by the brave Chauncey, will lead to the accomplishment of those events which must ultimately compel the enemy to take peace upon honorable terms, or be driven from the continent? I think they will. Our army in the regions will now be able to act with better effect, and be enabled to see a safe, paid and instigated to scold and tomahawk not only our defenceless settlers on the frontiers but our unfortunate prisoners, will be checked and restrained.

Whilst we are engaged in a contest for the maintenance of those maritime rights, which as an independent nation we claim under the long established principles of general law, or law of nations, we are under peculiar obligation to render the homage of our gratitude and praise to a bountiful Providence for the plenty with which our country abounds in all things necessary for our comfort and convenience.—Our farmers and planters raise their own grain; their flocks and herds supply their own beef, bacon and lamb; and their wool and cotton are both fabricated by the industry of the family into cloth for domestic use. Not only so, but a considerable surplus remains, by the disposal of which, sugar and coffee, &c. which by long habit have become in some measure necessities of life, are procured. And, the same necessity continuing, we shall add to our independence by the culture of many articles which are at present supplied by importations from abroad. By the efforts of some enterprising individuals in the southern and eastern parts of our state, it has been demonstrated that the sugar cane can be cultivated with success; and our climate and soil are peculiarly well calculated for producing both wine and oil. Hence our independence of foreign supplies will be insured, and the American farmer and planter, and those of Georgia particularly, will stand erect, the most independent human beings upon the face of the earth under the restraints of civil society.

Happy for this state, she has been as yet exempt from those malign and scenes of outrage which have marked the progress of the enemy in other parts of the Union; but he and his savage allies to the north, have finally succeeded in changing the aspect of affairs on our Indian frontier. A large proportion of the Creek Indians are in a state of hostility against us. Some families were murdered near the mouth of Ohio in the course of the last summer, by a party of Indians passing from the Lakes to the Upper Creeks. The principal chiefs of the nation, on the application of the agent, determined to punish the murderers, by putting them to death, and a party of warriors was ordered to execute their determination.—This was no sooner done than the resentment of the friends of the murderers broke out in acts of open violence against all those who had been in any way concerned in causing the murderers to be put to death. From what has appeared since, it is, however, certain, that the Upper Creeks had secretly determined to take part with the northern Indians in the war against the United States, and that the circumstances before mentioned only produced a premature disclosure of their object. A considerable party among the Creeks, however, preserve their faith to our government, and from them and other sources, I have derived intelligence, from time to time, of the plans and movements of the hostile party. By the restrictions of the federal constitution, no state can without the consent of congress, “engage in war unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.” Hence it was some time after the discovery of a hostile intention on the part of the Creeks, before I could procure such information as would enable to act, restrained as the state is by the constitution.

At length on the 28th day of July last, I received a written communication from the chiefs who are at the head of the friendly part of the nation, and immediately thereafter, a letter from colonel Hawkins, as the agent of Indian affairs, announcing that the object of the hostile Indians was, in the first instance the destruction of the friendly ones, and finally, an attack upon us; and in colonel Hawkins’ letter it stated, that I should consider his communication as “authentic information of a meditated attack.”—Thus our situation was brought within the provisions of the constitution. In the mean time I wrote the secretary of war, stating the situation of the Indians, and the danger to which our frontier was exposed; but before my letter reached its destination, the general government with a promptness and decision that evince a vigilance and attention to duty which claim our warmest approbation, had anticipated our wants; and I received from the secretary of war a letter authorising the use of fifteen hundred militia from this state against the hostile Creeks. A general order was immediately issued for preparing the troops, and they were soon after marched to their late rendezvous on the Ockmulgee river. Circumstances which I deemed important, induced me to enlarge the number, to a full brigade, the command of which, according to established custom and military usage, was tendered to general John Stewart, as senior brigadier, who, from domestic considerations, declined; and brigadier-general John Floyd was then called upon as the next in seniority, who accepted and is now in command, and with the detachment: And I have the satisfaction of knowing, that the measures I have pursued, and the plan of organization I have adopted, have been approved by the president.

The hostility of the Creeks being unexpected by the government, they were in no state of preparation in this quarter for the equipment and supply of such a body of troops, which laid me under the necessity of providing for them, until the United States could have time to do so. For this purpose I advanced from the state funds appropriated for military disbursements, the sums necessary for the contractor and quarter-master’s department, every cent of which has been returned and is now in the treasury. This advance was indispensable, and occasioned by the necessity that existed for immediately marching the troops to the frontier, to quiet the fears of the people, and keep them from breaking up and leaving their homes; and their stay at their rendezvous has been occasioned by the difficulty of procuring the equipments necessary to supply the various wants of so numerous a detachment. In this respect, however, they are exclusively under the control of the general government and their movements regulated by their order. They have now entered the enemy’s country, and I trust under Divine Providence they will, aided by the co-operation of other detachments ordered upon the same service, soon subdue the faithless savages and compel them to unconditional submission. The supplies of ammunition which these hostile savages have received from the Spanish governor at Pensacola, for the avowed purpose of making war upon us, is a subject, the cognizance of which belongs to the United States; and it is to be hoped, that this secret enemy will no longer be permitted with impunity under his pretended neutrality, to put into the hands of our enemy the means of destroying us.

The quantity of ammunition which I have purchased under the provisions of the act of the last legislature has been considerable. Of powder there has been no difficulty in procuring the quantity required; but it has been more difficult to procure any considerable quantity of lead. A sufficiency has however been obtained for the use of the troops now in the field, and measures taken, which will insure the delivery of a large quantity more at this place, in all the present month.

In addition to the detachment now in the field, other cautionary measures for the safety of the frontier have been resorted to. Some small forts and block-houses have been built, and spies and scouts have been, and are at this time kept out: And although we have occasionally had false reports which have produced temporary alarm, the savages have not dared to approach our settlements; that they have not, has been occasioned, I have no doubt, by our attitude and readiness to punish them on the very first aggression.

Our sea-board has also been as yet exempt from annoyance by the enemy. The last legislature passed a resolution, authorising the executive to keep six companies of militia in the field, one in each county on the sea-board, but inasmuch, as I did not perceive the necessity for their service, and were to be kept at the expence of the state, and that expence would have exceeded the whole amount appropriated for military disbursements, in at least a three-fold degree, I declined calling them out. The result has justified my determination, and the funds of the state, and the lives of the men have been preserved for occasions of real danger. It is nevertheless my opinion that some precautionary measures are at this time necessary. The season has arrived and will continue for some time, which, in our climate, is the most favorable for the operations of a fleet; and as little as possible ought to be put to hazard.

The plan adopted in Savannah, the execution of which is committed to a committee of safety, of keeping vigilant and active persons employed with fast rowing boats at the mouths of the inlets, to give immediate notice upon the appearance of the enemy and thereby prevent surprise, is undoubtedly as good as any that, under existing circumstances, can be devised; but that alone is insufficient. A competent force ought to be ready to oppose the enemy on his first attempt to land. The most efficient for this purpose, next to that of river craft armed with heavy pieces of ordnance, I respectfully conceive, will be artillery. A battalion of this description of force, organized so as to be capable of rapid movements, and stationed at some convenient place near the sea-coast for the winter would be highly useful. They could be moved to some healthful situation in the interior during the summer and fall, or they might be permitted to return on furlough.

Whilst upon this subject, permit me to call your attention to the present state and condition of our militia. They are our great resource for defence until the arm of the union can be extended to our protection and support. Thirty years experience has taught us that our present plan for their instruction is altogether insufficient; and now that we are in a state of war, it is time to make an effort to profit by that experience. It is with diffidence that I venture to suggest a plan for our improvement in this particular, but so fully am I impressed with the necessity of it, that my diffidence has been overcome by a sense of public duty; and I have therefore prepared a short sketch which is submitted for your consideration in a separate document accompanying this communication.

The shares reserved for the state in stock in Planters' Bank of Savannah were subscribed for, and thirty thousand dollars of the amount paid before the first day of January last; and twenty thousand dollars more was paid to the same object before July following; which two sums make fifty per cent. of the whole amount of the stock reserved for the state, and is all that has yet been called for.

The present situation of our country requiring additional resources for carrying on the just and necessary war in which we are engaged, congress at their late session passed an act laying a direct tax, the proportion of which to Georgia is ninety-four thousand nine hundred and thirty-six dollars and forty-nine cents. The act imposing this tax contains a proposition, that the states, or either of them, may pay their respective proportions into the national treasury, and that, on doing so, they will "be entitled to a deduction of fifteen per centum if paid by the 10th of February next, and of ten per centum, if paid before the first day of March in the same year;" and to collect the amount in any manner they may think proper. Permit me to recommend the adoption of this proposition, and the passage of a law to give it effect. The state has at this time more than the amount in the treasury of the United States, and the difficulty which has already been experienced of transporting large sums without incurring considerable expense will be avoided, the state will gain considerably by the transfer, and the United States will have, what is of much importance, the immediate use of the money.

An abstract will be laid before you by the treasurer which will shew in a clear and explicit manner the present state of our finances: and I have pleasure in stating that they have as yet been amply sufficient for all our wants.

A proposition has been received from the state of North-Carolina for altering the federal constitution in those parts which provide for the manner of electing representatives in congress; and of appointing electors of president and vice-president of the United States, so that each state shall by its legislature be divided into a number of districts equal to the number of representatives and electors to which such state may be entitled, and I now submit it for your consideration.

A list of executive appointments made during the recess, and which are subject to legislative interference, is herewith submitted.

To the documents accompanying this communication, permit me to claim your most serious attention. They will more fully and clearly explain the transactions of the executive for the last political year, than could possibly be done by an address of this kind without going too much into detail. Upon examination I trust it will be found, that a strict adherence to duty and an honest intent to promote the best interests of this state, have at no time and under no circumstances been departed from. Having served the state as its governor for four years in succession, with slender talents it is true, but with a zeal inferior to no one's, and entertaining an opinion that in a government like ours, a rotation in office, particularly the executive, at reasonable intervals ought to prevail, I take the liberty to decline being considered as a candidate at the approaching election. I am well aware that the present moment is a very unfavorable one for a change, and I should have felt reluctance in making a determination to withdraw, if I had not at the same time felt assured that you had in your power to obtain the services of a gentleman, whose talents and integrity eminently qualify him for the station, and who is in the full enjoyment of the public confidence.

That the Almighty Ruler of the universe may protect and defend our beloved country; that he may bless them with peace, plenty and happiness, is the sincere prayer of your devoted fellow-citizen.

Vermont Militia.

BY HIS EXCELLENCY MARTIN CHITTENDEN, ESQ. GOVERNOR, CAPTAIN-GENERAL AND COMMANDER IN CHIEF, IN AND OVER THE STATE OF VERMONT, A DECLARATION.

Whereas, It appears that the third brigade of the third division of the militia of this state, has been ordered from our frontiers for the defence of a neighboring state;—And, whereas it further appears, to the extreme regret of the captain-general, that a part of the militia of said brigade have been placed under the command, and at the disposal of an officer of the United States, out of the jurisdiction or control of the executive of this state, and have been actually marched to the defence of a sister state, fully competent to all the purposes of self-defence, whereby an extensive section of our own frontier is left in a measure, unprotected, and the peaceable good citizens thereof, are put in great jeopardy, and exposed to the retaliatory incursions and ravages of an exasperated enemy: And whereas, disturbances of a very serious nature, are believed to exist, in consequence of a portion of the militia having been thus ordered out of the state:—

Therefore, To the end, that these great evils may be provided against, and, as far as may be, prevented for the future:

Be it known—That such portion of the militia of said third brigade, in said third division, as may be now doing duty, in the state of New-York, or elsewhere, beyond the limits of this state, both officers and men, are hereby ordered and directed by the captain-general and commander-in-chief of the militia of the state of Vermont, forthwith to return to the respective places of their usual residence, within the territorial limits of said brigade, and there to hold themselves in constant readiness to act, in obedience to the orders of brigadier-general Jacob Davis, who is appointed by the legislature of this state, to the command of said brigade.

And the said brigadier-general Davis, is hereby ordered and directed, forthwith, to see that the militia of his said brigade, be completely armed and equipped as the law directs, and holden in constant readiness to march on the shortest notice, to the defence of the frontiers—and in case of actual invasion, without further orders, to march with his said brigade, to act either in co-operation with the troops of the United States, or separately, as circumstances may require, in repelling the enemy from our territory, and in protecting the good citizens of this state from their ravages or hostile incursions.

And in case of an event, so seriously to be deprecated, it is hoped and expected, that every citizen without distinction of party, will fly at once to the nearest post of danger, and that the only rallying word will be—“Our Country.”

Feeling as the captain-general does, the weight of responsibility, which rests upon him with regard to the constitutional duties of the militia, and the sacred rights of our citizens to protection from this great class of the community, so essentially necessary in all these emergencies; at a moment too, when they are so imminently exposed to the dangers of hostile incursions, and domestic difficulties, he cannot conscientiously discharge the trust reposed in him by the voice of his fellow-citizens, and by the constitution of this and the United States, without an unequivocal declaration, that in his opinion, the military strength and resources of this state, must be reserved for its own defence and protection exclusively—excepting in cases provided for, by the constitution of the United States—and then, under orders derived only from the commander in chief.

Given under my hand at Montpelier, this 17th day of November, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, and of the independence of the United States, the thirty-eighth.

MARTIN CHITTENDEN.

By his excellency's command.

SAMUEL SWIFT, Sec'y.

Commodore Rodgers.

It is with uncommon pleasure we present to our readers the following “sketch of the character of commodore RODGERS,” from a literary work published at Boston, entitled the “Polygraph.” It does justice to the hated of the enemies of his country;—and, by a striking comparison, exhibits the fact, that “opportunity” is not always afforded even to the most deserving; who seek it with enthusiasm, and tempt all climates, conditions, and circumstances to find it.

This distinguished naval officer was born in the state of Maryland, and has followed the seas from his childhood; and is esteemed a consummate naval officer. To a strong understanding and vigorous constitution, this gentleman has added indomitable industry; and he is said to unite the theory, and the practice of his noble profession in a pre-eminent degree. Brave, decisive, ingenious, full of resource, this accomplished officer is looked up to by the younger officers, as to a great master. Without exercising any art to obtain popularity, he never fails to gain it; for men of business admire him as a man of business; while those who meet him in the ceremonious circles of polished life, are no less pleased with his modest, discreet and unassuming demeanor. We have never seen among us a naval officer of any nation, that more happily united the sailor and the gentleman, than commodore RODGERS.

When a member of congress, who had an high idea of the superior and matchless skill of the British, and but a very moderate opinion of the skill, enterprize, and bravery of his own countrymen, and was therefore discouraged and dismayed at the idea of our building a navy, asked, in a tone of despair—“if we had a fleet, where is the man among us who is fit for an admiral of it?”—the answer from all parts of the house was—“Commodore RODGERS.”

One or two events contributed to make this gentleman the subject of party remark; and the animadversions of a party, are never distinguished for justice, or liberality. Those among us, who were disposed to almost any concessions, for the sake of preserving peace, were not a little disturbed at the affair of the Little Belt, as they feared that haughty England would resent it in a style that would lead to war; and this led to disputes in the public prints, where truth and candor are not always regarded as they ought to be, amidst criminations and recriminations. The spirit of party rose high on the simple question of which ship fired first? and although the government of England conceded that point, there are not wanting people among us, who, to this day, accuse our commodore of giving the first shot: while others maintained that it was improper to chase any ship of war, while at peace with all the world. One thing ought, however, to be mentioned;—the officers of the President were ignorant of the size of the Little Belt. It was night; and they had never seen her broadside, and they supposed her to be a frigate; and although she gave the first fire, commodore RODGERS and all his officers were fired with regret, when they found next morning that they had poured such a destructive broadside into a vessel so little able to bear it. They have never ceased to express their regret at the consequences of it.

The same party spirit criticised the commodore for not taking the frigate Belvédere; but captain Byron, who commanded her, has held a different language, and pronounced his conduct to have been able and correct. The British frigate found the President passing upon her; she thereupon cast away her anchors, threw over her boats, and stove her water casks; and by this sacrifice, so lightened the ship as to out-sail the President. This was a prudent and justifiable conduct in the captain of the British frigate; but would have been reprehensible in commodore Rodgers; because his ship was fitted out for a long cruise; and such a procedure would have compelled him and his little squadron to return again to port. In this case, very serious damage was done to the Belvédere, by the singular precision of the President's fire. One of the President's bow-chasers burst, which killed several men, and broke the leg of the commodore; so that in every point of view, there could not be a shadow of blame cast upon commodore Rodgers for the escape of the Belvédere. Both commanders did their duty; and gave equal evidence of sound judgment and good conduct.

Some time period commodore Rodgers has never met an English frigate that was not in company of a seven or four; notwithstanding he has cruised in the European seas, and coasted the shores of Britain and Ireland. The President is known, and British frigates fly from her; and it is, we presume, the duty of the commander of that ship to turn aside from a seven or four of any nation. No frigate, no, even the President, the United States, or the renowned Constitution, can stand, many minutes, the point-blank fire of a ship of seven or four guns. Nautical science, and the laws of armistices have subjected this business to demonstration.

But luck and reputation almost always go together, and acquired reputation most commonly sinks for want of it; but some reputations are so well grounded in the public opinion, as to remain unshaken, and at the want of what we short-sighted mortals call, good fortune. Incidents to the life of admiral Nelson, and commodore Rodgers will illustrate this. Lord Nelson reversed first, the Mediterranean in search of the combined fleet of France and Spain; and then sailed across the Atlantic, down all the West India islands to Trinidad, then back again to Gibraltar; next he sailed along the bay of Biscay, and then pursued his course to the north-west of Ireland, without obtaining even a glimpse of this large fleet of France and Spain. People unacquainted with the boundless ocean, can hardly conceive how it is possible that such large fleets, spread over a space of oceans, can miss each other. But in judging thus, we measure the great world by our own narrow rules of prejudice. Nelson returned to London deeply chagrined at not being able to find the fleets of France and Spain. It is said to have affected visibly his lordship's spirits, until he found the partiality of the people towards him was unimpaired.

Luckily for Nelson, no serious untoward accident happened to his fleet during this chase after his enemies over half the world. Had any one of those thousand accidents befallen him, which Providence could not foresee, nor prescience guard against, so common on the unstable ocean, all Nelson's laurels might have been blasted by the tongue of malice; and he might have passed the shattered remains of a painful life, with a constitution worn out in the service of his country, neglected and forgotten by those who owed him the highest tribute; for in gratitude is a sin of monarchs, as well as republics; and the man who can despise it, possesses a quality superior to even heroism itself. The English have put to death some of their admirals for apparently trifling neglects; but here Lord Nelson's character was so firmly fixed in the minds of the government, and of the people, that his want of good fortune did not, in the least, shake it.

And as it happened with Nelson, so it happened with Rodgers. He has twice traversed over more than half the globe, without ever meeting a British frigate. He has sought them in their own seas, and along their own shores; but he never yet had the good fortune to bring one to action. And with all this, he suffers no diminution of reputation. It is to the credit of the American character to cherish and uphold the high reputation of a most meritorious officer, notwithstanding opportunities have not been given him to display his skill and prowess against an equal force of the enemy. It is with commendable Rodgers in America, as it was with Nelson in England, his reputation is so deeply grounded in the opinion of the people, that the want of good fortune has never shaken it. When the public first heard the brilliant achievement of the hero of Lake Erie, their applause was mixed with astonishment; because the young commander was unknown to fame, excepting in the small circle where lieutenant Perry was intimately known and justly estimated; but had it been Rodgers, the applause might have been as great, but the surprise less; because he occupies such a great space in the public estimation, that every one would have expected nothing less.

Commodore Rodgers is, we conjecture, between forty and forty-five years of age; a man of few words, and not conspicuous for the love of parade or dress; but his ship, for interior order, neatness, elegance and taste, may vie with any that floats on the ocean. It is said that his discipline is perfect; and this, perhaps, may account for the opinion, that he is distant and very reserved to those under him; but his reserve in company carries the air of the reserve of a studious man; without the least trait of haughtiness; for humanity and great attention to the care of the youth under his command, is a pleasing trait in this brave man's character. America! rest satisfied, and grateful that you have a son, who will bear your flag with honor and glory through every quarter of the world; but as "time and chance happeneth to all men," so it belongs not to mortals to command opportunity upon the land; much less upon the unstable ocean.²

TORPEDOES: From the Norfolk Herald.—Mr. Mix again—This gentleman who has devoted much of his time to the study of torpedo warfare, yesterday gave a convincing proof of the efficacy of his torpedoes in destroying a vessel of war, by an experiment upon the hull of an old ship of about 400 tons burthen, which lies stranded in two fathom water, on the Portsmouth shore. He dropped the torpedo into the water upon the flood tide, as nearly as he could judge 100 fathom below the ship, and payed out that length of line. Calculating by the velocity of the current in sweeping along a body of the size and weight of the torpedo, he jerked the line at the very moment it had floated under the stern of the ship, and it instantly exploded with a prodigious crash. The spray and smoke ascending in a huge column to the distance of 30 feet, while fragments of the wreck were scattered through the air in every direction, impressed a temporary awe upon the beholder. On examining the ship it was found that the torpedo had taken complete effect, having made an aperture in the side and bottom sufficiently large for a ship's yawl to row through and having blown up the deck beams, &c. Had the ship been afloat at the time, she must have been precipitated to the bottom in less than a minute. Dreadful indeed would be the havoc on board a man of war in such a situation; not a solitary being would be left alive to tell the tale.

²We attempt not to give any particular facts or occurrences relating to commodore Rodgers, at the earlier period of his life, because he is so well known, that they would be come rapid, and perhaps out of place. He was first lieutenant under commodore Truxton, and was then distinguished for a brave, discriminating, energetic mind, truly characteristic of him. It is this, which directed him amidst the perils of the ocean. It is this, which has outfitted Britannia's sails, to drive this envious rival of her proud navy from the ocean. But no; the Genius of Columbia surrounds him, and bears him triumphantly on the way; and has again conducted him in safety to her shores.

We have it from good authority, a line of torpedoes are prepared, and will immediately be sunk in the narrow channel below Craney Island, which will render it impossible for a vessel of tolerable burthen to pass through it without certain destruction.

The Greek ship Jerusalem, of 750 tons, has arrived at Brs on from Havana, with a mighty cargo of sugar and coffee, &c. This is, perhaps, the first Greek ship that has visited the United States, and we notice the arrival as one of the "events of the war."—She is, of course, under the Turkish flag.

The suite of commodore Perry, (now, perhaps, more properly called captain Perry, for he was only a master commandant when he fought the battle of Erie, since which he has been promoted, and has left the command of the squadron on his arrival at Newport, R. I. consisted of his brother, and the four sailors that rowed him from the Lawrence to the Niagara. It is said, "in passing from the Lawrence to the Niagara in an open boat, the gallant commodore stood up till he received two broadsides, and directed at his little barque from the enemy, and was then pulled down by the skirts of his coat, by the fabriked tars who accompanied him."

A letter to the editor of the Democratic Press, dated Sackett's Harbor, Nov. 13, has the following paragraph—"The British are badly off in Canada. An order was issued a few days ago directing the crops of last year to be beat out immediately. Commissioners were appointed to say how much of the crop was necessary for the family, on the most close calculation, the surplus to be given to the commissioners of the King, to be paid for at the rate of eleven dollars per barrel for flour, while his majesty's subjects in Kingston cannot get flour at thirty dollars!! What would a Pennsylvania farmer say to such treatment? The people are distressed for salt; I am told it has been sold as high as a dollar per quart. They have no salt works on the other side of the lake except a very small one at the head of the bay of Coney which yields them but trifling; before the war their supplies were derived from our waters. Since when they have to depend on supplies from Quebec. Our army at Montreal and their supplies must be cut off, not only in this, but very many other articles."

Vermont.—The strange proclamation of the governor of Vermont, see page (212.) has called to recollection the following extract from the correspondence of the famous John Henry with governor

Craig, of Canada. It is dated at Burlington, February 14, 1800—

"I learn that the governor of this state is now visiting the towns in the northern section of it; and makes no secret of his determination, as commander in chief of the militia, to refuse obedience to any command from the general government, which can tend to interrupt the good understanding that prevails between the citizens of Vermont and his majesty's subjects in Canada. It is further intimated, that in case of war, he will use his influence to preserve the state neutral, and resist, with all the force he can command, any attempt to make it a party. I need not add, that if these resolutions are carried into effect, the state of Vermont may be considered as an ally of Great Britain."

Miserable British expedient. Whatever may have been the opinion of some as to the political sentiments of the late Mr. Barlow, who died in the service of his country, its ambassador to France, he was universally regarded as an honest man; and history, faithful to science and patriotism, divested of the dirty passions which convert men into brutes, will record his worth in honor of the American name.

To prove the existence of a "French influence" in the United States, a stalking hobby that has been ridden to death by all the Englishmen—aye, by men who openly propose an alliance—a "holy league" with England—a wretched English printer at Salem, (Ms.) quotes a paragraph from a biographical sketch of the late Mr. BARLOW, by DEFOUR, of Nemours, a gentleman of science and one of the most estimable characters in France, to shew that Mr. Barlow was many years since nominated a "French citizen;" and, of course, that he must have been under the influence of France, at the time of his mission—but will the Christian reader believe, that this printer has neglected to say, that the same memoir, at the same time, and in the same manner, gives the same qualification to the "great Washington, and general Hamilton?" It nevertheless is true—Such is the horrible prostitution of the press. The following is an extract from the sketch alluded to, which shall be inserted at length when opportunity serves:

"To be in France at that period, and not sensibly affected by the revolution was a thing impossible for Mr. B; and while he admired the energy with which it was conducted, he was filled with detestation at the disorders it occasioned. He tried to soften its horrors, and compose the animosity of party by political pieces, for which he had the honor in return, of being nominated a French citizen, together with his countrymen, the great Washington, general Hamilton and sir James M'ckintosh."

A few days since a small sloop arrived at this port, ostensibly from Kennebunk, but it seems the officers of the custom-house had information that she was direct from Halifax; accordingly the sloop was taken into custody. On Wednesday night last, a smuggling gang went on board, tied two men by their legs, who had possession of her, and took her off, with a quantity of lute goods!

These things, astonishing as it may appear, now-a-days are passed over almost as matters of course. The smuggling trade was never carried to so high a pitch as at the present day. We should think by this time it would be advisable when a vessel is seized, to have her moored along side some of our public vessels, or have put on board her such an armed force as would be competent to put down such open, damnable violators of law. We hope measures have been taken (though we have heard of none) for their apprehension, for it is shameful that they should be suffered to roam at large and enjoy the fruits of their plunder. A PROCLAMATION.

An armistice having been concluded between the United States and the tribes of Indians called Miami, Potawatamies, Eel-river Miami, Weas, Ottoways, Chippeways, and Wyandots, to continue until the pleasure of the government of the former shall be known; I do hereby make known the same to all whom it may concern. The armistice is preparatory to a general council, to be held with these different tribes; and, until its termination, they have been permitted to retire to their hunting-grounds, and there to remain unmolested, if they behave themselves peaceably. They have surrendered into our hands hostages from each tribe; and have agreed immediately to restore all our prisoners in their possession, and unite with us in the chastisement of any Indians, who may commit any aggressions upon our frontiers. Under these circumstances, I exhort all citizens living upon the frontiers to respect the terms of said armistice, and neither to engage in nor countenance any expedition against their person or property; leaving to the government, with whom the constitution has left it, to pursue such course, with respect to the Indians, as they may think most compatible with sound policy and the best interests of the country.

Done at Detroit, this 16th October, 1813.

Wm. H. HARRISON.

By William Henry Harrison, major-general in the service of the United States, commander in chief of the north-western army, and Oliver Hazard Perry, captain in the navy, and commanding the fleet of the United States, on Lake Erie,

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, by the combined operations of the land and naval forces under our command, those of the enemy within the upper district of Upper Canada have been captured or destroyed, and the said district is now in the quiet possession of our troops: it becomes necessary to provide for its government:—Therefore, we do hereby proclaim and make known, that the rights and privileges of the inhabitants, and the laws and customs of the country, as they existed or were in force at the period of our arrival, shall continue to prevail. All magistrates and other civil officers are to resume the exercise of their functions; previously taking an oath to be faithful to the government of the United States, as long as they shall be in possession of the country. The authority of all militia commissions is suspended in said district, and the officers required to give their parole, in such way as the officer, who may be appointed by the commanding general to administer the government, shall direct.

The inhabitants of said district are promised protection to their persons and property, with the exception of those cases embraced by the proclamation of general Proctor, of the 11th ult. which is declared to be in force, and the powers therein assumed transferred to the officer appointed to administer the government.

Given under our hands and seals, at Sandwich, this 17th October 1813.

Navy Department, November 3, 1813.

Sir—No officer, or person in authority, civil or military, except the commanding military general, or the commanding naval officer, has any authority, under any pretext whatever, to have any communication with the enemy. You will therefore govern yourself accordingly, and prohibit all intercourse of a contrary nature. If the commanding general, or yourself, shall at any time send a flag to the enemy, you will order an officer and boat's crew to convey and receive dispatches, or make or receive any communication to or from the commanding general, or yourself; but none other than the officer and crew under your order must be permitted to attend the flag, or hold any communication with the enemy, except such officer as the commanding general may designate to bear his communication. All written or printed communications to or from the enemy, must be submitted to the inspection of commanding general or yourself: and, if approved, put under a sealed cover to or from the commanding general or yourself. If any other boat or person shall attempt to approach or hold any communication with the enemy, without the approbation of the commanding general, or yourself, you will arrest and detain such person or persons, together with the boat or craft in which they may have been detected, until the U. S. attorney for the district shall have an opportunity, upon your information, of proceeding against them according to law.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

W. JONES.

Copy of a letter from lieutenant-general Sir George Prevost, lieutenant-general and commander of the British forces in Canada, to major general Wilkinson, commander of the forces of the United States on the northern frontier.

Head Quarters, Montreal, 17th October, 1813.

Sir—Having transmitted to his majesty's government a copy of a letter addressed to me on the 31st of May last, by major-general Dearborn, in which it is stated that "the American commissary of prisoners in London, had made it known to his government that twenty-three soldiers of the 1st, 6th and 15th regiments of United States infantry made prisoners, had been sent to England and held in close confinement as British subjects, and that major-general Dearborn had received instructions from his government to put in close confinement twenty-three British soldiers to be kept as hostages for the safe-keeping and restoration in exchange of the soldiers of the U. States who had been sent as above stated to England, and that in obedience to those instructions general Dearborn had put twenty-three British soldiers in close confinement to be kept as hostages." I have now the honor of acquainting you, that I have received instructions from his majesty's government, distinctly to state to you, for the information of the government of the United States, that I have received the commands of his royal highness the prince regent, forthwith to put in close confinement forty-six American officers and non-commissioned officers, to be held as hostages for the safe-keeping of the twenty-three British soldiers stated to have been put in close confinement by order of the American government.

I have been directed at the same time to apprise you that if any of the said British soldiers shall suffer death by reason that any of the said soldiers of the United States now under confinement in England have been found guilty, and that the known law not only of Great Britain, but of every independent state under similar circumstances, has been in consequence executed; that I have been further instructed to select out of the American officers and non-commissioned officers whom I shall have put into confinement, as many as may double the number of the British soldiers who shall have been so unwarrantably put to death, and cause such officers and non-commissioned officers to suffer death immediately. I have been further instructed by his majesty's government to notify you, for the information of the government of the United States, that the commanders of his majesty's armies and fleets on the coasts of America have received instructions to prosecute the war with unmitigated severity, against all cities, towns and villages belonging to the United States, and against the inhabitants thereof, if after this communication shall have been to you, and a reasonable time given for its being transmitted to the government; that government shall unhappily not be deterred from putting to death any of the soldiers who now are or who may hereafter be kept as hostages for the purposes stated in the letter from major-general Dearborn.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your excellency's obedient humble servant,

(Signed) GEORGE PREVOST,

Lieutenant-general and commander of the forces.

His excellency major-general Wilkinson.

Extract of a letter from major-general Wilkinson to lieutenant-general sir George Prevost, dated Head Quarters, Grenadier Island, Nov. 1st, 1813.

"I yesterday evening had the honor to receive your letter of the 17th inst, and shall immediately transmit a copy of it to the executive of the United States.

"I forbear to animadvert on the acts of our superiors, whatever may be their tendency: but you must pardon me for taking exception to an expression in your letter. The government of the United States cannot be "DETERRED," by any considerations of life or death, of depredation or conflagration, from the faithful discharge of its duty to the American nation."

Quebec, November 2.—On Friday and Saturday were escorted by a detachment of major Bell's cavalry, from their quarters at Bonfort, to the new garrison, twenty-three American officers; and on the latter day were also taken from the prison-ships, and escorted by a detachment of the 103d regiment to the same prisons, a like number of non-commissioned officers, making in all forty-six, conformable to the general order of the 27th ultimo.

"BRITISH OFFICIALS."

FROM THE LONDON GAZETTE.

Admiralty office, August 14, 1813.

Dispatches, of which the following are copies, have been received at this office from admiral the right honorable sir John Borlase Warren, Bart. and K. B. commander in chief of his majesty's ships and vessels on the American and West India station, addressed to John Wilson Croker, esq.

San Domingo, Hampton Roads, Chesapeake, June 24, 1813.

Sir—I request you will inform their lordships, that from the information received of the enemy's fortifying Craney Island, and it being necessary to obtain possession of that place, to enable the light ships and vessels to proceed up the narrow channel towards Norfolk, to transport the troops over on that side, for them to attack the new fort and lines in the rear of which the Constellation frigate was anchored, I directed the troops under sir Sidney Beckwith to be landed upon the continent within the nearest point to that place, and a reinforcement of soldiers and marines from the ships; but upon approaching the island, from the extreme shoalness of the water on the sea side, and the difficulty of getting across from the land, as well as the island itself being fortified with a number of guns and men from the frigate and the militia, and flanked by 15 gun boats, I considered in consequence of the representation of the officer commanding the troops of the difficulty of their passing over from the land, that the persevering in the attempt would cost more men than the number with us would permit, as the other forts must have been stormed before the frigate and dock yard could be destroyed; I therefore ordered the troops to be re-embarked.

I am happy to say, the loss in the above affair (returns of which are enclosed) has not been considerable, and only two boats sunk.

I have to regret, that captain Hanchett, of his majesty's ship Darden, who volunteered his services, and led the division of boats with great gallantry, was severely wounded by a ball in the thigh.

The officers and men behaved with much bravery, and if it had been possible to have got at the enemy, I am persuaded would have soon gained the place.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN BORLAISE WARREN.

J. W. Croker, esq.

A general return of killed, wounded and missing in the affair near Craney Island, June 22, 1813.—Total—3 killed, 8 wounded, 52 missing.

SIDNEY BECKWITH, Q. M. Gen.

San Domingo, Hampton Roads.

Chesapeake, June 27, 1813.

Sir—I request you will inform their lordships that the enemy having a post at Hampton, defended by a considerable corps, commanding the communication between the upper part of the country and Norfolk; I considered it advisable, and with a view to cut off their resources, to direct it to be attacked by the troops composing the flying corps attached to this squadron; and having instructed rear-admiral Cockburn to conduct the naval part of the expedition, and placed captain Pechell with the Mohawk sloop and launches, as a covering force, under his orders, the troops were disembarked with the greatest zeal and alacrity.

Sir Sidney Beckwith, commanding the troops, having most ably attacked and defeated the enemy's force, and took their guns, colours and camp, I refer their lordships to the quarter-master general's report, (which is enclosed) and that will explain the gallantry and behaviour of the several officers and men employed upon this occasion, and I trust will entitle them to the favor of his royal highness the prince regent, and the approbation of the lords commissioners of the admiralty.

Sir Sidney Beckwith having reported to me that the defences of the town were entirely destroyed, and the enemy completely dispersed in the neighborhood, I ordered the troops to be re-embarked, which was performed with the utmost good order by the several officers of the squadron, under the orders of rear admiral Cockburn.

I have the honor to be, &c.

His majesty's ship San Domingo,

Hampton Roads, June 23, 1813.

Sir—I have the honor to report to you, that in compliance with your orders to attack the enemy in the town and camp at Hampton, the troops under my command were put into light sailing vessels and boats, during the night of the 25th instant, and by the excellent arrangements of rear admiral Cockburn, who was pleased in person to superintend the advance under lieutenant-colonel Napier, consisting of the 103d regiment, two companies of Canadian Chasseurs, three companies of marines from the squadron, with two six pounders from the royal marine artillery, were landed half an hour before day light the next morning, about two miles to the westward of the town, and the royal marine battalions under lieutenant-colonel Williams were brought on shore so expeditiously, that the colonel was speedily enabled to move forward.

With a view to turn the enemy's position our march was directed towards the great road, leading from the country into the rear of the town; whilst the troops moved off in this direction, rear admiral Cockburn, to engage the enemy's attention, ordered the armed launches and rocket boats to commence a fire upon their batteries: this succeeded so completely that the head of our advanced guard had cleared a wood and were already upon the enemy's flank before our approach was perceived; they then moved from their camp to their position in the rear of the town, and here they were vigorously attacked by lieutenant-colonel Napier, in the advance, unable to stand which, they continued their march to the rear of the town when a detachment under lieutenant-colonel Willous, conducted by captain Powell, assistant-quarter-master-general, pushed through the town and forced their way across a bridge of planks into the enemy's encampment, of which, and the batteries, immediate possession was gained. In the mean time some artillerymen stormed and took the enemy's remaining field piece.

Enclosed I have the honor to transmit a return of ordnance taken. Lieutenant-colonel Williams will have the honor of delivering to you a stand of colors of the 68th regiment, James city light infantry, and one of the 1st battalion of the 55th regiment. The exact numbers of the enemy it is difficult to ascertain.

From the woody country, and the strength of their position, our troops have sustained some loss; that of the enemy was very considerable; every exertion was made to collect the wounded Americans, who were attended by a surgeon of their own, and by the British surgeons, who performed amputations on such as required it, and afforded every assistance in their power.—The dead bodies of such as could be collected were also carefully buried.

I beg leave on this occasion, to express the obligations I owe to lieutenant-colonel Napier, and lieutenant-colonel Williams, for their kind assistance, to major Malcolm and captain Smith, and all the officers and men, whose zeal and spirited conduct entitled them to my best acknowledgments.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Return of ordnance stores taken in Hampton, on the 25th June, 1813.—4 twelve pounder guns, on travelling carriages; 3 six pounder guns on travelling carriages, with limbers, and a proportion of ammunition for each of the above calibres; three covered waggons and their horses.

A return of killed, wounded and missing at Hampton, 25th June, 1813. Total, 5 killed, 33 wounded, 10 missing.

[In the preceding, we have another evidence of what is due to British official accounts." The affair at Hampton was from 2,000 to 2,500 British against 549 infantry and riflemen, 62 artillery and 25 cavalry, the whole American force 639 men.—The knights' account of his loss is wilfully and hugely false, as, indeed, is the whole statement.]

MILITARY.

The Creeks.—It will be seen by the official statements below, that the war against the Creeks has commenced with a signal victory; a victory, that will, unquestionably, be followed with an entire overthrow of the ferocious and ungrateful barbarians. A very considerable force was collected at fort Stoddard, on the first of the present month, under brigadier-general Plowden. The Creeks, beholding the storm they had raised, were reported to have retired, or being about to retire into Florida, for protection from the Spaniards, who, to speak of them in the most favorable terms, have been the agents of the British in the horrid murders of these Indians. It is positively stated, that general Plowden will pursue them, go where they may; and, if the Spaniards are impotent enough to shelter them, that he will make a common cause against both. A case similar to this is alluded to in the speech of Tecumseh (see page 174). The British had excited the Indians to the former war; they were defeated by Wayne, at the Rapids of the Miami (see the map) and expected to have found shelter in the British fort—and they would have been protected, but for the energy of the general, who solemnly declared, if the British received them, that he would storm the fort and put every man to death. The British believed Wayne would do what he promised, and suffered their then secret allies to perish in the storm, as they had excited. Of this Tecumseh complains. Fort Stoddard is only 100 miles distant from Pensacola, and general Plowden's force is represented as strong enough for any possible opposition that all Florida can offer to the chastisement of the savages; and we hope and trust that it will be prosecuted to an extent that shall forever secure the frontier from the intrigues of the infamous Spaniards, who have sacrificed this people—a people for whom we had done more than justice, as well as all that humanity required, and who had not the semblance of a complaint to prefer against us.

It is stated that brigadier-general Williams has proceeded to the army at fort Stoddard. The energy of his character may be very useful in the course to be pursued.

From the Albany Juggs Letter, Nov. 14.

Colonel King of the army, arrived in town this morning, with despatches for the secretary of war. We have not seen the colonel, but we understand the most material facts brought by him are as follows:—

That the British garrisons of Kingston and Prescott (as soon as Montreal was known to be the object of an expedition) assembled and pushed on rapidly—their force about 2,000 men. They found means to overtake the rear of it (about 10:30) on the 11th inst, at a place opposite to the village of Hamilton, on the Canadaside, about 39 miles below Prescott. An action ensued, in which the enemy was driven back about half a mile. Here they rallied and took a position, their right upon the river, and their left covered by seven pieces of artillery. Three charges of the bayonet were made upon them, one of which, point to point, lasted ten minutes. The enemy was again broken, and our rear guard returned unmolested to its place in the line. Our loss is computed at 150 or 200; that of the enemy at double this number. Twelve of the enemy were taken, who state that most of the field and staff officers were killed or wounded. Of our army, general Covington is said to be mortally wounded—several field and platoon officers slightly so. General Boyd commanded in the affair.

[Another account says, that we took 185 prisoners. The Argus extra, from which the preceding is taken, reached Baltimore on Wednesday morning last; since when we have received nothing additional.]

GENERAL ORDERS.

Adjutant and Inspector General's Office, Washington, 17th November, 1813.

A general court-martial for the trial of brigadier-general William Hull will assemble at some suitable place in the city of Albany, (state of New-York) on the third day of January next.

The court will be composed as follows, viz.—

President.—Major-general Henry Dearborn.

Members.—Brigadier-generals Joseph Bloomfield; Thomas Parker; Leonard Covington. Colonels John R. Fenwick; Henry Carberry, 36th regt. inf.; Peter Little, 35th regt. inf.; Wm. N. Irvine, 42d regt. inf. Lieutenant-colonels Richard Dennis, 16th regt. inf.; Samuel S. Conner, 15th regt. inf.; S. B. Davis, 32d regt. inf.; William Scott, 36th regt. inf.; William Stearns, 38th regt. inf.

Special judge-advocate.—Alexander J. Dallas, esq. Supernumeraries.—Lieut. col. John W. Livingston, 41st regt. inf.; lieut. col. James G. Forbes, 42d do.; major George Bomford, corps of engineers.

By order of the secretary of war.

A. V. NICOLL, Inspector General.

NASHVILLE, November 9.

Camp at Ten Islands, Nov. 4th, 1813.

Gov. BLOUNT,—Sir, We have retaliated for the destruction of Fort Mims. On the 2nd, I detached general Coffee with a part of his brigade of cavalry and mounted riflemen, to destroy Tallushatches, where a considerable force of the hostile Creeks were concentrated. The general executed this in style. A hundred and eighty-six of the enemy were found dead on the field, and about eighty taken prisoners; forty of whom have been brought here. In the number left, there is a sufficiency but slightly wounded to take care of those who are badly.

I have to regret that five of my brave fellows have been killed, and about thirty wounded; some badly but none, I trust, mortally.

Both officers and men behaved with the utmost bravery and deliberation.

Captains Smith, Bradley and Winston were wounded all slightly. No officer is killed.

So soon as general Coffee makes his report I shall enclose it.

If we had sufficient supply of provisions, we should in a very short time accomplish the object of the expedition.

I have the honor to be with great respect, yours, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

P. S. Seventeen Cherokees under the command of colonel Brown, acted with great bravery in the action. Two of Chenubby's sons, and Jim Fife of the Natchez tribe, also distinguished themselves. One of the Creek prophets is killed.

Enclosed is general Coffee's report of the engagement.

ANDREW JACKSON.

This encloses gov. Blount.

Camp at Ten Islands, Nov. 4, 1813.

MAJOR-GENERAL JACKSON,—Sir, I had the honor yesterday, of transmitting you a short account of an engagement that took place between a detachment of about nine hundred men from my brigade, with the enemy at Tallushatches towns; the particulars whereof I beg leave herein to recite to you. Pursuant to your order of the 2nd, I detached from my brigade of cavalry and mounted riflemen, nine hundred men and officers, and proceeded directly to the Tallushatches towns, crossed Coosey river at the Fish-Dam ford, 3 or 4 miles above this place. I arrived within one and a half miles of the town (distant from this place south-east eight miles) on the morning of the third, at which place I divided my detachment into two columns the right composed of the cavalry commanded by colonel Alcorn, to cross over a large creek that lay between us and the towns, the left column was of the mounted riflemen under the command of col. Cannon, with whom I marched myself. Colonel Alcorn was ordered to march up on the right and encircle one half of the town, and at the same time the left would form a half circle on the left, and unite the head of the columns in front of the town; all of which was performed as I could wish. When I arrived in half a mile of the towns, the drums of the enemy began to beat, mingled with their savage yells, preparing for action. It was after sun-rise an hour; when the action was brought on by captain Hammond and lieutenant Patterson's companies, who had gone on within the circle of alignment for the purpose of drawing out the enemy from their buildings, which had the most happy effects. As soon as captain Hammond exhibited his front in view of the town, (which stood in open woodland) and gave a few scattering shot, the enemy formed and made a violent charge on him; he gave way as they advanced, until they met our right column; which gave them a general fire and then charged; this changed the direction of charge completely; the enemy retreated firing, until they got around and in their buildings, where they made all the resistance that an overpowered soldier could do; they fought as long as one existed, but their destruction was very soon completed; our men rushed up to the doors of the houses, and in a few minutes killed the last warrior of them; the enemy fought with savage fury, and met death with all its horrors, without shrieking or complaining, not one asked to be spared, but fought so long as they could stand or sit. In consequence of their flying to their houses and mixing with the families, our men in killing the males, without intention, killed and wounded a few of the squaws and children, which was regretted by every officer and soldier of the detachment, but which could not be avoided.

The number of the enemy killed was one hundred and eighty-six that were counted, and a number of others that were killed in the weeds not found. I think the calculation a reasonable one, to say two hundred of them were killed, and eighty-four prisoners of women and children, were taken; not one of the warriors escaped to carry the news, a circumstance unknown heretofore.

I lost five men killed and forty-one wounded, none mortally, the greater part slightly, a number with arrows; two of the men killed was with arrows; this appears to form a very principal part of the enemy's arms for warfare; every man having a bow with a bundle of arrows, which is used after the first fire with the gun, until a leisure time for loading offers.

It is with pleasure I say that our men acted with deliberation and firmness—notwithstanding our numbers were far superior to that of the enemy, it was a circumstance to us unknown, and from the parade of the enemy we had every reason to suppose them our equals in number, but there appeared no visible traces of alarm in any; but on the contrary all appeared cool and determined, and no doubt when they face 5 foe of their own or of a superior number they will show the same courage as on this occasion.

I have the honor to be very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

JNO COPPEE.

Brig. gen. of cavalry and riflemen.

Major gen. Andrew Jackson.

Killed, 5 privates.

Wounded, 4 captains—2 lieutenants—2 cornets—3 sergeants—5 corporals—1 artificer—24 privates.—Total killed and wounded 46.

A Raleigh (N. C.) paper says, that governor Ilwewkins has received a letter from major-general Pinckney, enclosing an extract of a despatch from the secretary of war, directing him to make all possible preparation on the southern coasts to repel an expected attack of the British; particularly at Savannah, Charleston and Wilmington.

The venerable Shelby, and many of his generous sons, have arrived at their homes in Kentucky. At a public dinner gave to this hero of the two wars, at Lexington, and some of his companions, the following, among other toasts were drunk:

The American republic—Its formation astonished, the maintenance of its rights by the sword will confound, the tyrants of the old world.

The war in which we are engaged—A war of civilization against barbarism; Heaven prospers the righteous.

Governor Shelby—His energy, zeal, magnanimous exertions from infancy to the present moment for the republic, entitle him to the eternal gratitude of his beloved country.

General Wilkinson—“Quid times? Cesarem relis”
Canada—once conquered, no consideration should induce us to surrender it to the enemy.

The heroes of the revolution, with Pike, Lawrence, Barrows and Allen, &c. were also gratefully remembered; nor were Harrison, Perry, Chauncey, Elliott, Johnson, and his mounted regiment, and Croghan, &c. forgotten.

NAVAL.

A letter from Sackett's Harbor gives a report that Sir George Prevost was about to discard Sir James J. Fco from the command of the British flotilla, and bestow it upon capt. Mulcaster of the Royal George, who is reported to be a very brave and skillful officer, and exceedingly opposed to the knight's system of manœuvring, alias running away. If this appointment is made, a very hard fight between the squadrons is expected.

Of the 96 wounded in the battle on Eric, (Sept. 10) only four had died, up to the 21st inst. All the rest had recovered but ten, and none of these were considered dangerous.

The enemy vessels remain off New-London as usual; and as yet Decatur “can't get out” Suppose the “mistress of the sea,” were to blockade that harbor with two frigates and a sloop of war, the force of our squadron?—Is John Bull afraid? It used to be that a British vessel should beat any other vessel of her class, and the lords of the admiralty would have despised themselves for holding frigates in check by seventy furs. But tempora mutantur!

A 74, guarding a frigate, is also on the watch for commodore Rodgers.

BLOCKADE OF THE CHESAPEAKE.

The enemy squadron that has been off and in the Potomac, went down the bay on the 10th inst. Like the locusts of Asia, they have left nothing but desolation wherever they have touched, burning and destroying every thing. Such barbarisms were never before heard of among a people pretending to civilization. It were well that the wretches who speak of the “magnanimity” of the English Hinnebagees, had a fair experiment of its worth. On St. George's island they destroyed every thing that could be destroyed, setting fire to the fences, woods, and fields, and breaking to pieces such things as the fire would not consume. The following instance of the desperate bravery of the base villains, deserves a record.

“A party in three boats or barges landed on the main, at the house of one J. C. Drury, who lived on a point near the island, robbed him of a barrel of herrings, a piece of cloth that was in the loom (which was every thing left in the house) all his cabbage, and the only milch cow he had, and a well grown yearling. The family had been repeatedly fired upon and were driven from the house, the opposite point of the island being only 200 yards distant. A singular instance of British gallantry was manifested towards this man's daughter, a young woman; she had gone down to the shore to look for her brother, when one of the English on the island waded up to his waist on the end of the point to get a shot at her, and actually fired twice at her whilst she was on the beach and the balls hit close to her.”

They have stolen a great many negroes. Some deserters who have got a shore, tell horrible tales of the miserable black women that have been taken on board the vessels of the “Defender of the Faith.”

The demand was not complied with, and some shot were exchanged between that vessel and the fort, without apparent injury to either. The Eliza Ann was captured by the Timothy Pickering.

Royal Affairs.

One of our newspapers, sometime ago, had the following paragraph:

“Messrs. Herm Friese, Replie Buschen, Herm Henry Nulleans, and Gird Burns, citizens of Bremen, were INHUMANLY MURDERED, a few months since, by orders of a FRENCH court martial, for the exercise of that first right of man, resistance to tyranny.”

May heaven forgive me, if I inadvertently say one word in favor of Bonaparte, except in a comparison with other emperors and kings, unless his conduct is essentially changed—for though he may be the best of the European tyrants (or kings, and the terms are synonymous) he is a tyrant, and I feel it my duty, as a friend of freedom to denounce him. I have borne this testimony from my childhood against kingcraft; and until I know that angels have descended from the paradise of God to fill the mortal seat of royalty, I must presume that seat is filled by a knave, or a machine for knaves; having like effect, except that the former is less productive of misery to the people than the latter, and should be preferred in a choice of evils.

I, therefore, agree with the writer of the paragraph in condemning the proceedings of the French court-martial at Bremen; but, it is due to truth to say, that Bremen was as much a part of France as Ireland is of “the united kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland”—that the possession was had and held in the same way, in regard to both; i. e. by conquest.

and the force of arms—and that Bremen having, in royal cant, “rebelled,” four of her citizens were “murdered?” by the French government, as forty thousand Irishmen had been “murdered” by the British; and for the like pretence, but generally, with less ceremony.

Let me ask this writer, if his heart was inclined to pity and his tongue pointed to reprobate, when Orr, Tone and Fitzgerald, and their hosts of companions, were “murdered” by the British, through hired perjured witnesses, and courts of law pre-ordered to condemn? Did he feel the sacrifice of lofty Emmet, who on the threshold of his grave, taught fear and trembling to the emirred villain? Does his blood boil at a recollection of the cold murders of Glencoe and Culloden? DARE he reprehend England as he reprehends France, and speak of every scoundrel government as it deserves? He dares not—but, on the contrary, would talk about the morality, the religion and the magnanimity of the former; and propose a “holy league” between the United States and her government!

But we need not travel to Germany for cases of citizens murdered “for exercising the first right of man, resistance to tyranny,” and we beseech him to read, attentively, the following extracts from colonel Ethan Allen’s memoirs, and remind himself of the tens of thousands of AMERICANS, for that cause, more cruelly destroyed, than were the four citizens of Bremen. Let our first sympathies be for our-elves and our own people; when they are delivered from the same foe that colonel Allen describes, now more refined in his cruelties and more desperately wicked, may the gentleman concern himself as much as he pleases for the “Deliverance of Europe,” unnoticed by the editor of the Register.

“I next invite the reader to a retrospective sight and consideration of the doleful scene of inhumanity exercised by general Sir William Howe, and the army under his command, towards the prisoners taken on Long-Island, on the 27th day of August, 1776; sundry of whom were, in an inhuman and barbarous manner, murdered after they had surrendered their arms; particularly a general Odell, or Woodhul, of the militia, who was hacked to pieces with cutlasses, when alive, by the light horse men; and a captain Fellows, of the continental army, who was thrust through with a bayonet, of which wound he died instantly. Sundry others were hanged up by the neck till they were dead. The private soldiers who were brought to New York, were crowded into churches, and environed with slavish Hessian guards, a people of a strange language, who were sent to America for no other design but cruelty and desolation; and at others, by merciless Britons, whose mode of communicating ideas being intelligible in this country, served only to tantalize and insult the helpless and perishing. I have gone to the churches, and seen sundry of the prisoners in the agonies of death, in consequence of very hunger; and others speechless, and near death, biting pieces of chips; others pleading for God’s sake for something to eat, and at the same time shivering with the cold. Hollow groans saluted my ears, and despair seemed to be imprinted on every one of their countenances. The filth in these churches, in consequence of the fluxes, was almost beyond description. The floors were covered. I have carefully sought to direct my steps so as to avoid it, but could not. They would beg for God’s sake for one copper, or morsel of bread.—I have seen in one of these churches seven dead, at the same time, lying among the filth of the place. I was persuaded that this was a premeditated and systematic plan of the British council, to destroy the youth of our land, with a view thereby to deter the country, and make it submit to their despotism.—Mortality raged to such an intolerable degree among the prisoners, that the very school boys in the streets knew the menal design of it in some measure; at least, they knew they were STARVED TO DEATH. Some poor women contributed to their necessity, till their children were almost starved, and all persons of common understanding knew that they were devoted to the cruellest and worst of deaths. Upon the best calculations I have been able to make from personal knowledge, and the many evidences I have collected in support of the facts, I learn that, of the prisoners taken on Long Island, fort Washington, and some few others, at different times and places, about TWO THOUSAND perished with hunger, cold and sickness, occasioned by the filth of their prisons at New York, and a number more on their passage to the continental lines; most of the residue, who reached their friends, having received their death wounds, could not be restored by the assistance of physicians and friends; but, like their brother prisoners, fell a sacrifice to the relentless and scientific barbarity of Britain.”

THE CHRONICLE.

Peter Early, a well-known “republican” character of Georgia, has been elected governor of that state, by the legislature now in session.

William H. Bibb, now a representative in congress from Georgia, has been elected to a seat in the senate of the United States, vice William H. Crawford, minister to France.

New-York city election. The warmest contest, perhaps ever known in New-York for the choice of “charter officers” came on last week, and terminated in the gain of the “republicans.” Last year six wards were “federal,” and four were “republican”—they are now equally divided, and one of the “federal” wards was saved by a single vote and another by only 15—so that there will be a political tie in the legislative branch of the city police. But from the votes given, it is calculated that Mr. Benson (ed.) who has resigned his seat in congress, will be succeeded by a republican with a considerable majority. The elect on is to be held next month.

On the 21 and 23 of May last, lord Sumerville, of Coburn, England, made sail of between two and three hundred muricines. They brought on the average, about 65 sterling each.

Progress of truth—The inquisition at Goa was abolished in October, 1812; and it is now thrown open to public inspection, with all its cells, secret chambers, &c.

APPOIGNMENT. If in the matter or manner of the present number, any want of the usual attention should appear, the editor requests that it may be attributed to a temporary indisposition which, (with gratitude be it spoken) for the first time in his memory, prevented him, for more than two days, from his usual pursuits. But since the last publication, he has been nearly denied the use of his right arm by a rheumatic affection, attended with the usual pain, which now appears happily relieved.—The preceding may account for certain omissions in the present number.

Mr. Hamilton’s luminous report will be concluded next week; when we shall commence a record of Mr. Giles’ letters to the people of Virginia, on the proposed mission to Sweden, and appointment of Mr. Gallatin, a minister under the French mediation, &c. which were rejected in the senate.

Hamilton's Report.

The secretary of the treasury, in obedience to the order of the house of representatives of the 15th of January, 1791, has applied his attention as early as possible to his other duties would permit, to the subject of manufactures; and particularly to the means of promoting such as will tend to render the United States independent on foreign nations, for military and other essential supplies: and he thereupon respectfully submits the following report:

It is certain, at least, that such taxes are particularly inimical to the success of manufacturing industry, and ought carefully to be avoided by a government, which desires to promote it.

The great copiousness of the subject of this report has insensibly led to a more lengthily preliminary discussion, than was originally contemplated or intended. It appeared proper to investigate principles, to consider objections, and to endeavor to establish the utility of the thing proposed to be encouraged previous to the specification of the objects which might occur, as meriting or requiring encouragement, and of the measures which might be proper in respect to each. The first purpose having been fulfilled, it remains to pursue the second.

In the selection of objects, five circumstances seem entitled to particular attention: the capacity of the country to furnish the raw material—the degree, in which the nature of the manufacture admits of a substitute for manual labor in machinery—the facility of execution—the extensiveness of the uses to which the article can be applied—its subserviency to other interests, particularly the great one of national defence. There are, however, objects, to which these circumstances are little applicable, which, for some special reasons, may have a claim to encouragement.

A description of the principal raw material, of which each manufacture is composed, will serve to introduce the remarks upon it. As in the first place, IRON. The manufactures of this article are entitled to pre-eminent rank—none are more essential in their kinds, nor so extensive in their uses. They constitute, in whole, or in part, the implements or the materials, or both, of almost every useful occupation. Their instrumentality is every where conspicuous.

It is fortunate for the United States, that they have peculiar advantages for deriving the full benefit of this most valuable material, and they have every motive to improve it, with systematic care. It is to be found in various parts of the United States, in great abundance, and of almost every quality, and fuel, the chief instrument in manufacturing it, is both cheap and plenty. This particularly applies to charcoal; but there are productive coal mines already in operation, and strong indications, that the material is to be found in abundance, in a variety of other places.

The enquiries, to which the subject of this report has led, have been answered with proofs, that manufactures of iron, though generally understood to be extensive, are far more so than is commonly supposed. The kind, in which the greatest progress has been made, have been mentioned in another place, and need not be repeated; but there is little doubt that every other kind, with due cultivation, will rapidly succeed. It is worthy of remark, that several of the particular trades, of which it is the basis, are capable of being carried on without the aid of large capitals.

Iron works have very greatly increased in the United States, and are prosecuted with much more advantage than formerly. The average price, before the revolution, was about sixty-four dollars per ton; at present it is about eighty; a rise which is chiefly to be attributed to the increase of manufactures of the material.

The still further extension and multiplication of such manufactures will have the double effect of promoting the extraction of the metal itself, and of converting it to a greater number of profitable purposes.

Those manufactures too unite in a greater degree, than almost any others, the several requisites which have been mentioned, as proper to be consulted in the selection of objects.

The only further encouragement of manufactures of this article, the propriety of which may be considered as unquestionable, seems to be an increase of the duties on foreign rival commodities.

Steel is a branch, which has already made a considerable progress, and it is ascertained, that some new enterprises, on a more extensive scale, have been lately set on foot. The facility of carrying it to an extent, which will supply all internal demands, and furnish a considerable surplus for exportation, cannot be doubted. The duty upon the importation of this article, which is at present seventy-five cents per cwt. may, it is conceived, be safely and advantageously extended to one hundred cents. It is desirable by decisive arrangements, to second the efforts, which are making in so very valuable a branch.

The United States already in a great measure supply themselves with nails and spikes. They are able, and ought certainly to do it entirely. The first and most laborious operation, in this manufacture, is performed by water-mills; and of the persons afterwards employed, a great proportion are boys, whose early habits of industry are of importance to the community; to the present support of their families, and to their own future comfort. It is not less curious than true, than in certain parts of the country, the making of nails is an occasional family manufacture.

The expediency of an additional duty on these articles, is indicated by an important fact. About 1,350,000 pounds of them were imported into the United States, in the course of a year, ending the thirtieth of September, 1791. A duty of two cents per pound would, it is presumable, speedily put an end to so considerable an importation. And it is in every view proper that an end should be put to it.

The manufacture of these articles, like that of some others, suffers from the carelessness and dishonesty of a part of those who carry it on. An inspection, in certain cases, might tend to correct the evil. It will deserve consideration, whether a regulation of this sort cannot be applied, without inconvenience, to the exportation of the articles either to foreign countries, or from one state to another.

The implements of husbandry are made in several states in great abundance. In many places it is done by the common blacksmiths. And there is no doubt that an ample supply for the whole country can with great ease be procured among ourselves.

Various kinds of edged tools for the use of mechanics, are also made, and a considerable quantity of hollow wares; though the business of castings has not yet attained the perfection which might be wished. It is, however, improving, and as there are respectable capitals in good hands, embarked in the prosecution of these branches of iron manufactures, which are yet in their infancy, they may all be contemplated as of tools not difficult to be acquired.

To insure the end, it seems equally safe and prudent to extend the duty, and to demand upon all manufactures of iron, or of which iron is the article of chief value, to ten per cent.

Fire arms and other military weapons may, it is conceived, be placed without inconvenience in the class of articles, rated at fifteen per cent. There exist already manufactories of these articles, which only require the stimulus of a certain demand, to render them adequate to the supply of the United States.

It would also be a material aid to manufactories of this nature, as well as a mean of public security, if provision should be made for an annual purchase of military weapons of home manufacture, to a certain determinate extent, in order to the formation of arsenals; and to replace, from time to time, such as should be withdrawn for use, so as always to have in store the quantity of each kind, which should be deemed a competent supply.

But it may hereafter deserve legislative consideration, whether manufactories of all the necessary weapons of war ought not to be established, on account of government itself. Such establishments are agreeable to the usual practice of nations; and that practice seems founded on sufficient reason.

There appears to be an improvidence in leaving these essential instruments of national defence to the casual speculations of individual adventure; a resource which can less be relied upon, in this case, than in most others; the articles in question not being objects of ordinary and indispensable private consumption or use. As a general rule, manufactories on the immediate account of government are to be avoided; but this seems to be one of the few exceptions, which that rule admits, depending on very special reasons.

Manufactures of steel, generally, or which steel is the article of chief value, may with advantage be placed in the class of goods rated at seven and an half per cent. As manufactures of this kind have not yet made any considerable progress, it is a reason for not rating them as high as those of iron; but as this material is the basis of them, and as their extension is not less practicable, than important, it is desirable to promote it by a somewhat higher duty than the present.

A question arises, how far it might be expedient to permit the importation of iron in pigs and bars, free from duty. It would certainly be favorable to manufacturers of the article; but the doubt is, whether it might not interfere with its production.

Two circumstances, however, abate, if they do not remove, apprehension on this score; one is, the considerable increase of price, which has been already remarked, and which renders it probable, that the free admission of foreign iron would not be inconsistent with an adequate profit to the proprietors of iron works; the other is, the augmentation of demand, which would be likely to attend the increase of manufactures of the article, in consequence of the additional encouragements proposed to be given. But caution, nevertheless, in a matter of this kind, is most advisable. The measure suggested ought, perhaps, rather to be contemplated, subject to the lights of further experience, than immediately adopted.

COPPER. The manufactures, of which this article is susceptible, are also of great extent and utility. Under this description, those of brass, of which it is the principal ingredient, are intended to be included.

The material is a natural production of the country. Mines of copper have actually been wrought, and with profit to the undertakers, though it is not known that they are now in this condition. And nothing is easier, than the introduction of it, from other countries, on moderate terms, and in great plenty.

Coppersmiths and brassfounders, particularly the former, are numerous in the United States: some of whom carry on business to a respectable extent.

To multiply and extend manufactories of the materials in question, is worthy of attention and effort. In order to this, it is desirable to facilitate a plentiful supply of the materials. And a proper mean to this end is to place them in the class of free articles. Copper in plates, and brass, are already in this predicament: but copper in pigs and bars is not; neither is lapis calaminaris, which together with copper and charcoal, constitute the component ingredients of brass. The exemption from duty, by parity of reason, ought to embrace all such of these articles, as are objects of importation.

An additional duty on brass wares, will tend to the general end in view. These now stand at five per cent. while those of tin, pewter and copper, are rated at seven and an half. There appears to be a propriety, in every view, in placing brass wares upon the same level with them: and it merits consideration, whether the duty upon all of them ought not to be raised to ten per cent.

LEAD. There are numerous proofs, that this material abounds in the United States, and requires little to unfold it to an extent, more than equal to every domestic occasion. A prolific mine of it has long been open in the south-western parts of Virginia, and, under a public administration, during the late war, yielded a considerable supply for military use. This is now in the hands of individuals, who not only carry it on with spirit, but have established manufactories of it, at Richmond, in the same state.

The duties, already laid upon the importation of this article, either in its unmanufactured or manufactured state, insure it a decisive advantage in the home market—which amounts to considerable encouragement. If the duty on pewter wares should be raised, it would afford a further encouragement. Nothing else occurs as proper to be added.

FOSSIL COAL. This, as an important instrument of manufactures, may, without impropriety, be mentioned among the subjects of this report.

A copious supply of it would be of great consequence to the iron branch: as an article of household fuel, also, it is an interesting production, the utility of which must increase in proportion to the decrease of wood, by the progress of settlement and cultivation. And its importance to navigation, as an immense article of transportation coast-wise, is signally exemplified in Great Britain.

It is known that there are several coal mines in Virginia, now worked, and appearances of their existence are familiar in a number of places.

The expediency of a bounty on all this species of coal of home production, and of premiums on the opening of new mines, under certain qualifications, appears to be worthy of particular examination. The great importance of the article will amply justify a reasonable expense in this way if it shall appear to be necessary to, and shall be thought likely to answer the end.

WOOD. Several manufactures of this article flourish in the United States. Ships are no where built in greater perfection; and cabinet wares, generally, are made little, if at all, inferior to those of Europe. Their extent is such as to have admitted of considerable exportation.

An exemption from duty, of the several kinds of wood ordinarily used in these manufactures, seems to be all that is requisite, by way of encouragement. It is recommended by the consideration of a similar policy being pursued in other countries, and by the expediency of giving equal advantages to our own workmen in wood. The abundance of timber proper for ship building in the United States, does not appear to be any objection to it. The increasing scarcity and growing importance of that article, in the European countries, admonish the United States to commerce, and systematically to pursue measures for the preservation of their stock. Whatever may promote the regular establishment of magazines of ship timber, is in various views desirable.

SKINS. There are scarcely any manufactures of greater importance, than of this article. Their direct and very happy influence upon agriculture, by promoting the raising of cattle of different kinds, is a very material recommendation.

It is pleasing, too, to observe the extensive progress they have made in their principal branches; which are so far matured as almost to defy foreign competition. Tanneries, in particular, are not only carried on as a regular business, in numerous instances, and in various parts of the country; but they constitute in some places a valuable item of incidental family manufactures.

Representations, however, have been made, importing the expediency of further encouragement to the leather branch in two ways; one, by increasing the duty on the manufactures of it, which are imported; the other, by prohibiting the exportation of bark. In support of the latter, it is alleged, that the price of bark, chiefly in consequence of large exportations, has risen within a few years, from about three dollars to four dollars and a half per cord.

These suggestions are submitted rather as intimations, which merit consideration, than as matters, the propriety of which is manifest. It is not clear, that an increase of duty is necessary; and in regard to the prohibition desired, there is no evidence of any considerable exportation hitherto; and it is most probable, that whatever augmentation of price may have taken place is to be attributed to an extension of the home demand from the increase of manufactures, and to a decrease of the supply, in consequence of the progress of settlement, rather than to the quantities which have been exported.

It is mentioned, however, as an additional reason for the prohibition, that one species of the bark, usually exported, is in some sort peculiar to the country, and the material of a very valuable dye, of great use in some other manufactures, in which the United States have begun a competition.

There may also be this argument in favor of an increase of duty. The object is of importance enough to claim decisive encouragement; and the progress which has been made, leaves no room to apprehend any inconvenience, on the score of supply, from such an increase.

It would be a benefit to this branch, if glue, which is now rated at five per cent. were made the object of an excluding duty. It is already made in large quantities at various tanneries; and, like paper, is an entire economy of materials, which if not manufactured, would be left to perish. It may be placed with advantage in the class of articles paying fifteen per cent.

GRAIN. Manufactures of the several species of this article have a title to peculiar favor; not only because they are most of them immediately connected with the subsistence of the citizens, but because they enlarge the demand for the most precious products of the soil.

Though flour may, with propriety, be noticed as a manufacture of grain, it were useless to do it, but for the purpose of submitting the expediency of a general system of inspection throughout the ports of the United States, which, if established upon proper principles, would be likely to improve the quality of our flour every where, and to raise its reputation in foreign markets. There are, however, considerations which stand in the way of such an arrangement.

Ardent spirits and malt liquors are, next to flour, the two principal manufactures of grain. The first has made a very extensive, the last a considerable progress in the United States. In respect to both, an exclusive possession of the home market ought to be secured to the domestic manufactures, as fast as circumstances will admit. Nothing is more practicable and nothing more desirable.

The existing laws of the United States have done much towards attaining this valuable object: but some additions to the present duties, on foreign distilled spirits, and foreign malt liquors, and perhaps an abatement of those on home made spirits, would more effectually secure it: and there does not occur any very weighty objection to either.

An augmentation of the duties on imported spirits would favor as well the distillation of spirits from molasses, as that from grain. And to secure to the nation, the benefit of a manufacture, even of foreign materials, is always of great, though perhaps of secondary importance.

A strong impression prevails in the minds of those concerned in distilleries (including, too, the most candid and enlightened) that greater differences in the rates of duty on foreign and domestic spirits are necessary, completely to secure the successful manufacture of the latter: and there are facts which entitle this impression to attention.

It is known, that the price of molasses for some years past, has been successively rising in the West India markets, owing partly to a competition which did not formerly exist, and partly to an extension of demand in this country; and it is evident, that the late disturbances in those islands, from which we draw our principal supply, must so far interfere with the production of the article, as to occasion a material enhancement of price. The destruction and devastation attendant on the insurrection in Hispaniola in particular, must not only contribute very much to that effect, but may be expected to give it some duration. These circumstances, and the duty of three cents per gallon on molasses, may render it difficult for the distillers of that material to maintain, with adequate profit, a competition, with the rum brought from the West Indies, the quality of which is so considerably superior.

The consumption of geneva, or gin, in this country, is extensive. It is not long since distilleries of it have grown up among us to any importance. They are now becoming of consequence: but being still in their infancy they require protection.

It is represented, that the price of some of the materials is greater here than in Holland, from which place large quantities are brought—the price of labor considerably greater—the capitals engaged in the business there much larger than those which are employed here—the rate of profits, at which the undertakers can afford to carry it on, much less—the prejudices, in favor of imported gin, strong. These circumstances are alleged to outweigh the charges, which attend the bringing of the article from Europe to the United States, and the present difference of duty, so as to obstruct the prosecution of the manufacture, with due advantage.

Experiment could, perhaps, alone decide with certainty the justice of the suggestions which are made: but in relation to branches of manufacture so important, it would seem inexpedient to hazard an unfavorable issue, and better to err on the side of too great, than of too small a difference, in the particular in question.

It is therefore submitted, that an addition of two cents per gallon be made to the duty on imported spirits, of the first class of proof, with a proportionable increase on those of higher proof; and that a deduction of one cent per gallon be made from the duty on spirits distilled within the United States, beginning with the first class of proof, and a proportionable deduction from the duty on those of higher proof.

It is ascertained, that by far the greatest part of the malt liquors consumed in the United States are the produce of domestic brewers. It is desirable, and, in all likelihood, attainable, that the whole consumption should be supplied by ourselves.

The malt liquors, made at home, though inferior to the best, are equal to a great part of those which have been usually imported. The progress already made is an earnest of what may be accomplished. The growing competition is an assurance of improvement. This will be accelerated by measures, tending to invite a great capital into this channel of employment.

To render this encouragement of domestic breweries decisive, it may be advantageously to substitute, to the present rates of duty, eight cents per gallon generally; and it will deserve to be considered as a guard against evasions, whether there ought not to be a prohibition of their importation, except in casks of considerable capacity. It is to be hoped, that such a duty would banish from the market foreign malt liquors of inferior quality, and that the best kind only would continue to be imported, till it should be supplanted by the efforts of equal skill and care at home.

Till that period, the importation so qualified would be an useful stimulus to improvement: and, in the mean time, the payment of the increased price, for the enjoyment of luxury, in order to the encouragement of a most useful branch of domestic industry, could not reasonably be deemed a hardship.

As a further aid to manufactures of grain, though upon a smaller scale, the articles of starch, linseed powder, and wafers, may with great propriety be placed among those which are rated at fifteen per cent. No manufactures are more simple, nor more completely within the reach of a full supply from domestic sources: and it is a policy, as common as it is obvious, to make them the object either of prohibitory duties, or of express prohibition.

FLAX AND HEMP. Manufactures of these articles have so much affinity to each other, and they are so often blended, that they may with advantage be considered in conjunction. The importance of the linen branch to agriculture—its precious offices upon household husbandry—the ease with which the materials can be produced at home, to any reasonable extent—the great advances which have been already made, in the coarser fabrics of them, especially in the family way, constitute claims of peculiar force, to the patronage of government.

This patronage may be afforded in various ways—by promoting the growth of the materials—by increasing the inducements to an advantageous competition of rival foreign articles—by direct bounties or premiums upon our home manufacture.

First. As to promoting the growth of the materials.

In respect to flax, something has been already done, by the high duty upon foreign hemp. If the facilities for domestic production were not unusually great, the duty on the duty on foreign raw material, would be highly questionable, as interfering with the growth of manufactures of it. But making the proper allowances for those facilities, and with an eye to the future and natural progress of the country, the measure does not appear, upon the whole, exceptionable.

A strong wish naturally suggests itself, that some method could be devised, of affording a more direct encouragement to the growth both of flax and hemp, such as would be effectual, and at the same time not attended with too great inconveniences. To this end, bounties and premiums offer themselves to consideration; but no modification of them has yet occurred, which would not either hazard too much expense, or operate unequally in reference to the circumstances of different parts of the union; and which would not be attended with very great difficulties in the execution.

Secondly. As to increasing the impediments to an advantageous competition of rival foreign articles.

To this purpose, an augmentation of the duties on importation is the obvious expedient; which, in regard to certain articles, appears to be recommended by sufficient reasons.

The principal of these articles is sail cloth; one intimately connected with navigation and defence: and of which a flourishing manufactory is established at Boston, and very promising ones at several other places.

It is presumed to be both safe and advisable, to place this in the class of articles rated at ten per cent. A strong reason for it results from the consideration, that a bounty of two pence sterling per ell is allowed, in Great Britain, upon the exportation of the sail-cloth manufactured in that kingdom.

It would likewise appear to be good policy, to raise the duty to 7 1/2 per cent on the following articles. Drillings, ozonburghs, ticklenburghs, dowls, canvas, brown rolls, bagging, and upon all other linens, the first cost of which, at the place of exportation, does not exceed 25 cents per yard. A bounty of 12 1/2 per cent upon an average, on the exportation of such or similar linens from Great Britain, encourages the manufacture of them in that country, and increases the obstacles to a successful competition in the countries to which they are sent.

The quantities of tow and other household linens, manufactured in different parts of the United States, and the expectations which are derived from some late experiments, of being able to extend the use of labor-saving machines, in the coarser fabrics of linen, obviate the danger of inconvenience, from an increase of the duty upon such articles, and authorize a hope of speedy and complete success to the endeavor, which may be used for procuring an internal supply.

Thirdly. As to direct bounties, or premiums upon the manufactured articles.

To afford more effectual encouragement to the manufacture, and at the same time to promote the cheapness of the article for the benefit of navigation, it will be of great use to allow a bounty of two cents per yard on all sail-cloth which is made in the United States, from materials of their own growth. This would also assist the culture of those materials. An encouragement of this kind, if adopted, ought to be established for a fixed rate term of years, to invite to new undertakings, and to an extension of the ell. This is an article of importance enough to warrant the employment of extraordinary means in its favor.

COTTON. There is something in the texture of this material, which adapts it in a peculiar degree to the application of machines.

The singular utility of the mill for spinning of cotton, not long since invented in England, has been noticed in another place: but there are other machines scarcely inferior in utility, which, in the different manufactures of this article, are employed either exclusively or with more than ordinary effect. This very important circumstance recommends the fabric of cotton, in a more particular manner, to a country in which a defect of hands constitutes the greatest obstacle to success.

The variety and extent of the uses to which the manufactures of this article are applicable, is another powerful argument in their favor.

And the faculty of the United States to produce the raw material in abundance, and of a quality, which, though alleged to be inferior to some that is produced in other quarters, is nevertheless capable of being used with advantage in many fabrics, and is probably susceptible of being carried, by a more experienced culture, to much greater perfection, suggests an additional and a very cogent inducement to the vigorous pursuit of the cotton branch, in its several subdivisions.

How much has been already done, has been stated in a preceding part of this report.

In addition to this it may be announced, that a society is forming, with a capital which is expected to be extended to at least half a million of dollars; on behalf of which measures are already in train for prosecuting, on a large scale, the making and printing of cotton goods.

These circumstances conspire to indicate the expediency of removing any obstructions, which may happen to exist, to the advantageous prosecution of the manufactories in question, and of adding such encouragements as may appear necessary and proper.

The present duty of three cents per pound, on the foreign raw material, is undoubtedly a very serious impediment to the progress of those manufacturers.

The injurious tendency of similar duties, either prior to the establishment, or in the infancy of the domestic manufacture of the article, as it regards the manufacture, and their worse than utility in relation to the home production of the material itself, have been anticipated, particularly in discussing the subject of pecuniary bounties.

Cotton has not the same pretensions with hemp, to form an exception to the general rule.

Not being, like hemp, an universal production of the country, it affords less assurance of an adequate internal supply; but the chief objection arises from the doubts, which are entertained concerning the quality of the national cotton. It is alleged, that the fibre of it is considerably shorter and weaker, than that of some other places; and it has been observed, as a general rule, that the nearer the place of growth to the equator, the better the quality of the cotton. That which comes from Cayenne, Surinam, and Demarara, is said to be preferable, even at a material difference of price, to the cotton of the islands.

While a hope may reasonably be indulged, that, with due care and attention, the national cotton may be made to approach nearer than it now does to that of regions somewhat more favored by climate, and while facts authorise an opinion, that very great use may be made of it, and that it is a resource which gives greater security to the cotton fabrics of this country, than can be enjoyed by any which depends wholly on external supply, it will certainly be wise in every view, to let our infant manufactures have the full benefit of the best materials, on the cheapest terms. It is obvious, that the necessity of having such materials, is proportioned to the unskilfulness and inexperience of the workmen employed, who, if inexperienced, will not fail to commit great waste, where the materials they are to work with, are of an indifferent kind.

To secure to the national manufacturers so essential an advantage, a repeal of the present duty on imported cotton is indispensable.

A substitute for this, far more encouraging to domestic production, will be to grant a bounty on the national cotton, when wrought at a home manufactory: to which a bounty on the exportation of it may be added. Either or both would do much more towards promoting the growth of the article, than the merely nominal encouragement, which it is proposed to abolish. The first would also have a direct influence in encouraging the manufacture.

The bounty, which has been mentioned, as existing in Great Britain, upon the exportation of coarse linens, not exceeding a certain value, applies also to certain descriptions of cotton goods of similar value.

This furnishes an additional argument for allowing to the national manufacturers the species of encouragement just suggested, and indeed for adding some other aid.

One cent per yard, not less than of a given width, on all goods of cotton, or of cotton and linen mixed, which are manufactured in the United States, with the addition of one cent per pound weight of the material, if made of national cotton, would amount to an aid of considerable importance, both to the production, and to the manufacture of that valuable article. And it is conceived that the expense would be well justified by the magnitude of the object.

The printing and staining of cotton goods is known to be a distinct business from the fabrication of them. It is one easily accomplished, and which, as it adds materially to the value of the article in its white state, and prepares it for a variety of new uses, is of importance to be promoted.

As imported cottons, equally with those which are made at home, may be the objects of this manufacture, it will merit consideration, whether the whole, or a part of the duty, on the white goods, ought not to be allowed to be drawn back, in favor of those, who print or stain them. This measure would certainly operate as a powerful encouragement to the business; and, though it may in a degree counteract the original fabrication of the articles, it would probably more than compensate for this disadvantage, in the rapid growth of a collateral branch, which is of a nature sooner to attain to maturity.

When a sufficient progress shall have been made, the drawback may be abrogated, and by that time the domestic supply of the articles to be printed or stained will have been extended.

If the duty of seven and a half per cent. on certain kinds of cotton goods were extended to all goods of cotton, or of which it is the principal material, it would probably more than counterbalance the effect of the drawback proposed, in relation to the fabrication of the article. And no material objection occurs to such an extension. The duty, then, considering all the circumstances which attend goods of this description, could not be deemed inconveniently high; and it may be inferred from various causes, that the prices of them would still continue moderate.

Manufactories of cotton goods, not long since established at Beverly, in Massachusetts, and at Providence, in the state of Rhode Island, and conducted with a perseverance corresponding with the patriotic motives which began them, seem to have overcome the first obstacles to success; producing corduroys, velvets, fustains, jeans, and other similar articles, of a quality, which will bear a comparison with the like articles brought from Manchester. The one at Providence has the merit of being the first in introducing into the United States, the celebrated cotton mill; which not only furnishes materials for that manufactory itself, but for the supply of private families for household manufacture.

Other manufactories of the same material, as regular businesses, have also been begun at different places in the state of Connecticut, but all upon a smaller scale than those above mentioned. Some essays are also making in the printing and staining of cotton goods. There are several small establishments of this kind already on foot.

WOOL. In a country the climate of which partakes of so considerable a proportion of winter, as that of a great part of the United States, the wool-lean branches must be regarded as inferior to any, which relates to the clothing of the inhabitants.

Household manufactures of this material are carried on, in different parts of the United States, to a very interesting extent; but there is only one branch, which, as a regular business, can be said to have acquired maturity. This is the making of hats.

Hats of wool, and of wool mixed with fur, are made in large quantities, in different states; and nothing seems wanting, but an adequate supply of materials, to render the manufacture commensurate with the demand.

A promising essay, towards the fabrication of cloths, cassimers, and other woollen goods, is likewise going on at Hartford, in Connecticut. Specimens of the different kinds which are made, in the possession of the secretary, evince that these fabrics have attained a very considerable degree of perfection. Their quality certainly surpasses any thing, that could have been looked for, in so short a time, and under so great disadvantages; and compares with the gentleness of the means, which have been at the command of the directors, to form the eulogium of that public spirit, perseverance, and judgment, which have been able to accomplish so much.

To cherish and bring to maturity this precious embryo must engage the most ardent wishes, and proportionable regret, as far as the means of doing it may appear difficult or uncertain.

Measures, which should tend to promote an abundant supply of wool, of good quality, would probably afford the most efficacious aid, that present circumstances permit.

To encourage the raising and improving the breed of sheep at home, would certainly be the most deshable expedient, for that purpose; but it may not be alone sufficient, especially as it is yet a problem, whether our wool be capable of such a degree of improvement, as to render it fit for the finer fabrics.

Premiums would probably be found the best means of promoting the domestic, and bounties the foreign supply: the first may be within the compass of the institution hereafter to be submitted. The last would require a specific legislative provision. If any bounties are granted, they ought, of course, to be adjusted with an eye to quality as well as quantity.

A fund for this purpose may be derived from the addition of two and a half per cent. to the present rate of duty, on carpets and carpeting; an increase, to which the nature of the articles suggests no objection, and which may, at the same time, furnish a motive the more, to the fabrication of them at home; towards which some beginnings have been made.

SILK. The production of this article is attended with great facility in most parts of the United States. Some pleasing essays are making in Connecticut, as well towards that, as towards the manufacture of what is produced. Stockings, handkerchiefs, ribands and buttons, are made, though as yet but in small quantities.

A manufactory of lace, upon a scale not very extensive, has been long memorable at Ipswich, in the state of Massachusetts.

An exemption of the material from the duty, which it now pays on importation, and premiums upon the production, to be dispensed under the direction of the institution before alluded to, seem to be the only species of encouragement advisable at so early a stage of the thing.

GLASS. The materials for making glass are found every where. In the United States, there is no deficiency of them. The sands and stones called tarso, which include flint and crystalline substances generally, and the salts of various plants, particularly of the sea weed kelp or kelp, constitute the essential ingredients. An extraordinary abundance of fuel is a particular advantage enjoyed in this country for such manufactures. They however require large capitals and involve much manual labor.

Different manufactories of glass are now on foot in the United States. The present duty of 12 1/2 per cent. on all imported articles of glass, amounts to a considerable encouragement to those manufactories. If any thing in addition is judged eligible, the most proper would appear to be a direct bounty, on window glass and beer bottles.

The first recommends itself as an object of general convenience; the last adds to that character, the circumstance of being an important item in breweries. A complaint is made of great deficiency in this respect.

GUN-POWDER. No small progress has been of late made in the manufacture of this very important article: it may, indeed, be considered as already established; but its high importance renders its further extension very desirable.

The encouragements, which it already enjoys, are a duty of ten per cent. on the foreign rival article, and an exemption of sulphur, one of the principal ingredients of which it is composed, from duty. A like exemption of sulphur, another chief ingredient, would appear to be equally proper. No quantity of this article has yet been produced from internal sources. The use made of it in finishing the bottoms of ships, is an additional inducement to placing it in the class of free goods. Regulations for the careful inspection of the article would have a favorable tendency.

PAPER. Manufactories of paper are among those which are arrived at the greatest maturity in the United States, and are most adequate to national supply. That of paper hangings is a branch, in which respectable progress has been made.

Nothing material seems wanting to the further success of this valuable branch, which is already protected by a competent duty on similar imported articles.

In the enumeration of the several kinds, made subject to that duty, sheathing and cartridge paper have been omitted. These, being the most simple manufactures of the sort, and necessary to military supply, as well as ship building, recommend themselves equally with those of other descriptions, to encouragement, and appear to be as fully within the compass of domestic exertions.

PRINTED BOOKS. The great number of presses disseminated throughout the union, seems to afford an assurance, that there is no need of being indebted to foreign countries for the printing of the books which are used in the United States. A duty of ten per cent. instead of five, which is now charged upon the article, would have a tendency to aid the business internally.

It occurs, as an objection to this, that it may have an unfavorable aspect towards literature, by raising the prices of books in universal use, in private families, schools, and other seminaries of learning. But the difference, it is conceived, would be without effect.

As to books which usually fill the libraries of the wealthier classes, and of professional men, such an augmentation of prices, as might be occasioned by an additional duty of five per cent. would be too little felt to be an impediment to the acquisition.

And with regard to books which may be specially imported for the use of particular seminaries of learning, and of public libraries, a total exemption from duty would be advisable, which would go far towards obviating the objection just mentioned. They are now subject to a duty of five per cent.

As to the books in most general family use, the constancy and universality of the demand would insure exertions to furnish them at home; and the means are completely adequate. It may also be expected ultimately, in this, as in other cases, that the extension of the domestic manufacture would conduce to the cheapness of the article.

It ought not to pass unremarked, that to encourage the printing of books is to encourage the manufacture of paper.

REFINED SUGARS AND CHOCOLATE are among the number of extensive and prosperous domestic manufactures.

Drawbacks of the duties upon the materials, of which they are respectively made, in cases of exportation, would have a beneficial influence upon the manufacture, and would conform to a precedent, which has been already furnished in the instance of molasses, on the exportation of distilled spirits.

COCOA, the raw material, now pays a duty of one cent per lb. while chocolate, which is a prevailing and very simple manufacture, is comprised in the mass of articles rated at no more than five per cent.

There would appear to be a propriety in encouraging the manufacture, by a somewhat higher duty, on its foreign rival, than is paid on the raw material. Two cents per lb. on imported chocolate would, it is presumed, be without inconvenience.

The foregoing heads comprise the most important of the several kinds of manufactures, which have occurred as requiring, and, at the same time, as most proper for public encouragement: and such measures for affording it, as have appeared best calculated to answer the end, have been suggested.

The observations, which have accompanied this delineation of objects, supercede the necessity of many supplementary remarks. One or two, however, may not be altogether superfluous.

Bounties are, in various instances, proposed as one species of encouragement.

It is a familiar objection to them that they are difficult to be managed, and liable to frauds. But neither that difficulty, nor this danger, seems sufficiently great to counterbalance the advantages of which they are productive, when rightly applied. And it is presumed to have been shewn, that they are in some cases, particularly in the infancy of new enterprises, indispensable.

It will, however, be necessary to guard, with extraordinary circumspection, the manner of dispensing them. The requisite precautions have been thought of: but to enter into the detail would swell this report, already voluminous, to a size too inconvenient.

If the principle shall not be deemed inadmissible, the means of avoiding an abuse of it will not be likely to present insurmountable obstacles. There are useful guides from practice in other quarters.

It shall, therefore, only be remarked here, in relation to this point, that any bounty, which may be applied to the manufacture of an article, cannot with safety extend beyond those manufactories, at which the making of the article is a regular trade. It would be impossible to annex adequate precautions to a benefit of that nature, if extended to every private family, in which the manufacture was incidentally carried on: and its being a merely incidental occupation which engages a portion of time, that would otherwise be lost, it can be advantageously carried on, without so special an aid.

The possibility of a diminution of the revenue, may also present itself, as an objection to the arrangements, which have been submitted.

But there is no truth, which may be more firmly relied upon, than that the interests of the revenue are promoted by whatever promotes an increase of national industry and wealth.

In proportion to the degree of these, is the capacity of every country to contribute to the public treasury; and where the capacity to pay is increased, or even is not decreased, the only consequence of measures, which diminish any particular resource, is a change of the object. If, by encouraging the manufacture of an article at home, the revenue, which has been wont to accrue from its importation, should be lessened, an indemnification can easily be found, either out of the manufacture itself, or from some other object, which may be deemed more convenient.

The measures, however, which have been submitted, taken aggregately, will, for a long time to come, rather augment than decrease the public revenue.

There is little room to hope, that the progress of manufactures will so equally keep pace with the progress of population, as to prevent even a gradual augmentation of the product of the duties on imported articles.

As, nevertheless, an abolition in some instances, and a reduction, in others, of duties, which have been pledged for the public debt, is proposed, it is essential that it should be accompanied with a competent substitute. In order to this, it is requisite, that all additional duties which shall be laid, be appropriated, in the first instance, to replace all deficiencies, which may proceed from any such abolition or diminution. It is evident, at first glance, that they will not only be adequate to this, but will yield a considerable surplus. This surplus will serve

First. To constitute a fund for paying the bounties which shall have been decreed.

Secondly. To constitute a fund for the operation of a board to be established for promoting arts, agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. Of this institution, different intimations have been given, in the course of this report. An outline of a plan for it shall now be submitted.

Let a certain annual sum be set apart, and placed under the management of commissioners not less than three, to consist of certain officers of the government and their successors in office.

Let these commissioners be empowered to apply the fund entitled to them, to defray the expenses of the emigration of artists, and manufacturers in particular branches, of extraordinary importance—to reduce the prosecution and introduction of useful discoveries, inventions, and improvements, by proportionate rewards, judiciously held out and applied—to encourage by premiums, both honorable and lucrative, the exertions of individuals, and of classes, in relation to the several objects, they are charged with promoting—and to afford such other aids to these objects, as may be generally designated by law.

The commissioners to render to the legislature an annual account of the transactions and disbursements; and all such sums as shall not have been applied to the purposes of their trust, at the end of every three years, to revert to the treasury. It may also be enjoined upon them, not to draw out the money, but for the purpose of some specific disbursement.

It may, moreover, be of use, to authorize them to receive voluntary contributions; making it their duty to apply them to the particular objects for which they may have been made, if any shall have been designated by the donors.

There is reason to believe, that the progress of particular manufactures has been much retarded by the want of skillful workmen. And it often happens, that the capital employed are not applied to the purposes of bringing from abroad workmen of a superior kind. Here, in cases worthy of it, the auxiliary agency of government would, in all probability, be useful. There are also valuable workmen, in every branch, who are prevented from emigrating solely by the want of means. Occasional aids to such persons, properly administered, might be a source of valuable acquisitions to the country.

The propriety of stimulating, by rewards, the invention and introduction of useful improvements, is admitted without difficulty. But the success of attempts in this way must evidently depend much on the manner of conducting them. It is probable, that the purchasing of the dispensation of those rewards under some proper discretionary direction, where they may be accompanied by collateral expectations, will serve to give them the same efficacy.—It seems impracticable to apportion, by general rules, of specific compensations for discovery—unknown, and disproportionate utility.

The great use, which may be made of a fund of this nature, to procure and import to sign improvements, is particularly obvious. Among these, the art of making machines would form a most important item.

The operation, and utility of premiums have been observed to—together with the advantages which have resulted from their dispensation, under the direction of certain public and private societies. Of this, some experience has been had in the instance of the Pennsylvania society, for the promotion of manufactures and the useful arts: but the funds of that association have been too contracted to produce more than a very small portion of the good to which the principles of it would have led. It may confidently be affirmed, that there is scarcely any thing, which has been devised, better calculated to excite a general spirit of improvement, than the institutions of this nature. They are truly invaluable.

In countries, where there is great private wealth, much may be effected by the voluntary contributions of patriotic individuals; but in a community situated like that of the United States, the public purse must supply the deficiency of private sources. In what can it be so useful, as in prompting and improving the efforts of industry?

All which is humbly submitted,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,

Secretary of the treasury

The war-tax Laws,

Passed at the last session of Congress.

As being of the greater consequence, we have inserted, at length, the provisions for laying a direct tax, a tax upon stills, and a tax on certain promissory notes.—The other taxes are upon carriages, on refined sugar, on retailers, on sales at auction, and a duty on salt.

The carriage tax operates only on carriages kept for the conveyance of persons, as follows:

On every coach the yearly sum of	$20
On every chariot or post chaise	17
On every phaeton or coach paneled above	10
On every other four wheel carriage hanging on steel or iron springs	7
On every four wheel carriage hanging on wooden springs—or two wheel carriage on steel or iron springs	4
And upon every other four or two wheel carriage	2

On refined sugar, the duty is 4 cents per pound.

On Retailers.—This tax levies the following annual duties on retail dealers, and if in a town containing more than one hundred families the following are the rates:

On retailers of merchandize, wines and spirits	$25
Of wines alone	20
Of spirits alone	20
Of domestic spirits alone	15
Of merchandize other than wines and spirits	15

If in any other place, other than a town of that size,

On retailers of merchandize with wines and spirits	$15
Of wines and spirits alone	15
Of Spirits alone	12
Of domestic spirits alone	10
Of merchandize other than wines and spirits	10

On sales by auction, of merchandize, and ships or vessels. This tax levies a duty on said articles of 25 cents on every $100 of the purchase money, with the following proviso—That nothing in this act contained shall extend to any sale or sales by auction of coal, wares and merchandize, made pursuant to or in execution of any rule, order, decree, sentence or judgment of any court of the United States or either of them, or made in virtue or by force of any distress for rent, or other cause for which a distress is allowed by law; or made in consequence of any bankruptcy or insolvency, pursuant to any law concerning bankruptcies or insolvencies; or made in consequence of any general assignment of property, and effects for the benefit of creditors; or made by or on behalf of executors or administrators; or made pursuant to the directions of any law of the United States, or either of them, touching the collection of any tax or duty; or disposal by auction of public property of the United States or of any state; nor to any such sale or sales by auction of ships, their tackle, apparel and furniture, or the cargoes thereof, which shall be wrecked or stranded within the United States, and sold for the benefit of the insurers or proprietors thereof.

On salt, a duty of 20 cents per bushel is imposed, the bushel esteemed 35 lbs.—and a bounty allowed on pickled fish exported.

All the above acts are to commence their operation on the first of January next, and to continue in force for and during the present war in which we are engaged, and for one year thereafter and no longer.

The duties on goods imported were also doubled.

Captain Jesse D Elliot.

From the well known character of captain Elliot of the Niagara, commander Perry's able second in the battle on Lake Erie, and of whom the gallant commander so enthusiastically speaks in his official letter to the navy department, we passed over with contempt certain anonymous insinuations as the mere overflowings of the spleen of some creature that evidently had not had the courage to aspire to be him self. But as captain Elliot has seen proper to notice these things, we thought it was our duty to do so.

From the Southern Centinel.—In a number of papers has been published a letter from an officer of the Lawrence, and another from a volunteer on board that vessel, stating that the Niagara had taken on a false part in the action of the 10th September. To the ignorance of the latter, we may naturally impute his unbecoming and false statement. The former, we fear, will not escape so easily. We cannot but condemn the conduct of an officer who, upon such slight proof, have endeavored to destroy the reputation of a brave and deserving officer, who is no more than our instance, and one of the most signal servants to his country. It is with pleasure we publish the following statements and documents, believing that they will put the enemies of captain Elliot to the blush, and prove his conduct in its true light.

To the editor.—Sir, Some persons, actuated by base and unworthy motives, have falsely and maliciously evaded the public opinion to be unfavourably impressed with the conduct of captain Elliot, in the Niagara, on the 10th September. I believe there are many who entertain the erroneous opinion, that the Niagara rendered no assistance to the Lawrence. His distinguished second, captain Perry, and Elliot, I hope will remove these impressions, and I can, from my own knowledge, declare captain Elliot's conduct to have been such as merits the applause of his country. His brave and gallant conduct was signal to all on board the Niagara, and, in my opinion, could not have been surpassed. He remarked to me repeatedly in the action, that we were not as close alongside the enemy as he wished; that we left their long guns too much superiority; and that he was certain, if close alongside the Queen Charlotte, ten minutes would determine the action in our favor.

From a few minutes after the commencement of the action, the enemy being formed very close in a line ahead, their shot came over us in every direction, and repeatedly hoisted us, our position being preserved as I believe the line was intended to be formed. During the action, the Calcutta was so close ahead of us, that we were obliged to frequently keep the main-yard, Lee & sharp aback, to avoid being foul of her. Finding the Queen Charlotte to make sail ahead from our fire, as was supposed, captain Elliot hoisted the Calcutta and ordered her to lie in port, which was done, and the Niagara passed ahead by killing the main-topmast, and setting her on fire and setting her on fire. The Niagara then closed in the wake of the Lawrence, and continued the action with the usual vigor until the Lawrence dropped astern, when it is well known, that almost instantly the Niagara became abreast of the Detroit and Queen Charlotte, which could not have been the case, had she been a long distance astern.

I feel it my duty, also to observe, that the Lawrence, until near the close of the engagement, bore a greater proportion of the loss of the Detroit and Queen Charlotte, and from the Detroit's long guns, which passed her through, she suffered considerably more in every respect than the Niagara.

Captain Elliot volunteered to bring into close action all our small vessels, which was nobly and heroically executed, aided by the exertions of their crews, and produced the brilliant victory which warms with just pride, the bosom of every American.

HUGHREY MAGRATH.

U. S. Ship Niagara, Captain B. on September 11.
SIR—I am informed a report has been circulated, by some malicious person, prejudicial to his vessel, when engaged with the enemy's fleet. I will thank you, if you will, with caution, state to the conduct of my said officers and crew.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,
JESSE D. ELLIOT.

U. S. Schooner Ariel, Put to Sea, September 12.
My dear Sir—I feel compelled to express to you, if I had time, in or should have answered it promptly. I am a brigadier, and in any respect should be circumspect in your character, as respects the action of the 10th inst. It affords me great pleasure, that I have it in my power to assure you, that the conduct of your self, officers and crew, was such as to merit a high commendation. And I consider the circumstances of your victory, as being the small vessel into the action, as a most interesting circumstance. I shall ever be happy in a particular, I plan to determine our command, as it is. I have no doubt, but that the Queen Charlotte never met the Niagara, from the superior rank I served her in, nor would I have taken her to my quarters.

With sentiments of esteem, I am, dear Sir, your friend and obedient servant,
G. B. PERRY.

Captain Elliot.

Governor Shelby.

Of Kentucky, lately in Carolina, at the head of his militia, says, it will be recollected in this year, I awarded to him by the Legislature of North Carolina, many years ago, which was happily preserved to the year of our victory, just before I set out on my expedition. The following correspondence passed on the occasion—

Executive order, N. C. Raleigh, July 27.
SIR—In compliance with a resolution of the general assembly of this state, passed at the first session, I have the honor of sending you the enclosed, which this letter accompanies, as a testimony of the distinguished assistance you have on the grade of a brigadier, and your gallantry in beholding with your brethren in arms, the glorious victory over the British forces, commanded by Sir Isaac Shelburne, at the battle of King's Mountain on the memorable 7th of October, 1780.

The tribute of respect, though bestowed at a period which will not be considered the less honorable, that you, in a year, followed in it to a nation with a portion of the general assembly passed in the year 1771, which, from some circumstances, will ascertained, it is to be regretted, it was not equipped with.

Permit me, Sir, to make you an expression of the high consideration I feel by the noble and noble instrument to present to you, by the name of the state of North Carolina, the sum of one dollar in gratuity—this is not of value, and to remark, that even in the present time, with the year to the first of our rights, the pleasing hope may be entertained, that the valiant deeds of the heroes of our revolution will inspire the soldier of the existing war, and nerve his arm in laudable emulation to fill, such vacancies. I beg you to accept an assurance of the most respectful regard and respect, with which I have the honor to be, Sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM HAWKINS.

His excellency, Isaac Shelby,
Governor of Kentucky.

Government House, Trenton, Ken. August 25th, 1817.

SIR—On the 23d inst. I had the honor of receiving your letter of the 17th ult. tendering to me a sum, which accompanied it, bestowed by North Carolina as a testimony of the high respect and sentiments which she entertained in relation to my conduct in the affair of the 7th of October, 1780, at King's Mountain.

England has my beloved countrymen was a struggle for every citizen of her citizens in her behalf. Devoted to the cause of my country, impelled by a high sense of the obligations I owed her, and by an utter aversion to the tyranny which was endeavoring to oppress her, I freely participated in those exertions which led to, and that conflict which terminated so favorably, to our arms, and evidently gave a favorable turn to the revolutionary war, and in relation to which the legislature of North Carolina have been pleased to express themselves in a manner the most flattering to my feelings.

If the free-born sons of America want a stimulus to draw their faith in a defence of her rights, other than a conviction that upon their exertions depends the continuance of those rights, it might be found in the least bit satisfaction derived from the consideration of having merited and received the applause of a great country like that, and to sing in concert with her in behalf.

Having lived ten years of the happiest part of my life in North Carolina, and having received the marks of the partiality of my fellow-citizens, in the exercise of, during my residence amongst them, I have ever entertained the warmest feelings of affection and loyalty for them. And I now accept, with gratitude and respect, this honorable pledge of a continuance of their affection.

With considerations of high respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

Your obedient servant,
His excellency, William Hawkins,
Governor of N. Carolina.

ISAAC SHELBY.

Vermont Militia.

Brigadier-general Jacob Davis, who was charged with his excellency governor Clifton's procuration, immediately repaired to the army for the purpose of executing his orders. We learn that attending his arrival, he was arrested on a false pretence to Philadelphia.

Cantonment, Plattsburgh, Nov. 15, 1813.

To his excellency Martin Wintenden, esq. governor captain-general and commander in chief, in and over the state of Vermont.

Sir:—A most novel and extraordinary proclamation from your excellency, "ordering and directing such portion of the militia of the militia brigade in the third division of the militia of Vermont, now doing duty in the state of New-York, both officers and men, forthwith to return to the respective places of their residence," has just been communicated to the undersigned officers of said brigade. A measure so unexampled, requires we should state to your excellency, the reasons which induce us absolutely and positively to refuse obedience to the order contained in your excellency's proclamation. With due deference to your excellency's opinion, we humbly conceive, that when we are ordered into the service of the United States, it becomes our duty, when required, to march to the defence of any section of the union. We are not of that class who believe that our duties as citizens or soldiers are circumscribed within the narrow limits of the town or state in which we reside; but that we are under a paramount obligation to our common country, to the great confederacy of states. We further conceive that while we are in actual service, and during the period for which we were ordered into service, your excellency's power over us, as governor of the state of Vermont, is suspended.

It is true, as your excellency states, that "we are out of the jurisdiction or control of the executive of Vermont," we would ask from whence your excellency derives the right, or presumes to exercise the power of ordering us to return from the service in which we are now engaged? If we were legally ordered into the service of the United States, your excellency must be sensible that you have no authority to order us out of that service. If we were illegally ordered into the service, our continuance in it, is either voluntary or compulsory. If voluntary, it gives no one a right to remonstrate or complain; if compulsory, we can appeal to the laws of our country, for redress against those who illegally restrain us of our liberty. In either case, we cannot perceive the right your excellency has to interfere in the business. Viewing the subject in this light, we conceive it our duty to declare unequivocally to your excellency, that we shall not obey your excellency's order for returning; but shall continue in the service of our country until legally and honorably discharged. An invitation or order to desert the standard of our country will never be obeyed by us, although it proceeds from the governor and captain general of Vermont.

Perhaps it is proper, that we should content ourselves with merely giving your excellency the reasons which prevailed upon us to disregard your proclamation; but we are impressed with the belief, that our duty to ourselves, to the soldiers under our command, and to the public, require that we should explain to the world, the motives which were intended to be produced, and objects to be accomplished by such an extraordinary proclamation.—We shall take the liberty to state to your excellency plainly, our sentiments on this subject.—We consider your proclamation as a gross insult to the officers and soldiers in service; inasmuch as it implies that they are so ignorant of their rights as to believe you have authority to command them in their present situation, or so abandoned as to follow your insidious advice. We cannot regard your proclamation in any other light than as an unvarnished stretch of executive authority, issued from the worst of motives, to effect the basest purposes. It is in our opinion, a renewed instance of that spirit of disorganization and anarchy which is carried on by a faction, to overwhelm our country with ruin and disgrace. We cannot perceive what other object your excellency could have in view than to embarrass the operations of the army, to excite mutiny and sedition among the soldiers, and to induce them to desert, that they might forfeit the wages to which they are entitled for their patriotic services.

We have however the satisfaction to inform your excellency, that although your proclamations have been distributed among the soldiers by your agent delegated for that purpose, they have failed to produce the intended effect—and although it may appear incredible to your excellency, even soldiers have discernment sufficient to perceive, that the proclamation of a governor when issued out of the line of his duty, is a harmless, inoffensive, nugatory document. They regard it with mingled emotions of pity and contempt for its author, and as a striking monument of his folly.

Before we conclude, we feel ourselves in justice to your excellency, bound to declare, that a knowledge of your excellency's character induces us to believe, that the folly and infamy of the proclamation which your excellency has put your signature to, is wholly to be ascribed to advisers, with whom we believe your excellency is unhappily encompassed.

We are with due respect your excellency's obedient servants,

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The conquest of Canada, 1760—From Hume's History of England, continued by Dr. Smollett and others, vol. 10, page 45, the following is transcribed:

"In a word, general Amherst took possession of Montreal and completed the conquest of Canada; a conquest the most important of any, that even the British army achieved, whether we consider the safety of the British colonies in America now secured from invasion and encroachment; the extent and fertility of the country subdued; or the whole Indian commerce thus transferred to Great Britain."

The Argus and Pelican. The tonnage of the late U. S. brig Argus, is thus given—Dimensions of the U. S. brig Argus, built in Boston, by Mr. Edmund Hunt.

Length of keel, for tonnage,	80 ft.	} 298 tons.
Breadth of beam,	do. 28 do.
Depth of hold,	do. 12 ft. 8 in.

A London paper of the 31st August has the following—"The Pelican brig of 18 guns, which so nobly captured the Argus American sloop of war, was commanded by captain Searle, when she beat the French frigate Medea, of 44 guns into Guadaloupe, after an action of two hours, in the year 1792."

The "Pelican brig" is twice as large and twice as strong as the "Argus sloop of war."

A very handsome and effectual fort, built by the detached militia at Portland, has been called Fort Burrows, in honor of the commander: the Barron.

Letters to the editor from Chillicothe of the 13th and 20th ult give the following list of the British prisoners then at that place. The officers on parole are :

Lieutenant-colonel Warburton, major Chambers, D. A. Q. M. G.; major Muir, 41st regiment; captain Dorensay, 41st do.; captain McCoy, do. captain Hill, do.; captain Tellin, do.; captain Dixon, royal engineer; lieutenant Hale, 41st regiment; lieutenant Watson, 41st do.; lieutenant Linn, do.; lieutenant Jeboult, do.; lieutenant O'Keefe, do.; lieutenant Geale, do.; lieutenant Purvies, royal navy; lieutenant Skooc, do. do.; lieutenant Bremner, provincial do.; lieutenant Polette, do. do.; lieutenant Irvi, royal navy; lieutenant Garden, royal Newfoundland regiment; lieutenant Holmes, light dragoons; ensign Hompsen, 41st regiment; ensign Cochran, do.; ensign Jones, do.; A. Note. "Since the above list was drawn off about 40 prisoners, who were left at Detroit, and other posts wounded and sick, have arrived at Chillicothe—others yet remain."

On the 20th, the whole of the British prisoners taken by Harrison, took boats to descend the rivers Scioto and Ohio to Newport, Kentucky, where there are barracks belonging to the United States.

While at Chillicothe, the British officers strictly maintained their high reputation for modesty and good order that belongs to the unassuming character of their nation. Two or three of them were put in the common jail for violating the laws of civil society; and one of the most distinguished was scarcely prevented from the commission of a deed (on a little girl 10 or 12 years old,) that might have brought him to the gallows. The Kentuckians will keep them in due bounds.

We fear that a good many of the prisoners taken by Harrison and Perry have made their escape; as we have heard of several instances of desertion to save themselves from returning to the service of their "most gracious" master. Poor fellows! we pity them and would let them run, if it were not that we wanted them for exchange.

Speaking of Harrison's victory an English paper printed in Rhode Island, has the following remark: "It was the triumph of a cloud of Kentucky savages over a handful of the enemy's troops—no more than a march, and the capture, without fighting, of a few brave men!"

The late British schooner High Flyer, captured by the President frigate, has been sold at auction for $11,000.

Commodore Bainbridge has lately visited the seat of government, while there the citizens of Georgetown invited him to an entertainment; among the guests were captain Morris, lieutenants W. Call, and Forrest. After the feast the following toasts were drunk:

1. The constitution of the United States—Cabled on that, anchored no topmast can move.
2. Union—The main pillar in the edifice of our real independence."
3. The President of the United States.
4. The American navy—We claim the trident of the western seas.
5. Truxton the brave—No Insurgent against my country's rights—vengeance's mine.
6. Peable before Tripoli—I pay my tribute from the cannon's mouth.
7. Commodore Decatur—Your two fold honors are your country's pride.
8. Captain Trippe—11 to 36—no fearful odds where glory is the boon.
9. Somers, Wadsworth and Israel—You herald your fame to the mansions above.
10. The modest Hull—The Harwar beaten and your crest not raised.
11. The generous and accomplished commodore Bainbridge—His feathered arrow sooths the anguish of the vanquished foe.
12. Lawrence, Allen and Burrows—A train of satellites in the Constellation of Washington.
13. Captain Jones—You do for Fralie what we would for graves.
14. Captain Elliot—He won the Lynnadde of rude Eric's deep.
15. Commodore Chauncey—Thrice did Achilles chase Hector round the walls of Troy.
16. Commodore Perry—The hero of the lake—could Nelson have done more?
17. The naval officers of the United States—All—all choice spirits of Columbia's air.
18. The fair—They smile benignly on the trophies of the brave.

Commodore Bainbridge made his public entree into Philadelphia on Saturday last, with military escort, amidst the acclamations of the people.

The British, off the eastern coast, are capturing many small vessels laden with provisions! "Understood?"

MILITARY.

The northern armies—In the official letters inserted below, with the other details apparently worthy of reliance, the reader will perceive a pretty complete history of the late transactions in the north. We are not prepared to offer one word by way of comment at this time; but shall briefly notice a few facts, &c. that have reached us from other sources.

Brig. gen. Corington died of his wounds on the 13th ult. He was a native of Maryland and one of Waage's favorite pupils, having commanded the cavalry in his memorable battle with the indians, at the Rapids of the Miami, in 1794. Without depreciating the character of any, he was accounted one of the very best officers in the service—a braver man never fell on the embattled field; for he was "every inch a soldier." He had (what is exceedingly wanted) great practical knowledge of all that appertains to a military life, and his loss, like that of Pike's, will be severely felt by his country. He was shot with a musket ball through the bowels. It is said that a British brigadier-general Fraser, was killed in the affair.

Major-general Harrison arrived at New-York on the 28th ult. He left his army in winter quarters at Sackett's Harbor; where Chauncey, having brought that army down from fort George, was about to lay up his fleet for the season. The secretary of war is reported on his return to the seat of government.

The affair of general Brown, briefly mentioned in general W. H. Miller's despatch, is thus stated, (but we shall have the particulars by and bye)—"the advance, under Brown, had a smart action with the enemy about the same time, fifteen miles below, in which major Perry (he received two flesh wounds, not dangerous, and the result of this action was, the capture from the British of five pieces of artillery, between one and two hundred prisoners, and a very large quantity of military stores."

We have yet to receive many things of considerable interest as well respecting Brown's battle as of the obstinate contest that Bogd had with the enemy—in which, it appears, each party claims the victory. The loss seems nearly equal on both sides.

It is stated that generals Hull, Winchester and Tay tor, colonel Lewis, and major Madison, are at last exchanged.

General Hampton is said to be on his way to the seat of government. Izard in command at Plattsburg and Parker at Burlington. Major-general Wilkinson is yet seriously indisposed, as is also major-general Lewis.

The following neat and appropriate proclamation was issued by general Wilkinson on entering Canada.

JAMES WILKINSON,

Major-general and commander in chief of an expedition against the Canadas, to the inhabitants thereof:

The army of the United States which I have the honor to command, invades these provinces to conquer, and not to destroy; to subdue the forces of his Britannic majesty, not to war against his unoffending subjects—Those, therefore, among you, who remain quiet at home, should victory incline to the American standard, shall be protected in their persons and property. But those who are found in arms, must necessarily be treated as avowed enemies.

To menace is unjust—to seduce dishonourable—Yet it is just and humane to place these alternatives before you.

Done at the head-quarters of the United States, this sixth day of November, 1813, near Ogdensburg, on the river St. Lawrence.

(Signed) JAMES WILKINSON.

By the general's command,

(Signed) N. P. NENEV,

Major and aid-de-camp.

The Democratic Press of the 29th, says—"By advices received from general Wilkinson's army, we understand that in consequence of a letter received from general Hampton, positively refusing to join the army under general Wilkinson at St. Regis, a consultation among the officers took place, of which the following is the result: for which we are indebted to our correspondent. The letter to us is dated at Salmon river, French Mills, 15th November 1813.

Extract from the general order of general Wilkinson, of the 15th November.

"The troops are to embark without loss of time, yet, are not to be hurried in leaving the Canadian shore, from whence the commander in chief is compelled to retire by the extraordinary, unexampled, and it appears unwarrantable conduct of major-general Hampton, in refusing to join this army with a division of 4000 men under his command, agreeable to positive orders from the commander in chief, and as he has been assured, by the secretary at war, of explicit instructions from the war department.—Thus deprived of a large portion of his promised force, the commander in chief feels himself bound by a sense of regard to this meritorious corps, and of sacred duty to the United States, to spare the lives of brave men, and not to hazard the character or interest of the nation, by an unequal conflict.—He with lively regret, and the deepest mortification, suspends the destined attack upon Montreal. But how does this army that is so not abandoned?"

A letter from the army said to be under date of the 13th, assures that contrary to expectation, gen. Hampton had, with his army, joined the army under general Wilkinson, and that confident expectations were entertained that the object of the campaign would yet be attained.

C. L. Dix, of the 14th reg., a very valuable officer, died of an inflammation in the lungs on the morning of the 12th.

The foregoing appear to be all the material facts relating to Hampton's division, necessary to notice, at present, that are not detailed below.

From this division we have had many reports, as usual, in which it is impossible to discern the truth. It appears that that army is at Plattsburg, in winter quarters—Com. McDonough was also there with his flotilla on the 17th—he was to sail next day with the sick for Burlington, and then proceed to White Hall to lay up his vessels. The British were supposed to be frozen up at the Isle of Noix, as there was considerable ice on the lake. Good sleighing in Vermont.

The following from the Plattsburg paper, may be accepted as a semi-official account of the flur, in which 300 British beat 800 Americans, see page 292.

Plattsburgh, Nov. 15.—Many representations having been made, some of them designedly erroneous, with respect to general Hampton's late expedition, we have thought proper to communicate the following statement which is from a source which cannot but be correct, and for the truth of which we can freely vouch.

COMMUNICATION.—Our army under gen. Hampton, moved from Chateaugay on the 21st Oct. and arrived at its position at Sears on the 22d. Thus having with incredible labor, surmounted 24 miles of the most difficult part of the route, through the extensive and almost impassible forest, which bounds the Canada line. After four or five miles of open country, and her forest of 6 or 7 miles is opposed to their march, (which was on the north west side of the river.) Thus the enemy had made almost an intire fortification by crossing it with felled trees interspersed with breast works and ditches: through these obstructions the enemy was to be assailed—a part of their forces consisting of light troops and Indians, were posted in these defences, while the main body, commanded by sir George Prevost in person, was lodged in the rear, fortified with batteries and cannon. The hardships our army had endured, the continual rains that were falling, and the obstructions in front would have damped the ardor of troops less disposed to disregard all sufferings and perils in pursuit of glory and in the service of their country—but on the contrary, partaking largely of the spirit which inspired their commander in chief, every individual seemed uncommonly emulous of the enterprise.

It was believed that the obstructions could not be forced by our main body, without great loss. To avoid this, the light companies and a regiment of infantry were detached at dark, on the evening of the 25th, to proceed on the opposite (s. e.) side of the river to a fording place below the enemy's advance; which they were to cross and attack the enemy in flank and rear, while the main body should attack in front; and thus, destroy the enemy's defence at a blow. Owing to the darkness of the night, incessant rain, and the difficulties of the wood the guide who conducted this detachment having lost his way, the party did not arrive at the proposed point. The battalion of the 10th regt. consisting of about 200 men, were at the appointed time, (3 o'clock P. M. on the 25th) at the entrance of the obstructed wood, waiting the attack of our troops on the enemy's flank, which was to be the signal for them to advance. At this moment the enemy commenced a fire on this battalion, who promptly returned it, then charged and drove the enemy from their lurking places, dispersing them and intirely silencing their fire; in this we had only one man killed and some three or four wounded. At this moment the firing commenced on the opposite side of the river with some of the light companies; and it was here, and not in either of the main divisions of the army that any serious loss, or the least conflict occurred; the enemy was, however, soon dispersed in this quarter also. After waiting some time for the renewal of the enemy's attack, the main body of our army fell back slowly and in good order; the enemy not daring to show themselves or in the least to intercept their march to a position 4 miles from the place of action. Here they were shortly after joined by the detached party who had had some further skirmishing with the enemy of no great account. At this place they remained several days without receiving the least molestation. The only failure of the expedition is attributable to the miscarriage of the grids, which disconcerted a plan which otherwise must have led to the capture of a considerable portion of the enemy's force and the complete destruction of his plan of defence.

The major general deserves the highest encomiums for skill and sagacity exhibited in his excellent arrangement.

Our actual total loss in killed, wounded and missing, does not exceed 35 men. The whole of our force engaged did not exceed 225 men on the side where the greatest force of the enemy was opposed—the other regiments did not arrive until the moment when the enemy were retiring, and were only formed in line, but took no part in the engagement. The reason why the enemy were not pushed further in this point is well known to be solely that the crisis of the campaign had not yet sufficiently advanced more for serious operations in that quarter.

OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

F. on the Albany Argus Extra.

FROM GEN. WILKINSON TO THE SECRETARY AT WAR, Head-quarters French Mills, adjoining the province of Lower Canada, November 16, 1813.

SIR—I beg leave to refer you to the journal which accompanies this letter, for the particulars of the movements of the corps under my command, down the St. Lawrence, and will endeavor to exert my enfeebled mind to detail to you the more striking and important incidents which have ensued my departure from Grenadier Island at the foot of Lake Ontario, on the 3d inst.

The corps of the enemy from Kingston which followed me hung on my rear, and in concert with a heavy galley and a few gun boats, seemed determined to retard our progress. I was strongly tempted to halt, turn about and put an end to his teasing; but alas! I was confined to my bed; major-general Lewis was too ill for any active exertion; and above all, I did not dare suffer myself to be diverted a single day from the prosecution of the views of government. I had written maj. gen. Hampton on the 6th inst. by his adjutant-general colonel King, and had ordered him to form a junction with me on the St. Lawrence, which I expected would take place on the 9th or 10th. It would have been unparadonable had I lost sight of this object a moment, as I deemed it of vital importance to the issue of the campaign.

The enemy deserve credit for their zeal and intelligence, which the active universal hostility of the male inhabitants of the country enabled them to employ to the greatest advantage. Thus, while menaced by a force in rear, the coast was lined by musketry in front, at every critical pass of the river, which obliged me to march a detachment, and this impeded my progress.

On the evening of the 9th inst. the army halted a few miles from the head of the Longue Saut. In the morning of the 10th, the enclosed order was issued. Gen. Brown marched agreeably to order, and about noon we were apprized by the report of his artillery, that he was engaged some distance below us. At the same time the enemy were observed in our rear, and their galley and gun-boats approached our flanks, and opened a fire upon us, which obliged me to order a battery of 18 pounders to be planted, and a shot from it compelled the vessels of the enemy to retire, together with their troops, after some firing between the advanced parties. But by this time, in consequence of disembarking and re-embarking the heavy guns, the day was so far spent, that our pilots did not dare enter the Saut, (eight miles a continued rapid) and therefore we fell down about two miles and came to for the night. Early next morning every thing was in readiness for motion; but having received no intelligence from gen. Brown, I was still delayed, as sound caution prescribed I should learn the result of his affair, before I committed the flotilla to the Saut. At half past ten o'clock A. M. an officer of dragoons arrived with a letter, in which the general informed me he had forced the enemy, and would reach the foot of the Saut early in the day.—Orders were immediately given for the flotilla to sail, at which instant the enemy's gun-boats appeared, and began to throw shot among us. Information was brought me at the same time from brig. gen. Boyd, that the enemy's troops were advancing in column. I immediately sent orders for him to attack them; this report was soon contradicted. Their gun-boats however continued to scratch us, and variety of reports of their movements and counter movements were brought to me in succession; which convinced me of their determination to hazard an attack, when it could be done to the greatest advantage,—and therefore I resolved to anticipate them. Directions were accordingly sent by that distinguished officer col. Swift, of the engineers, to brig. gen. Boyd, to throw the detachments of his command, assigned to him in the order of the preceding day, and composed of his own, Covington's and Swartwout's brigades, into three columns, to march upon the enemy, outflank them if possible, and take their artillery. The action soon after commenced with the advanced body of the enemy, and became extremely sharp and galling, and, with occasional pauses, not sustained with great vivacity, in open space and fair combat, for upwards of two and a half hours,—the adverse lines alternately yielding and advancing. It is impossible to say with accuracy what was our number on the field,—because it consisted of indefinite detachments taken from the boats to render safe the passage of the Saut. Generals Covington and Swartwout voluntarily took part in the action, at the head of detachments from their respective brigades, and exhibited the same courage that was displayed by brig. gen. Boyd, who happened to be the senior officer on the ground. Our force engaged might have reached sixteen or seventeen hundred men, but actually did not exceed eighteen hundred; that of the enemy was estimated from twelve hundred to two thousand, but did not probably amount to more than fifteen or sixteen hundred—consisting, as I am informed, of detachments from the 39th, 84th and 104th regiments of the line; with three companies of the Voltigeur and Glengary corps, and the militia of the country, who are not included in the estimate.

It would be presumptuous in me to attempt to give you a detailed account of the affair, which certainly reflects high honor on the valor of the American soldier, as no examples can be produced of undisciplined men, with inexperienced officers, braving a fire of two hours and a half, without quitting the field or yielding to their antagonist. But, sir, the information I now give you, is derived from officers in my confidence, who took active parts in this conflict; for though I was enabled to order the attack, it was my hard fortune not to be able to lead the troops I commanded. The disease with which I was assailed on the 2d of September, on my journey to Fort George, having, with a few short intervals of convalescence, preyed on me ever since, and at the moment of this action, I was confined to my bed and emaciated almost to a skeleton, unable to set on my horse or to move ten paces without assistance.

I must, however, be pardoned for trespassing on your time a few remarks in relation to the affair. The objects of the British and American commanders were precisely opposed—the last being bound by the instructions of his government, and the most solemn obligations of duty, to precipitate his descent on the St. Lawrence by every practicable means; because this being effected, one of the greatest difficulties opposed to the American arms would be surmounted; and the first, by duties equally imperious, to retard, and if possible, prevent such descent. He is to be accounted victorious who effected his purpose! The British commander, having failed to gain either of his objects, can lay no claim to the honors of the day. The battle fluctuated, and triumph seemed, at different times, inclined to the contending corps. The front of the enemy were at first forced back more than a mile, and, though they never regained the ground they lost, their stand was permanent and their charges resolute. Amidst these charges and near the close of the contest we lost a field piece by the fall of the officer who was serving it with the same coolness as if he had been at a parade of review. This was lieutenant Smith, of the light artillery, who, in point of merit, stood at the head of his grade. The enemy having halted and our troops being again formed into battalion front to front, we resumed our position on the bank of the river, and the infantry being much fatigued, the whole were re-embarked and proceeded down the river without any further annoyance from the enemy or their gun-boat, while the dragoons with five pieces of light artillery marched down the Canada shore without molestation.

It is due to his rank, to his worth and his services, that I should make particular mention of brigadier-general Covington, who received a mortal wound directly through the body while animating his men and leading them to the charge. He fell, where he fought, at the head of his men, and survived but two days.

The next morning the flotilla passed through the Saut and joined that excellent officer brigadier-general Brown, at Barnhart's, near Cornwall, where he had been instructed to take post and wait my arrival, and where I confidently expected to hear of major-general Hampton's arrival on the opposite shore. But immediately after I halted, colonel Atkinson, the inspector-general of the division under major-general Hampton, waited on me with a letter from that officer, in which, to my unexpressed regret and surprise, he declined the junction ordered, and informed he was marching towards lake Champlain by way of co-operating in the proposed attack on Montreal. This letter, together with a copy of that to which it is an answer, was immediately transmitted to a council of war, composed of my general officers and the colonel commanding the Elite, the chief engineer and the adjutant-general, who unanimously gave it as their opinion that the attack on Montreal should be abandoned for the present season, and the army near Cornwall should be immediately crossed to the American shore for taking up winter quarters, and that this place afforded an eligible position for such quarters.

I requested in these opinions, not from the shortness of the stock of provisions, (which had been reduced by the acts of God) because that of our meat had been increased five days, and our bread had been reduced only two days, and because we could, in case of extremity, have lived on the enemy; but because the loss of the division under major-general Hampton weakened my force too sensibly to justify the attempt. In all my measures and movements of moment, I have taken the opinions of my general officers, which have been in accord with my own.

I remained on the Canada shore until next day, without seeing or hearing from the "powerful force" of the enemy in our neighborhood, and the same day reached the position with the artillery and infantry. The dragoons have been ordered to Utica and its vicinity, and I expect are fifty or sixty miles on the march.

You have under cover a summary abstract of the killed and wounded in the affair of the 11th inst. which shall soon be followed by a particular return, in which a just regard shall be paid to individual merits. The dead rest in honor, and the wounded bleed for their country and deserve its gratitude.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient, humble servant,

(Signed) JAMES WILKINSON.

Extract of a letter of the 15th of November from general Wilkinson.

"It is a fact, for which I am authorised to pledge myself on the most confidential authority, that on the fourth of the present month, the British garrison of Montreal consisted solely of 450 marines and 200 sailors, which had been sent up from Quebec. We have with the provisos here and that left at Chateauguay, about forty days subsistence, to which I shall add thirty more."

Gen. Armstrong, secretary of War.

Head-Quarters of the army, 7 miles above Ogdenburg, November 6th, 1813, (in the evening).

SIR—I address you in the special instance of the secretary of war, who by bad roads, worse weather and ill health, was diverted from meeting me near this place, and determined to tread back his steps to Washington from Antwerp on the 29th ult.

I am destined to an I determined on the attack of Montreal, if not prevented by some act of God; and to give security to the enterprise, the division under your command must co-operate with the corps under my immediate orders; the point of rendezvous is the circumstance of greatest interest to the issue of this operation, and the distance which separates us, and my ignorance of the practicability of the direct or devious roads or routes by which you must march, make it necessary that your own judgment should determine the point; to assist you in making the soundest determination, and to the most prompt and effectual measures, I can only inform you of my intentions and situation in some respects of first importance. I shall pass Prescott to-night, because the stage of the season will not allow me three days to take it, shall cross the cavalry at Hamilton, which will not require a day. I shall thence pass forward and break down every obstruction to this river with Grand river, thence to cross the Isle Perrot, and with my scows to bridge the narrow inner channel and thus obtain foothold on Montreal Island about twenty miles from the city; after which our artillery, bayonets and swords must secure our triumph or provide us honorable graves.

Enclosed you have a memorandum of field and battering train, pretty well found in fixed ammunition, which may enable you to dismiss your own; but we are deficient in loose powder and musket cartridges, and therefore hope you may be abundantly found.

On the subject of provisions I wish I could give as favorable information; our whole stock of bread may be computed at about fifteen days, and our meat at twenty. In speaking on this subject to the secretary of war, he informed me ample magazines were laid up on Lake Champlain, and therefore I must request of you to order forward two or three months supply by the safest route, in a direction to the proposed scene of action. I have submitted the state of our provisions to my general officers, who unanimously agree that it should not prevent the progress of the expedition; and they also agree in opinion, that if you are not in force to face the enemy, you should meet us at St. Regis or its vicinity.

I shall expect to hear from, if not see you at that place on the 9th, and have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient humble servant,

(Signed) J. A. WILKINSON.

Major general Hampton.

From general Hampton to general Wilkinson.

Head-Quarters, Four Corners, Nov. 8, 1813.

SIR—I had the honor to receive, at a late hour last evening, by Colonel King, your communication of the 6th, and was deeply impressed with the sense of responsibility it imposed of deciding upon the means of our co-operation. The idea suggested as the opinion of your officers of effecting the junction at St. Regis, was the most pleasing, as most immediate, and if I came to the disclosure of the amount of your supplies of provisions. Colonel Atkinson will explain the reasons that would have rendered it impossible for me to have brought more than each man could have carried on his back; and when I reflect ed that in throwing myself upon your scanty means, I should be weakening you in your most vulnerable point, I did not hesitate to adopt the opinion, after consulting the general and principal officers, that by throwing myself back on my main depot, when all the means of transportation had gone, and falling upon the enemy's flank, and straining every effort to open a communication from Plattsburgh to Coghna-aga, or any other point you may indicate on the St. Lawrence, I should more effectually contribute to your success, than by the junction at St. Regis. The way is in many places blocked and abated, and the road impracticable for wheel carriages during winter—but by the employment of pack horses, if I am not overpowered, I hope to be able to prevent your starving. I have ascertained and witnessed that the plan of the enemy is to burn and consume every thing in our advance. My troops and other means will be described to you by Colonel Atkinson. Besides their rawness and sickness, they have endured fatigues equal to a winter campaign, in the late snows and bad weather, and are sadly dispirited and fallen off: but upon the subject I must refer you to Colonel Atkinson.

With these means, what can be accomplished by human exertion, I will attempt. With a mind devoted to the general objects of the campaign, I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

W. HAMPTON.

His exc. major-general James Wilkinson.

GENERAL WILKINSON TO GENERAL ARMSTRONG.

Head-Quarters, French Mills,

November 18, 1813.

SIR—I beg this may be considered as an appendage to my official communication respecting the action of the 11th instant. I last evening received the enclosed information, the result of the examination of sundry prisoners, taken on the field of battle, which justifies the opinion of the surviving general officers who were in the engagement: this goes to prove, that although the imperious obligations of duty did not allow me sufficient time to route the enemy, they were beaten—the accidental loss of one field piece notwithstanding, after it had been discharged fifteen or twenty times. I have also learned, from what is considered good authority, but I will not vouch for the correctness of it, that the enemy's loss exceeded five hundred killed and wounded. The enclosed report will correct an error in my former communications—as it appears it was the 89th, and not the 84th British regiment which was engaged on the 11th. I beg leave to mention, relative to the action of the 11th, what, from my own inadvertence, I have omitted: having received information late in the day, that the contest had become somewhat dubious, I ordered up a reserve of six hundred men, whom I had directed to stand by their arms, under lieutenant-colonel Upham, who gallantly led them into the action, which terminated a few minutes after their arrival on the ground.

With much consideration and respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obt. humble servant,

JAS. WILKINSON.

The hon. John Armstrong, sec'y at war.

GENERAL WILKINSON'S ARMY.—JOURNAL.

Grenadier Island, October 30.—This day the advance corps of the army left this island under general Brown, on a most important expedition to Canada. The concentration of the expedition has been long delayed by events which none but He who holds the winds and waves in control, could have averted.

Nov. 2.—The day the rear division of the expedition sailed in a flotilla of boats, which have covered the river for nearly five miles. The dragoons have been sent down by land on the American side of the river. They amount to about 500—the infantry and other arms are estimated at from 7 to 10,000. From this island, which is situated at the east end of Lake Ontario, to Montreal, following the course of the river, is estimated at 180 miles.

St. Lawrence River, Nov. 2.—The van of the expedition has arrived at French creek, about 18 miles from Grenadier island. Here it was attacked yesterday and to day, by a flotilla from Kingston, which attacks were returned and repulsed. Our loss 10 killed and wounded. The flotilla returned to Kingston.

Nov. 2.—The whole expedition concentrates at French Creek.

Nov. 4.—The expedition is passing down the river—has cleared the Thousand Islands—and is approaching Augusta (or Prescott) where the British have a strong fort and garrison: but where the river is nearly two miles wide. The army can pass far out of point-blank shot.

Nov. 7.—Last night the army passed fort Prescott (Prevost). The general resorted to the expedient of sending some old boats forward, on which the British artillerymen exhausted their long shot; and the army passed harmless, excepting from one shot which killed two men and wounded three others. The expedition this day reached Hamilton which is about 20 miles below Prescott and Ogdensburg, and about 95 miles from Montreal.

Nov. 9.—The expedition has halted at Hamilton. The dragoons which had marched down the river on the American side, were this day embarked on board scows and boats, and landed near Williamsburg. At the same time about 1,500 men of gen. Boyd's brigade were also landed, with a view to cover the boats through the rapids, where the defiles are narrow and where the enemy have erected block houses. The dragoons could not conveniently be transported down the rapid part of the river in the boats. The expedition will move down, pari passu, with the troops and cavalry landed. Heavy cannonade was heard this day at and near Cornwall on the Canada side, situated about 5 miles above the Indian village of St. Regis, on the boundary line between the United States and Lower Canada.

Nov. 10.—The expedition passed to opposite St. Regis. It is stated to be the intention of general Wilkinson to re-embark the infantry here and take them down lake St. Francois (a part where the river expands into an extensive lake) and that the dragoons should pass round the head of the lake on the Canada side.

Extract of a letter, dated

"Fort Colver, Nov. 14.

"Dear Sir—We had a grand brigade parade yesterday. Our effective force on this side of the river is * men, independent of 300 volunteers that have arrived under the last call of gen. McClure, by order of gen. Harrison. The object of calling on volunteers was, for the purpose of disposing of the enemy of Burlington heights. I think there will be at least 200 volunteers more under the said orders.—Gen. Harrison's force is not far from * effective men. I think we shall be able to start for the heights by Wednesday, with a force of at least * men, besides some Indians. The information that we have received to day by two deserters, stated the force of the enemy to be 1,000 regulars and 1700 Indians, with six 6 pounders, two 9's and one 12, tolerably well fortified on the heights.

Gen. McClure is certainly entitled to much credit, for his exertions in effecting the improvement and discipline of the militia. He has been indefatigable—they are equal in every respect to regulars.—Gen. Harrison has paid us several compliments. He acknowledged that our troops are equal to his in respect to discipline. I do not hesitate to say that a better disciplined body of militia have not been in service this war.

"I have been broke off in my letter by hearing the long roll beat in gen. H's camp. We are all under arms—there is a fleet in sight, and we cannot ascertain whether an enemy or not. I will resume my letter in the morning.

"MONDAY EVENING, Nov. 15.

"The fleet in sight last evening proved to be ours. They came to anchor in the river about 11 o'clock this morning. Our expedition is completely knocked in the head for the present. General Harrison's troops are now embarking for Sackett's Harbor.

NAVAL.

Six of the crew of the Majestic razee got on shore on Cape Cod, and deserted.

The schr. Experiment, Thompson, of New-York, was captured on the 19th, off Cape Henry—a prize-master and three men sent on board and two of the crew taken out, the captain and one man left. Same night captain T. re-captured his vessel. The schr. Federalist, taken by the British, was sent into cape May for ransom. The citizens took possession of the vessel and set the men at liberty. The lieutenant is in Philadelphia.

CAPTAIN CARDEN.—From the United States Gazette.—"I observe that at a public entertainment, lately given in London, very distinguished honors and compliments are bestowed on captain Carden, for his gallant defence of his majesty's ship Alcedonian, against "a superior and overwhelming force." It is well to tell this story now—but it is a fact, that captain Carden will not venture to deny, that when, before the war, he was at Norfolk with his ship, Decatur was also there with the United States; and they were frequently on board each other's vessels. Captain Carden then contended that his was the superior ship and better suited to combat. He said to D. Eaton, if you and I ever meet at sea as enemies, I shall take you—he particularly contended for the advantage of 18 pounders over 24's, considering the adoption of them in the British navy, as a strict improvement; alleging that the 19's could be fired and managed with so much more facility, that in a given time they would throw more weight of metal than the 24's and were equally destructive where they struck."

Expatriation—Impressment.

DESULTORY REMARKS—PERHAPS, NEW.

The late order of the British government communicated through sir George Prevost to major-general Wilkinson, and the proceedings of the President thereon, in ordering forty-six British officers into close confinement, in guarantee for the safety of that number of Americans so held in Quebec, has excited afresh the discussions on the right of expatriation, and renewed the question on the practice of impressment; as it is to the former, that the British advocates mainly depend to excuse their client, with self-known falshy pretending that native Americans are taken only by "mistake."

It is among the arts of "our writers," as John Henry called them, to confound by "much speaking" the plain rule of right—and to enlist, if it be possible, the native prejudices of the people, not only against the administration, but the constitution itself; which they would gladly destroy, that the views of Great Britain may be accomplished.

So much has been said on those subjects that it is hardly to be expected a new idea can be started in relation to them: yet the ground chiefly taken below has not been travelled over, (to the best of my recollection) and may afford some instruction.

Though I am no lawyer, (as it is fashionable for editors to be) but a mere printer, I venture to say, there is no principal of the natural or written law more perfectly understood than this—THAT WHAT THE LAW EXPRESSLY PERMITS A PERSON TO DO, IT WILL JUSTIFY AND SUPPORT HIM IN DOING.

The constitution of the United States provide for the "naturalization of foreigners"—which provision recognizes the right of expatriation, and promises protection to those who exercise it. The two latter are the inevitable consequences of the former.

Is it not rather to be wondered, that Washington and all the able jurists and most venerable sages who so deliberately framed and carefully digested every part of that glorious instrument; and the collected wisdom of the individual states that collated, revised, amended, and finally adopted, our constitution, should never have discovered that it contained a leading principle that was an outrage upon the established law of nations? How much is it to be regretted, that some very learned gentleman, such as the editor of the London Courier, or other more learned editors that I could mention, had not then stepped forward to save this republic from the ban of the civilized world,* for its innovation upon that essential quality that binds society together!

But what are the real merits of the case? The right and efficacy of expatriation is of the oldest tradition. It existed, and was acknowledged, in the days of Moses and Lycurgus, and now exists in every nation, or tribe of people, on the globe, that holds an intercourse with any other nation, or tribe. The very savages, under the name of adoption, recognize it. The forms vary, but the principle is the same in all. If what is and always has been, the universal practice of nations, does not constitute a part of the laws of nations, I should like to know what the laws of nations are. England has many statute laws on the subject of naturalization [see note at the end]; nay, she has acknowledged the right of expatriation by legislating upon the number of emigrants that may leave her territories for those of a foreign state, proportioning them to the tonnage of the vessel in which they are about to depart. But we need of this—the right of expatriation is, ipso facto, recognized in an assumption of the right to naturalize foreigners; for it is impossible to suppose that all nations have, (at all times, past and present) by naturalization, violated the law of nations in regard to expatriation; which law is built upon the usages of nations. Without expatriation there cannot be naturalization. Let the very learned editor of the London Courier, or his more learned fellow craftsmen in the United States, say if this is not so.

When I have thought upon expatriation and naturalization; but more particularly, at times, when I have heard of an American seaman impressed, and flagged by the British, for "refusing to do duty," as the Algerine term is, the interview between Paul and the centurion, as recorded in the 23d chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, has frequently presented itself. A "chief captain" had ordered the Apostle to be "examined by scourging"—

"And when they had bound him with thongs, Paul said to the centurion that stood by, Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman and uncondemned?"

"When the centurion heard that, he went and told the chief captain, saying, Take heed what thou doest; for this man is a Roman."

"Then the chief captain came, and said unto him, Tell me, art thou a Roman? He said, Yea.

"And the chief captain answered, with a great sum obtained I this freedom. And Paul said, but I was free born.

"THEN STRAIGHTWAY THEY DEPARTED FROM HIM WHICH SHOULD HAVE EXAMINED HIM: and the chief captain also was afraid, after he knew that he was a Roman, and because he had bound him."

What a flood of intelligence and field for remark is opened in this beautiful and appropriate passage! Let us briefly apply its various points to the matter before us.

PROPOSITION. Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman and uncondemned?

APPLICATION. The British officers, not the "chief captains" only, but the most unfeeling puppies and infamous brutes that the British navy contains, do, at their own discretion, or caprice, lay hold on, bind, make slaves of, and scourge, the free person of an American citizen, "UNCONDEMNED."

PROV. Take heed what thou doest: FOR THIS MAN IS A ROMAN.

APP. Though it be known to the master, that the person carried off and scourged, is an American citizen, he does not "take heed what he doeth." He would not take from a ship on the high seas, a bag of cotton or hog'shead of tobacco, let him "suspect" them as much as he pleased, because he knows there is a law in respect to those things that may punish him. But has never heard that his government even censured one of its officers for carrying off men, however outrageous the case may have been. He knows that he will be approved for keeping up the complement of his crew; and that the worst that

* "If Mr. Madison proceeds in the course he has taken [to retaliate on the enemy his own barbarity, as shewn in the letter of sir G. Prevost] he will find the whole civilized world against him, without the solitary exception of even Bonaparte himself."

[N. Y. Evening Post.]

can possibly happen to him is, to have him released after months or years of servitude, without remuneration or pay. Such a release is what the British government esteem the very limit of all that justice demands; and there are creatures in the United States who call it "magnanimous" to restore the weather-beaten sailor on these terms!—If instead of a man, a freeman, created in God's own image, he were a senseless bale of cotton or a hoghead of the weed tobacco, his government might prosecute the robbery even to the execution of the robber; and though the flag so protects property that it cannot be touched "uncondemned," the citizen of a free state has no redress or security!—But the time must and will come, when punishment shall be inflicted for this horrible abuse. Decatur's banner, "FREE TRADE AND NO IMPRESSMENT," is nailed to the mast Who is base enough to strike it?—DON'T GIVE UP THE SHIP!"

PROP. Art thou a Roman? And he said, YEA.

APP. When an impressed seaman alleges that he is an American, the British "examining" officer, nine times out of ten, decently calls him a "liar."—If he exhibits the proofs of his citizenship, they are torn to pieces and thrown in his face, with a supercilious observation, that "such things may be purchased for half a crown in America;" or, they are heedlessly handed to the purser to be put among the papers of the ship.

On a former occasion I observed that the work of debasement begun with the use of those papers granted to seamen, called "protections." We do not affect to deny that many obtain them illegally—for perjury and false papers may be expected sometimes to be found on board an American vessel, seeing that the British government have for years justified the use of them as well as of downright forgery—but the grand error was in granting protections at all.—It tacitly admitted that the British might overhaul our vessels for men and take them out at discretion; and the practice had proceeded to such lengths, that an American national vessel of war was actually searched by a press gang from a British ship, during Mr. Adams' administration. This roused the spirit of seventy-six. The president indignantly dismissed the commander that submitted to the indignity; and directed that thereafter the crew of an United States' vessel should never be mustered but by their own officers, on any occasion or in any manner soever. A like demand had been made on rugged old Decatur (father of the present gallant commodore) and the high spirited captain Vincent, at different times. The British boarding lieutenant, modestly requested that our naval officers would exhibit the "protections" [bits of paper] of their men.—"They are there and there," scornfully said these genuine Americans, pointing first at the star spangled banner and then to the guns—and, said Decatur, this is the music that belongs to them," ordering the drums to beat up yankee doodie. These vessels were not searched. Had this stand been taken at the beginning, it is very probable that the present war might have been avoided. But it was thought expedient to attempt to check, rather than strike at the root of the evil, at once. Well do I remember, when a youth, to have heard that venerable whig and most excellent man who now is at the head of the medical staff of the United States, Dr. James Tilton, say to a person who was speaking of the expediency of some political manœuvre, with that firmness in honesty, undissembled piety and bluntness of remark that characterizes him. "Ye sir, but is it just? Do what you believe to be right, and leave the rest to God." To which also the pointed saying of Franklin applies—"He who gives up essential liberty to purchase temporary safety, deserves neither liberty nor safety." I humbly recommend these maxims to the rulers of the present day, and to the people of every class and condition. All of us will find our account in observing them.

PROP. And the chief captain said, with a great sum obtained I turn freedom."

APP. The chief captain was a naturalized citizen of Rome. He had expatriated himself and held a high office in his adopted country. Would not Rome have protected the person of this citizen "against a world in arms?" But to bring the case to an immediate bearing—would not Great Britain protect and defend, at every hazard, any who had become her subjects according to the provisions of her statutes, referred to below, for the naturalization of foreigners? Let us have a plain yea or nay. The question is distinctly stated, and none but a knave will refuse to answer it. I DEFY THE ANSWER. But "our writers" will not answer it.

It is among the arts of those very learned and candid gentlemen, the editor of the London Courier, and his brother editors on this side of the Atlantic, to represent the doctrine of naturalization, as contended for by the United States, as something new and unknown to the law of nations. It is by them to be lamented, that they cannot make it out to be a "French," doctrine: it would rhyme so well with the new "French" notions on the freedom of commerce, & that we should have a most harmonious clamor. It is unfortunate for these gentlemen, that British statutes are now in force and acted upon, more than a hundred years old, for the naturalization of foreigners; investing them with precisely the same rights, as to citizenship, that we do, though with much less formality and probation than is required by the United States. Well—and having made a man a citizen or subject according to law, how shall you deprive him of that protection and those privileges that belong to his new condition? The English law says, that a person so naturalized, "shall, to all intents and purposes, be taken and deemed as a natural born subject." Is it lawful in Great Britain and unlawful in the United States to do the same thing, the law of nations being the umpire?

But, if we want positive evidence that the British government has acknowledged the right of expatriation, we have it in the history of our own revolution. The American people had the right to expatriate themselves, or they were rebels. "Rebels" captured cannot be treated and held as prisoners of war for exchange; but our fathers, taken in battle, were exchanged as "prisoners of war;" and the authority of congress, and of Washington, as their general, was acknowledged very soon after the controversy began. What is the country of the queen of Hanoverburg, a daughter of George and Charlotte Guelph? Is she a subject of England and the queen of a state presumed independent? It is impossible that she can be both. She must be one or the other. Which is she? But a more remarkable case now strikes me. The affair of James Muffet Tandy, a distinguished Irishman, is familiar to every one. The British bullied the free imperial city of Hamburg into a delivery of his person, and they carried him off in triumph, designing to execute him for the double crime of rebellion in Ireland, and of treason for bearing arms against his "legitimate" sovereign, for he had a commission in the French service. But Bonaparte demanded him as a "French" soldier, and he was given up; and even without exchange put down at the place from whence he had been taken.

† See "simulated papers" in various places in the Register. The British government counterfeited and attempted to put into circulation, the continental bills of the United States and assignats of France. THIS IS TREASON!"

§ See "Treaty of Utrecht, vol. 4, 548."

PROP. "Then straightway they departed from him, which should have examined him [i. e. should have scourged him] and the chief captain also was afraid, AFTER HE KNEW THAT HE WAS A ROMAN, and because he had bowed him."

APP. What might be said on this has already been anticipated. Besides, the proposition, in itself, as applied to the things under consideration, is so easily reducible to the cases to which it belongs, that any remark is deemed unnecessary.

We shall only add to this subject of expatriation, that under some and certain conditions, every writer on the public law admits, that a man may cast off his "natural allegiance." It is true, there are cases where it is rank treason to do so. Such, for instance, I should consider it in a person who came to the United States from the British dominions since the war, or even when there was a reasonable certainty that war would take place between the two countries, who should take up arms in our behalf. But he that emigrated lawfully cannot be made criminal, by the course of events, over which he had no control. And though I would not advise or desire that any who were not citizens of the United States when the war began, should take up arms except for local defence; yet those who were citizens, at that time, must be protected as such, or we are nothing. And they will be protected. It is truly ridiculous to observe, that the editor of the London Courier and his brother editors in America, who would give up to be half hung, then have their bowels torn out and thrown in their faces, those naturalized citizens, formerly subjects of England, that may be found in arms against her, eulogize as godlike, the conduct of Morcaut, who was killed in fighting against France.

But these learned and liberal gentlemen very well know that the claim of Great Britain to the services of her "natural born subjects" [just or unjust] is only the pretence for the practice of impressment—the principle is that "his majesty wants men and must have them." Britain has from 30 to 100,000 "foreign seamen" in her navy and merchant vessels—shall she accuse us of inveigling her sailors? The excuse is too pitiful.

Let any of those gentlemen, so learned in the laws of nations, so well convinced of the magnanimity and justice of the British government, and so zealous that "their king should have his own," attend to the queries below. I indignantly hurl them into the teeth of the advocates; let us have no twisting or turning, with a rignarole of words long enough to unite Boston with Halifax, but a plain, simple, candid answer, to exonerate or condemn. I should like to see those folks attempt to reconcile the practice of my enemy, with the abstract principles they contend for on behalf of their friend.

1. It is notorious, that some few hundreds of impressed American seamen have been "given up," as the British call it, since the war, without any new proofs of their citizenship, Why were not these men released before the war?

2. It is officially stated by the British government that those impressed seamen given up, as aforesaid, were and would be held as prisoners for exchange.—

On what principle of law or moral justice are these men so treated?

3. Swedes, Danes and Germans, nay, even Frenchmen, who had emigrated to the United States, and become citizens, have been impressed—and on being demanded by the American government, refused a release on the ground that they were Swedes, Danes, Germans or Frenchmen. THIS IS OFFICIAL. If "his majesty" requires only his own subjects, why were these men taken and retained?

4. Acknowledged natives of the United States, on being demanded as impressed seamen, have been refused to be given up, on the plea, that they had married English women. Is the simple fact of a sailor's wedding more competent to the naturalization of a foreigner, according to the laws of nations, than the five years probation, and solemn engagements required by the United States?

5. Would the British suffer the crews of their vessels to be overhauled for men, as they overhaul American vessels?

6. And, lastly,—Who is he that shall sign a treaty with Great Britain to admit, that an American vessel may be searched, and her men carried away, at any time, at the discretion or caprice of any of the king's officers? Recollect, that the impressment of seamen is a point in the controversy, and that a treaty which shall deny or admit the right or practice, must be made, let peace come when it will.

Will the learned gentleman come "foot to foot" and meet these simple propositions? They are definite, and require nothing by way of preface or preamble beginning with, a "little while before Adam was created." They want but honesty in the respondent. If there is ONE honest man that excuses impressment, let HIM answer.

NOTE.

Laws of Great Britain on the subject of naturalization.

"And for the better encouraging of foreign mariners and seamen, to come and serve on board ships belonging to the kingdom of Great Britain; be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That every such foreign mariner or seaman, who shall from and after the said 25th day of April, have faithfully served on board her majesty's ships of war, or any privateer, or merchant or trading ship or ships, vessel or vessels, which at the time of such service shall belong to any of her majesty's subjects of Great Britain, for the space of two years, shall, to all intents and purposes, be deemed and taken to be a natural born subject of her majesty's kingdom of Great Britain, and have and enjoy all the privileges, powers, rights and capacities, which such foreign mariner, or seaman, could, should, ought to have had and enjoyed, in case he had been a natural born subject of her majesty, and actually a native within the kingdom of Great Britain."—(6 Anno, c. 37, sec. 39)

"By statute 13, Geo. 2, c. 3, every foreign seaman who in time of war serves two years on board an English ship by virtue of the king's proclamation, is ipso facto naturalized under the like restrictions as in 12 W. 3, c. 2: (which statute of W. merely prohibits such naturalized foreigner from being a member of the privy council or of parliament, and from having grant of lands from the crown)—and by statute 13, Geo. 2, c. 7, 29. Geo. 2, c. 44, 22. Geo. 2, c. 45, 2. Geo. 3, c. 25 and 13. Geo. 3, c. 25, all foreign protestants and Jews, upon their residing seven years in any of the American colonies, without being absent above two months at a time, and all foreign protestants serving two years in a military capacity there, or being three years employed in the whale fishery, without afterwards absenting themselves from the king's dominions for more than one year, and none of them falling within the incapacities declared by a statute 4, Geo. 2, c. 21, shall be (upon taking the oath) of allegiance and supremacy, or in some cases making an affirmation to the same effect) naturalized to all intents and purposes as if they had been born in this kingdom; except as to sitting in parliament or being of the privy council and holding offices or grants of land, &c. from the crown within the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. By statute 26, Geo. 3, c. 29, s. 34, 27, 28 and 29. Geo. 3, c. 20, s. 25, every foreigner who has established himself and family in Great Britain and carried on the whale fishery and imported the produce thereof for the space of five years successively, is declared to be entitled to all the privileges of a natural born subject.

For the first paragraph we are indebted to the remarks of a master writer in the Boston Patriot. The others were collected by the editor of the Pennsylvania Republican, who handsomely observes—

“The terms of naturalization are different in Great Britain and the United States; but the principles are the same. If Great Britain naturalizes and protects foreigners, how can she deny the United States the same right?”

TO THE PATRONS OF THE WEEKLY REGISTER.

The frequent want of room to insert and preserve all that is due to the political and civil history of these eventful times, induced the editor, in his last number, to say, that an important proposition would be submitted to his readers in the present sheet.* But previous to entering upon this matter, he wishes it clearly understood, that no step will be taken to jeopardize the liberal support the existing plan of publication receives; nor shall an alteration take place but upon the most unequivocal testimony that a LARGE MAJORITY of the friends of the work are in favor of the procedure.

It has often been desired by distinguished gentlemen in many parts of the United States, that the REGISTER should have such an increase of matter as to take in, in detail, all that is comprehended in its plan. Partially to effect this, the editor procured a very costly small type, which is set up at a heavy additional expence; but this type is so much objected to, that the disposition to give the matter is always at variance with the inclination to gratify those who wish it excluded, because they cannot read it with satisfaction: and the fact is, that little more than half of the articles are, or can be inserted, which are deemed necessary to complete and fill up the various purposes to which which the work is devoted.

It has, therefore, been suggested, that two sheets, or, at least, a sheet and a half per week, should be issued, with a proportionate advance in the cost of the subscription.

Whereupon it is proposed, A LARGE MAJORITY OF THE FRIENDS OF THE REGISTER AGREEING THEREON, AS AFORESAID, that, at least a sheet and a half, on the average, shall be published weekly, making two volumes per annum, as heretofore, and the subscription be seven instead of five dollars a year, in advance.

This additional space would enable the editor to insert all the [interesting] laws of the United States, and of the several states; many documents, speeches and debates; foreign official papers and proceedings; and a mighty mass of matter that now is, and otherwise must needs be, reluctantly omitted. The present plan of the work will be rigidly observed, nor shall any material alteration be made, except in the number of pages issued in a year, and the price required for them. And, though, in general, a sheet and a half will be published weekly, the right must be reserved of sometimes issuing two sheets, or even more, at a time, provided that it shall appear advantageous to do so; and of course, of omitting the general additional half-sheet, so as to bring the whole to a proper average. But extra, or gratuitous numbers, shall be published as hitherto.

In point of economy, this plan will probably be approved by those who receive the REGISTER as a book of record and reference, the charge for binding will be but little, if any, enhanced; and, on the whole, the two volumes per annum, containing the usual matter of THREE, will cost about one dollar and twenty five cents less, than that matter would do as published at present.

The editor freely confesses that this proposition is thrown out for the consideration of his friends, rather to gratify others than of his own will; for the increased labor and responsibility is not seen without apprehension and dread. But if such is the will of the patrons of the REGISTER, the attempt shall be made; and arrangements entered into to preserve the flattering reputation the work now enjoys.

The present volume will end with February next. To try the opinion of his readers, the editor will with next week, or as soon as may be, transmit to his agents proposal papers on which they will be invited to enter their eyes and noses, as speedily as they can. If the “eyes have it” by a GREAT MAJORITY OF ALL THE SUBSCRIBERS, the change will be made; if otherwise, no alteration can or will be attempted. Those neglecting their assent will be counted as in the negative.

GLORIOUS POSTSCRIPT

The editor has just received a letter from his friend at Nashville, Ten. communicating many particulars of an action between gen. Jackson and the British allies, the Creek Indians, fought on the 7th ult. in which the enemy was completely defeated with the loss of two hundred and seventy eight killed. —It was supposed many more were slain that had not been found, on account of the high grass that covered the field of battle. The Indians were 1100 strong and engaged in besieging a fort of Friendly Indians, who on being released were ready to join their forces with ours. We had 15 men killed and 84 wounded, generally slightly. The battle was fought at Telledega, about 30 miles from the Hickory ground. Among the trophies of victory was a standard bearing the Spanish cross! Particulars hereafter.

A “British official” on the battle that Boyd had with the enemy, is received. It states that they defeated a force exceeding 4,000 men, and made 400 prisoners.

Letters from Plattsburg dated Nov. 21, say that Hampton had received orders to join Wilkinson at French Mills.

Letters from New-York announce the receipt of intelligence from Halifax which state, that in a dreadful gale of wind at that place, the La Hogue 74 and Atalanta sloop of war were totally lost; and that all the vessels in port, except three were driven on shore, among them the St. Domingo 74.

We have Bordeaux accounts to the 20th October. Nothing new. The French still remain at Dresden, evidently preparing for some great enterprise. A new conscription of 28,000 men had been levied, and 30,000 more were marching into Spain.

Mr. Giles TO THE PEOPLE OF VIRGINIA.

From the Virginia Argus.
No. 1.

It has not been usual with me to address you, fellow-citizens, upon the state of your public concerns; because I had heretofore believed, that the publication of the acts of your government, together with the conduct of the respective public agents concerned therein, would alone be sufficient to enable you properly to estimate both. In ordinary times, I still presume, this would be the case. But the present extraordinary crisis, has called into action the public sensibility in an extraordinary degree, and given rise to an unusual number of pretenders to public favor and support. These professed devotees to your interests, availing themselves of this state of things with an unusual activity and zeal, through the medium of the public prints, have so confounded truth and falsehood; and so misrepresented or disguised the principles and motives of such of your representatives, as they consider obnoxious to their views; that it requires more than an ordinary degree of attention to form a correct judgement upon public affairs, and upon the merits or demerits of those engaged in their administration. The easy accessibility to the printing presses, through anonymous disguises, has enabled these spurious patriots, to practise with success upon the public credulity, and thus to effect their own selfish purposes, when, if stripped of these disguises, instead of the disinterested patriots exclusively devoted to your interests, and forgetting his own, you would often find, concealed beneath the veil, the ambitious demagogue intent exclusively upon his own personal aggrandizement at your expense; or the unprincipled parasite, prostituting the efforts of his mind for the advancement of his patron to gain his daily bread; being too lazy to obtain it by honest means.

The object of this address, therefore, will be, to dissipate all these false disguises, and present to you the real state of the facts and the case connected with some of the most important of the recent measures of the government, and to explain as far as I have had any in them, the real principles and motives of my own conduct. It might reasonably be expected that this alone would be sufficient to exempt them from all the malicious and stupid imputations, which have lately been thrown against them before the public and certainly would be so, if the public mind were formed an impartial tribunal. But I do not flatter myself with so fortunate a result. Because from the artifices I have already described, and from other concurring causes, prejudices and resentments have certainly been excited to a considerable degree; and, when the passions and prejudices of the best of men are once fully brought into action, the voice of truth and reason is raised in vain. It is like the eloquence of philosophy and fortitude, address'd to hungry stomachs in time of famine. It is not heard, and of course not regarded. Stomachs have no ears; as destitute of ears for the reception of truth and reason, are the passions and prejudices of mankind. Notwithstanding the influence of this conviction, I have deemed it my duty to you, after much reflection, to furnish you with the means of judging correctly in these important respects. It is a duty I owe also to myself, to explain the principles and motives of my conduct, whatever be the reception or the consequences of such explanation. Another motive has great influence with me for this proceeding. It is the high respect I feel for the opinions of posterity. It is the love of future fame; at least so far, as it regards honorable feeling, and purity of motive. If the names of those who have lately been engaged in conducting the momentous concerns of this country, should be handed down to posterity, as certainly they will be; how important is it to every one concerned, who feels this passion, that posterity should be furnished with the means of judging rightly? because, when these are afforded, posterity being always impartial and just, will always render a right verdict, and pronounce a right judgment. Time, and very little time, too, will sweep from this earth, the present generation, with all its busy, angry, transitory passions, so highly excited, at this time, by the peculiarly agitated state of the world; and then, and not till then, will the actions of those now engaged in directing the destiny of nations, be seen in their true light! and sentence upon the character of each individual pronounced accordingly.

But before I enter upon the particular topics of this address, I wish to promise, if, in the course of it, it should appear, as it will appear, that differences of opinion, and differences of no inconsiderable magnitude, have existed between the administration and myself, upon some of the most important points of policy adopted by the government; it is far from my intention, for that cause, to censure the administration; and still less, the president of the United States individually. I wish such differences to be ascribed, as I am sure they ought to be ascribed, solely to the intricacies of our nature; which are in a greater or less degree, common to all men; and by no means to improper motives on either part. Few men of the United States have had more opportunities of judging of the motives of the president, than myself; and these opportunities have, at all times, assured me of their unsullied purity; nor is there any man who would derive more pleasure from bearing this honorable testimony in his favor to the world, upon all proper occasions.— But notwithstanding my habitual confidence in the purity of his motives, and my respectful deference for his opinions, I cannot make an unhallowed sacrifice of the convictions of my own judgment at the shrine of those sensibilities, nor eulogize, nor support measures affecting the best interests of my country; which, after the most diligent exercise of the faculties of my own mind, I conscientiously believe to be founded in errors: merely because, I believe at the same time, those errors, to be unintentional, especially when I well know that the effects of such errors upon society will in no respect depend upon the good or evil motives which dictated them. I would also remark, that in examining and judging of the measures of the president, it is but common justice to him, always to recollect, that he has been called to the administration of the government, under circumstances presenting the most unexampled difficulties. Difficulties arising from internal, as well as external causes, and both equally beyond his control; and, therefore, his measures ought to be viewed with the most liberal indulgence; even by those who confidently fancy they see in them unfortunate aberrations from the true interests of his country. Nor do I believe, amidst all his surrounding difficulties, that the president has received that assistance, from what is generally called his cabinet, which at other times, and under other circumstances, might have been expected from it. Its organization, at this time, I believe to be peculiarly unfortunate. Nor do I believe, that his genuine original views of the national interests, have been at all improved, by the intrusions of other self-created advisers.

Amidst so many embarrassments, too liberal allowances for unintentional errors cannot be indulged. In this spirit of liberal indulgence, and with no other object in view than the discovering of truth, I shall proceed to execute the task before me. In doing so, I propose to invert the order of time, by bringing first to your consideration topics of more recent dates, and these will probably throw back our reflections to others, more remote in point of time, but not less interesting in point of character.—Let me then first call your attention to the message of the president, nominating Mr. Russell, to be minister plenipotentiary to Sweden, and the proceedings of the senate thereupon.

The message is as follows.

Monday, May 31.—The following written message was received from the president of the United States, by Mr. Graham.

To the Senate of the United States.

The Swedish government having repeatedly manifested a desire to interchange a public minister with the United States, and having lately appointed one with that view, and other considerations concurring to render it advisable at this period to make a correspondent appointment, I nominate Jonathan Russell, of Rhode Island, to be minister plenipotentiary of the United States to Sweden.

JAMES MADISON.

May 29, 1813.

Circumstances, which it is not necessary to mention here prevented me from taking my seat in the senate, till about the fourth of June; the senate had previously adopted the following resolution, amongst other proceedings in relation to the message:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the senate the correspondence which may have passed between the United States and the king of Sweden respecting the interchange of public ministers between the said governments.

The reply to which was laid before the senate on the 7th in the following words:

The secretary of state, to whom was referred the resolution of the senate of the third instant, requesting the president to cause to be laid before the senate the correspondence which may have passed between the United States and the king of Sweden, respecting the interchange of public ministers, has the honor to report to the president, that no direct correspondence has taken place on the subject.

In reference to the object of the resolution, the secretary of state, submitted several extracts of letters from Mr. Speyer, consul of the United States at Stockholm, and a letter from Mr. Beasley, commissary of prisoners at London, by which the wishes and intentions of the Swedish government in relation to the interchange of ministers, have been made known to this department.

Respectfully submitted,

JAMES MONROE.

Department of State, June 7, 1813.

In this stage of the business it became my duty to enter into the consideration of the subject.

It will not escape observation, that this report disclaims all direct communications between the two governments respecting the interchange of public ministers. The desire of Sweden in that respect is stated to be contained in the extracts accompanying the report of correspondences from our consul at Stockholm, and our commissary of prisoners at London. Upon examination, it will be found that the terms of the president's message are somewhat peculiar in several respects. They profess to intend to make a "correspondent appointment;" on the part of the United States with the one already made on the part of Sweden; and they contain some intimation of an intention to invest our minister with powers for some objects, without specifying the precise powers to be given, or the objects to be effected by them. These circumstances produced some difficulties in expounding the real objects of the nomination, which were rather increased, than lessened, by the report of the secretary of state. The correspondence disclosed by that report ascertained a fact, which before was only conjecture, that the public minister appointed on the part of Sweden was not of equal grade with the one nominated on the part of the United States; and of course, such nomination could not carry into effect the professed object of the message, to wit: "to make a correspondent appointment," equality in grade being deemed an essential requisite, to render the appointments correspondent. But the message at the same time informs the senate, that there were "other considerations concurring to render it advisable at this period to make a correspondent appointment." Mr. Russell is therefore nominated "minister plenipotentiary" and not "minister resident, corresponding" with the character of the Swedish minister actually appointed to the United States. There is not only a difference in the grade and compensation, between a minister resident, and a minister plenipotentiary, the one from the United States being entitled to receive a sum not exceeding 6,000 dollars outfit, and 6,000 per annum, the other 9,000 dollars on outfit and 9,000 per annum, at the discretion of the president; but the most important difference consists in this consideration—that the one is a mere formal complimentary minister, the other is an efficient, operative one—the one, is usually without powers for any material objects; the other, is usually invested with powers for material objects. The real policy and objects of this nomination, therefore, must be looked for in words "other considerations concurring to render it advisable at this period, to make a correspondent appointment." The terms "other considerations" are vague and indefinite. They do not conduct the mind to any precise objects or results; yet in the estimation of the president, the objects comprehended in them could be of no inconsiderable magnitude, when they furnished sufficient inducement to him, not only to reciprocate the diplomatic civilities, asked for on the part of Sweden, but to supersede them.

It was not possible from these terms, for the senate to comprehend with sufficient practical certainty the real policy or objects of this nomination; and yet some understanding of them seemed essential to its proper deliberations on the subject. Its difficulties in that respect were rather increased, by referring to the extracts of the correspondence laid before it. For from them it appeared, that the original intention of Sweden, was, to send only a charge des affaires, to the United States, the lowest grade of public ministers; and that this intention was afterwards changed solely for the accommodation of the person appointed. An intimation was also contained in an extract of a letter from Mr. Speyer our consul at Stockholm, of the 25th September, 1812, in the following words:

"The prince royal informed me the 4th instant, that he had directed Mr. Kantzow to represent to the English government his desire to see a good understanding restored with the United States."

Which gave the transaction a character of peculiar interest and delicacy; whilst it threw no certain light upon the real objects of the nomination. In this state of uncertainty and embarrassment, feeling no small solicitude to act understandingly upon a subject involving so many considerations, on the 14th of June, after mature deliberation, the senate passed a resolution, requesting a respectful conference with the president upon the subject of the nomination; the evident object of which was to obtain from him information of his real inducement to the measure. After several assignations to receive the committee of conference, the president by message of the 6th July, directed to the senate, declined the proposed conference altogether. These proceedings required shall receive a distinct consideration. The president having thus substantially refused to explain to the senate the real object of the nomination, it was of course left to its own reflections and conjectures upon the subject, with such lights as it therwise possesses. For it cannot escape the observation of the attentive reader, that although the president in his message tenders to the senate, "the available information in the possession of the executive," he gives no intimation of a disposition to explain, formally or informally, the real objects or policy covered by the expressions, "other considerations occurring to render it advisable at this period to make a correspondent appointment," &c. &c. he runs "information," relative exclusively to facts. It is often called for by resolution. The term "considerations," relates exclusively to opinions. They are never intentionally called for from the president by resolutions on account of its evident indecorum. The senate being thus left to itself with this diplomatic puzzle to unravel, commence the perplexing duty by endeavoring to ascertain what considerations other than a desire to reciprocate diplomatic civilities with Sweden, could, at this period, have induced the president to nominate a minister plenipotentiary on the part of the United States in exchange for a minister resident on the part of Sweden.

With such information as I possessed after the best reflections I could bestow upon the subject, essentially enlightened too by the judicious reflections of other members of the senate, I could conceive of no considerations which did not relate to one of the following objects: either the interposition of the good offices of Sweden to obtain peace with Great Britain, as auxiliary to the Russian mediation, was thus to be solicited on the part of the United States; the personal accommodation of Mr. Russell was thus to be consulted; it being known that he was willing to accept the appointment of minister resident. Would either of these considerations justify this diplomatic eccentricity in our foreign intercourse? The first of these considerations gave to the transaction a character deeply interesting to the nation in many points of view. The second was of subordinate importance. It either presented a general change upon a point of policy held sacred by the government from its commencement, to wit: not to end political connections in Europe, nor multiply diplomatic agencies there, especially with the minor powers; or some special and great object of a temporary nature to be effected "at this period." The first of these objects suggests so many delicate considerations towards the minor powers of Europe, that it will be passed over with only a few general remarks. The unfortunate geographical position of the few remaining powers of this description, in the neighborhood of the great powers on the continent of Europe, and the weakness of the one, compared to the strength of the other, necessarily subject the one, without the smallest imputation upon the government, at all times in some degree to the influence of the other—of course it is impossible in the nature of things that a permanent, distinct, and independent political connection can be established between the United States* and any one of these minor powers. A political agent at any one of them, therefore, would having nothing to do, and it is generally found, that one placed abroad with nothing to do, will find business for himself by doing mischief. At least it furnishes him with an inducement to do so, as he will readily conclude that his place will not be of long continuance without something to do. Instead of a general change in this point of policy, therefore, its propriety is sanctioned by both experience and reflection.

If then the object was of a temporary character, and consisted in the policy of soliciting the interposition of Sweden, as auxiliary to the mediation of Russia, for the purpose of obtaining peace with Great Britain, it becomes a question deeply interesting to the power and dignity of the United States, to determine, whether on the 9th day of July last that policy ought to have been adopted by the United States—that being the day on which the senate resolved, "That it is inexpedient at this time to send a minister plenipotentiary to Sweden."

In examining this question I shall impose great restraints upon myself, lest I might unintentionally be betrayed into expressions which might possibly be construed into a want of respect to the course of policy attributed to the president of the United States. Let me then entreat you, fellow-citizens, to reflect and determine for yourselves, whether, under the circumstances existing on the 9th of July last, the solicitation of Sweden to interpose her good offices in co-operation with Russia to obtain peace with Great Britain, would have promoted the dignity, the honor or the interest of the United States? Would it have had any tendency to procure peace? On the other hand, might it not have had some tendency to defeat its own object? It should be recollected, that whether the mediation of Russia was offered of her own voluntary motion or not, it was by that day clearly ascertained that it was not sought for by Great Britain; and it was then believed that the overture was coolly received by her, and if not promptly rejected was certainly not promptly accepted. What benefit then could be raised

* A commercial connection has for a long time existed between the United States and Sweden. This has no relation to a political connection. It is superintended by consuls, who are commercial and not political agents. These depend upon their official perquisites from commerce for their compensations. No fixed salaries are allowed them by government. Political agents are allowed fixed salaries. In the present state of our commerce with Sweden might not Mr. Speyer prefer a political to a commercial agency! It appears from his correspondence, that he declines presenting his consulate credentials, until the point of a political connection with Sweden should be settled in the United States.—Cui Bono?

lonally expected by soliciting the auxiliary interposition of Sweden? Might it not produce injurious consequences? When Great Britain had manifested so little respect for the mediation of Russia, would the solicitude of the United States to enlist another power of comparatively subordinate influence in the measure, increase the respect of Great Britain for the United States? What inference would naturally be drawn from such a proceeding by Great Britain and by every other power in Europe? Certainly an unbecoming solicitude for peace, and an astonishing inability in carrying on a war recently proclaimed by the United States. Would impressions like these be likely to produce in Great Britain a disposition for peace? Would they not rather induce her to conclude that the United States were laboring under some unknown incapacity to conduct the war, and thus encourage her to prolong it for the purpose of enveloping their embarrassments, and finally to reduce them to submission? And would not her own open views of the state of public sentiment in this country upon the subject of the war, enforce this conclusion? Recollect the taunting reply of Lord Castlereagh to the overture for peace made by the president a few days after the declaration of war, and no doubt will be left on the subject. Besides, what persuasions could Sweden address Great Britain which could possibly influence her to change her own views of her own maritime rights? What impressions could such a proceeding be likely to make on the government of France? Perceivest her late and present relation with Sweden, and the answer to the question is obvious. This part of the subject, however, will not be further pressed. These general points are intended to show the general course of reflections which influenced my conduct on the occasion, and to suggest to others all additional and consequential considerations belonging to it. Its peculiar delicacy finds a more particular development.

If, then, the senate did believe, that this measure flowed from the unbecoming solicitude of the president to obtain peace, and that, under existing circumstances, it could not have had that tendency, but might have an opposite one, and be at the same time attended with other injurious consequences, was it not bound by the highest constitution in junction to prevent its adoption? If, however, the senate were left to conjecture, should have mistaken the real views and objects of the president in this respect, as I sincerely hope it did, and if the higher official had been contented on Mr. Russell for his personal accommodation without any reference to external powers or officers, as was the case with the Swedish government and Mr. Kantow, what more proper reply could the senate have made to the president, than it did make? What course could be more respectful to him, or less injurious to the feelings of Mr. Russell, than that it is at this time independent to send a minister plenipotentiary to Sweden. Officers in this country, in public property, and hired for public use, and not for personal benefit, and if Mr. Russell did not find it convenient to accept the office the public interest required, I may judge the senate could not have been justified in advising the president to make one for his personal accommodation, which the public interest did not require. If the president had thought proper to negotiate on equal terms the diplomatic civilities of Sweden and had nominated Mr. Russell for the mission, although its utility in other respects might have been questioned by some, I do not believe any objection would be in the senate one solitary objection to the measure, nor to the person nominated. I can hardly entertain the most respectful consideration for Mr. Russell person,ly, and would have taken great pleasure in testifying it, by voting for him upon any proper occasion; but I never can permit my personal respects for any individual to carry me so far as to disregard in his favor, solemn duties imposed on me by my official station. Besides, the resolution of the senate did by no means preclude the president, from nominating a minister resident to Sweden corresponding with the one sent here on her part. Why this was not done, is not for the senate, nor for me to enquire. It rests solely upon his own discretion. Nor can the vote on this occasion be considered as being influenced in any great degree by party feelings, as will appear by the eyes at noon below. Upon the whole, I have now exposed you the real history of this transaction which influenced my conduct on the occasion, and I have only to remark that its prospects afford me much consolation. W. B. GILES.

Hingham, October 20, 1813.

Friday, July 2.—The senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Nathan Russell, Rhode-Island, to be minister plenipotentiary to Sweden, together with the motion of M. Gettysborough and a consideration yesterday, thereon: and on question to agree to the motion, it was determined in the affirmative—ayes 22, noes 14, as follows:

AYES—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Bledsoe, Brodugger, Dan, Fromentin, Bradford, German, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Henscy, Hoyer, K. Laock, Lambert, Leeb, Mason, Stone, Wells—22
 NOES—Messrs. Brent, Bullock, Campbell, Con Howell, Morrow, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Worthington—14.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient at this time to send a minister plenipotentiary to Sweden.

Catholics of Ireland

DUBLIN, June 2

"To the Honorable the House of Commons in Parliament assembled,

"We, the Roman Catholic people of Ireland, approach the Legislature with a statement of grievances under which we labor, and of which we most respectfully, but, at the same time, most solemnly, solicit the effectual redress. Our wrongs are notorious, and so numerous, that their minute recital is quite unnecessary, and would indeed be impertinent were it deemed expedient. Ages of persecution on the one hand, and of patience on the other, sufficiently attest our sufferings, and our submission to our oppressors has been answered only by petulant indignities by remonstrance—ajures by forgiveness. It has been a misfortune to have suffered for the sake of our religion, but it has also been a pride to have borne the best testimony to the purity of our faith by the meanness of our endurance. Like the great type of our adoration, we have not merely been the passive victims of unjust induction, but we have even endeavored to expiate the cruelty of our oppressors. We have sustained the power of our oppressors—we have nerved the arm that smote us—we have girted the arm that smote us—we have a gratitude always superior to our pride, and we have lavished our strength, our talent, and our treasures, and buoyed upon the prodigal profusion of our young blood, the triumphant ark of our liberty.

"We approach then, with confidence, an enlightened legislature. In the name of NATURE, we ask our rights as MEN—in the name of the CONSTITUTION, we ask our privileges as SUBJECTS—in the name of GOD, we ask the sacred charter of persecuted piety as CHRISTIANS.

"Are securities required of us? We offer them the best securities a throne can have—the affection of a people. We offer faith that was never violated—Hearts, that were never corrupted—Valor, that never crumbled. Every hour of peril proved our allegiance, and every field of Europe exhibits its DEEDS.

"We share all temporal authority except that of our sovereign—we acknowledge no civil tie, save that of our conscience—and for our lavish and voluntary expenditures, we only ask, a reciprocity of benefits.

"Separating, as we do, our civil rights from our spiritual duties, we earnestly desire that they may be confined. We "render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's,"—but we must also "render unto God the things that are God's." Our church could not descend to claim a state authority, nor do we ask for it a state recognition; its topos, its powers, and its pretensions, are of another world; and when we render our hands to the state, our prayers are not that its letters may be transferred to those points which are paid for us to Heaven. We would not erect a splendid shrine even to liberty on the ruins of the temple.

"In behalf then, of five millions of a brave and an insular people, we call on the legislature to annihilate the odious bondage which bows down the mental, physical and moral energies of Ireland; and in the name of that gospel, which excludes all distinction, we ask freedom of conscience for the whole christian world."

Mr. Charles Phillips having been declared the author of this composition, several members spoke highly in his praise; and Mr. O'Connor moved the following resolution:

"That the heartfelt gratitude of the Catholic board be presented to the splendid and patriotic friend of Ireland, Charles Phillips, Esq. barrister at law, for the exertions by which he has served and ornamented the cause of our common country."

This vote of thanks, was passed with acclamation.

President's Message.

On the 7th inst. at 12 o'clock, the President of the United States transmitted the following message to both houses of congress, by Mr. Coles his secretary.

fellow citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives,

In meeting you at the present interesting conjuncture, it would have been highly satisfactory if I could have communicated a favorable result to the mission charged with negotiations for restoring peace. It was a just expectation from the respect due to the distinguished sovereign who had invited them by his offer of mediation, from the readiness with which the invitation was accepted on the part of the United States, and from the pledge to be found in an act of their legislature for the liberality which their plenipotentiaries would carry into the negotiations, that no time would be lost by the British government in embracing the experiment for hastening a stop to the effusion of blood. A prompt and cordial acceptance of the mediation on that side was the less to be doubted as it was of a nature not to submit rights or pretensions on either side to the decision of an umpire, but to afford merely an opportunity, honorable and desirable to both, for discussing, and if possible adjusting them, for the interests of both.

The British cabinet, either mistaking our desire of peace for a dread of British power, or misled by other fallacious calculations, has disappointed this reasonable anticipation. No communication from our envoys having reached us, no information on the subject has been received from that source.— But it is known that the mediation was declined in the first instance, and there is no evidence, notwithstanding the lapse of time, that a change of disposition in the British councils has taken place, or is to be expected.

Under such circumstances, a nation proud of its rights, and conscious of its strength, had no choice but an exertion of the one in support of the other.

To this determination, the best encouragement is derived from the success in which it has pleased the Almighty to bless our arms, both on the land and on the waters.

Whilst proofs have been continued of the enterprise and skill of our cruisers, public and private, on the ocean, and a new trophy gained in the capture of a British by an American vessel of war, after an action giving celebrity to the name of the victorious commander; the great inland waters, on which the enemy were also to be encountered, have presented achievements of our naval arms, as brilliant in their character as they have been important in their consequences.

On lake Erie the squadron under the command of captain Perry, having met the British squadron of superior force, a sanguinary conflict ended in the capture of the whole. The conduct of that officer, adroit as it was daring, and which was so well seconded by his comrades, justly entitles them to the admiration and gratitude of their country; and will fill an early page in its naval annals, with a victory, never surpassed in lustre, however much it may have been in magnitude.

On lake Ontario, the caution of the British commander, favored by contingencies, frustrated the efforts of the American commander to bring on a decisive action. Captain Chauncey was able, however, to establish an ascendancy on that important theatre; and to prove, by the manner in which he effected every thing possible, that opportunities only were wanted, for a more shining display of his own talents and of the gallantry of those under his command.

The success on lake Erie having opened a passage to the territory of the enemy, the officer commanding the north-western army transferred the war thither; and rapidly pursuing the hostile troops fleeing with their savage associates, forced a general action, which quickly terminated in the capture of the British, and dispersion of the savage force.

This result is signally honorable to major-general Harrison, by whose military talents it was prepared; to col. Johnson and his mounted volunteers, whose impetuous onset gave a decisive blow to the ranks of the enemy; and to the spirit of the volunteer militia equally brave and patriotic, who bore an interesting part in the scene; more especially to the chief magistrate of Kentucky at the head of them, whose heroism, signalised in the war which established the independence of his country, sought at an advanced age, a share in hardships and battles, for maintaining its rights and its safety.

The effect of these successes has been to rescue the inhabitants of Michigan from their oppressions aggravated by gross infractions of the capitulation which subjected them to a foreign power; to alienate the savages of numerous tribes from the enemy, by whom they were disappointed and abandoned; and to relieve an extensive region of country from a mercenary warfare which desolated its frontiers, and imposed on its citizens the most harassing services.

In consequence of our naval superiority on lake Ontario, and the opportunity afforded by it for concentrating our forces by water, operations which had been previously planned, were set on foot, against the possessions of the enemy on the St. Lawrence.— Such, however, was the delay produced, in the first instance, by adverse weather of unusual violence and continuance, and such the circumstances attending the final movements of the army, that the prospect, at one time so favorable, was not realized.

The cruelty of the enemy, in enlisting the savages into a war with a nation desirous of mutual emulation in mitigating its calamities, has not been confined to any one quarter. Wherever they could be turned against us, no exertions to effect it have been spared.— On our south-western border, the Creek tribes, who, yielding to our persevering endeavors, were gradually acquiring more civilized habits, became the unfortunate victims of seduction. A war in that quarter has been the consequence, infuriated by a bloody fanaticism, recently propagated among them.

It was necessary to crush such a war before it could spread among the contiguous tribes, and before it would favor enterprizes of the enemy into that vicinity. With this view a force was called into the service of the United States, from the states of Georgia and Tennessee, which, with the nearest regular troops, and other corps from the Mississippi territory, might not only chastise the savages into present peace, but make a lasting impression on their fears.

The progress of the expedition, as far as is yet known, corresponds with the martial zeal with which it was pursued; and the best hopes of a satisfactory issue are authorised by the complete success with which a well-planned enterprise was executed against a body of hostile savages, by a detachment of the volunteer militia of Tennessee, under the gallant command of general Coffee; and by a still more important victory over a large body of them, gained under the immediate command of major general Jackson; an officer equally distinguished for his patriotism and his military talents.

The systematic perseverance of the enemy in courting the aid of the savages in all quarters, had the natural effect of kindling their ordinary propensity to war into a passion, which, even among those best disposed towards the United States, was ready, if not employed on our side, to be turned against us. A departure from our protracted forbearance to accept the services tendered by them, has thus been forced upon us. But, in yielding to it, the retaliation has been mitigated as much as possible, both in its extent and in its character, stopping far short of the example of the enemy, who owe the advantage they have occasionally gained in battle, chiefly to the number of their savage associates, and who have not controlled them either from their usual practice of indiscriminate massacre on defenceless inhabitants, or from scenes of carnage without a parallel, on prisoners to the British arms, guarded by all the laws of humanity, and of honorable war.

For these enormities the enemy are equally responsible, whether with the power to prevent them they want the will, or the knowledge of a want of power they still avail themselves of such instruments.

In other respects the enemy are pursuing a course which threatens consequences most afflictive to humanity.

A standing law of Great Britain naturalizes, as it well known, all aliens, complying with conditions limited to a shorter period than those required by the United States; and naturalized subjects, are in war employed by her government in common with native subjects. In a contiguous British province, regulations promulgated since the commencement of the war, compel citizens of the United States, being there under certain circumstances, to bear arms, whilst of the native emigrants from the United States who compose much of the population of the province, a number have actually borne arms against the United States within their limits; some of whom after having done so, have become prisoners of war, and are now in our possession. The British commander in that province, nevertheless, with the sanction, as appears, of his government, thought proper to select from American prisoners of war, and send to Great Britain for trial as criminals, a number of individuals, who had emigrated from the British dominions long prior to the state of war between the two nations, who had incorporated themselves into our political society, in the modes recognized by the law and practice of Great Britain, and who were made prisoners of war, under the banners of their adopted country, fighting for its rights and safety.

The protection due to those citizens, requiring an effectual interposition in their behalf a like number of British prisoners of war, were put into confinement, with a notification that they would experience with ever violence might be committed on the American prisoners of war sent to Great Britain.

It was hoped that this necessary consequence of the step unadvisedly taken on the part of Great Britain would have led her government to reflect on the inconsistencies of its conduct, and that a sympathy with the British, if not with the American sufferers, would have arrested the cruel career opened by its example.

This was unhappily not the case. In violation both of consistency and of humanity, American officers and non-commissioned officers in double the number of the British prisoners confined here, were ordered into close confinement, with formal notice that in the event of a retaliation for the death which might be inflicted on the prisoners of war sent to Great Britain for trial, the officers so confined would be put to death also. It was notified at the same time that the commanders of the British fleets and armies on our coasts are instructed, in the same event, to proceed with a destructive severity against our towns and their inhabitants.

That no doubt might be left with the enemy of our adherence to the retaliating resort imposed on us, a correspondent number of British officers, prisoners of war, in our hands, were immediately put into close confinement, to abide the fate of those confined by the enemy; and the British government has been apprized of the determination of this government, to retaliate any other proceedings against us contrary to the legitimate modes of warfare.

It is as fortunate for the United States that they have it in their power to meet the enemy in this deplorable contest, as it is honorable to them, that they do not join in it but under the most imperious obligations, and with the humane purpose of effectuating a return to the established usages of war.

The views of the French government on the subjects which have been so long committed to negotiation, have received no elucidation since the close of your late session. The minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris had not been enabled, by proper opportunities, to press the objects of his mission, as prescribed by his instructions.

The militia being always to be regarded as the great bulwark of defence and security for free states, and the constitution having wisely committed to the national authority a use of that force, as the best provision against an unsafe military establishment, as well as a resource peculiarly adapted to a country having the extent and the exposure of the United States, I recommend to congress a revision of the militia laws for the purpose of securing, more effectually, the services of all detachments called into the employment and placed under the government of the United States.

It will deserve the consideration of congress also, whether, among other improvements in the militia laws, justice does not require a regulation, under due precautions, for defraying the expence incident to the first assembling as well as to the subsequent movements of detachments called into the national service.

To give to our vessels of war, public and private, the requisite advantage in their cruises, it is of much importance that they should have, both for themselves and their prizes, the use of the ports of friendly powers. With this view, I recommend to congress the expediency of such legal provisions as may supply the defects, or remove the doubts of the executive authority to allow to the cruisers of other powers, at war with the enemies of the United States, such use of the American ports and markets as they correspond with the privileges allowed by such powers to American cruisers.

During the year ending the 30th September last, the receipts into the treasury have exceeded thirty-seven and a half millions of dollars, of which near twenty-four millions were the produce of loans. After meeting all the demands for the public service, there remained in the treasury on that day, near seven millions of dollars. Under the authority assigned in the act of the 2d of August last, for borrowing seven millions and a half of dollars, that sum has been obtained on terms more favorable to the United States than those of the preceding loan made during the present year. Further sums to a considerable amount will be necessary to be obtained in the same way during the ensuing year; and from the increased capital of the country, from the fidelity with which the public engagements have been kept, and the public credit maintained, it may be expected on good grounds that the necessary pecuniary supplies will not be wanting.

The expenses of the current year, from the multiplied operations falling within it, have necessarily been extensive. But on a just estimate of the campaign, in which the mass of them has been incurred, the cost will not be found disproportionate to the advantages, which have been gained. The campaign has, indeed, in its latter stages in one quarter, been less favorable than was expected, but in addition to our naval success, the progress of the campaign has been filled with incidents highly honorable to the American arms.

The attacks of the enemy on Craney island, on Fort Meigs, on Sackett's harbor, and on Sandusky, have been vigorously and successfully repulsed; nor have they in any case succeeded on either frontier, excepting when directed against the peaceable dwellings of individuals, or villages unprepared or undefended.

On the other hand the movements of the American army have been followed by the reduction of York, and of forts George, Erie and Malden; by the recovery of Detroit and the extinction of the Indian war in the west; and by the occupancy or command of a large portion of Upper Canada. Battles have also been fought on the borders of the St. Lawrence, which, though not accomplishing their entire objects, reflect honor on the discipline and prowess of our soldiery, the best auguries of eventual victory. In the same scale are to be placed the late successes in the south, over one of the most powerful, which had become one of the most hostile also, of the Indian tribes.

It would be improper to close this communication without expressing a thankfulness, in which all ought to unite, for the numerous blessings with which our beloved country continues to be favored: for the abundance which over-spreads our land, and the prevailing health of its inhabitants; for the preservation of our internal tranquility, and the stability of our institutions; and above all for the light of Divine truth, and the protection of every man's conscience in the enjoyment of it. And although among our blessings we cannot number an exemption from the evils of war; yet these will never be regarded as the greatest of evils, by the friends of liberty, and of the rights of nations. Our country has before preferred them to the degrading condition which was the alternative, when the sword was drawn in the cause which gave birth to our national independence; and none who contemplate the magnitude, and feel the value of that glorious event, will shrink from a struggle to maintain the high and happy ground on which it placed the American people.

of good citizens, the justice and necessity of resisting wrongs and usurpations no longer to be borne, will sufficiently outweigh the privations and sacrifices, inseparable from a state of war. But it is a reflection, moreover, peculiarly conoling, that whilst wars are generally aggravated by their baneful effects on the internal improvements and permanent prosperity of the nations engaged in them, such is the favored situation of the United States, that the calamities of the contest into which they have been compelled to enter, are mitigated by improvements and advantages of which the contest itself is the source.

If the war has increased the interruptions of our commerce, it has at the same time cherished and multiplied our manufactures, so as to make us independent of all other countries for the more essential branches, for which we ought to be dependent on none; and is even rapidly giving them an extent which will create additional staples in our future intercourse with foreign markets.

If much treasure has been expended, no considerable portion of it has been applied to objects desirable in their value and necessary to our permanent safety.

If the war has exposed us to increased spoliations on the ocean, and to predatory incursions on the land, it has developed the national means of retaliating the former, and of providing protection against the latter: demonstrating to all, that every blow aimed at our maritime independence is an impulse accelerating the growth of our maritime power.

By diffusing through the mass of the nation the elements of military discipline and instruction, by augmenting and distributing warlike preparations, applicable to future use, by evincing the zeal and valor with which they will be employed, and the cheerfulness with which every necessary burden will be borne; a greater respect for our rights and a longer duration of our future peace are promised, than could be expected without these proofs of the national character and resources.

The war has proved, moreover, that our free government, like other free governments, though slow in its early movements, acquires in its progress a force proportioned to its freedom; and that the union of these states, the guardian of the freedom and safety of all and of each, is strengthened by every occasion that puts it to the test.

In fine, the war, with all its vicissitudes, is illustrating the capacity and the destiny of the United States to be a great, a flourishing, and a powerful nation; worthy of the friendship which it is disposed to cultivate with all others, and authorized, by its own example, to require from all an observance of the laws of justice and reciprocity. Beyond these their claims have never extended; and in contending for these, we behold a subject for our congratulations, in the daily testimonies of increasing harmony throughout the nation, and may humbly repose our trust in the smiles of Heaven on so righteous a cause.

JAMES MADISON.

Washington, December 7, 1813.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

There was a most dreadful gale at Halifax, on the evening of the 12th ult. It was accompanied with heavy showers of rain. It was extremely dark, and the howling of the wind, with the blue lights and signal guns of distress from the armed vessels, added to the piercing shrieks of the people, horribly increased the terrors of the scene. The gale only lasted about two hours, but in the morning, all the shore, lined with wrecks and vessels, proclaimed the strength of the storm. Among the shipping in the harbor were several vessels with troops, about to sail under admiral Warren on an expedition to the southern coast of the U. States. The account details forty-five vessels on shore, the most of them much injured, if not destroyed; seventeen sunk; 10 or 12 rode out the gale, with the loss of spars, and injured by vessels running foul of them, &c. Besides these, we observe the following notices of such as belong to the royal navy:

The St. Domingo and La Pique, of 74 guns each, were ashore; apparently not essentially injured; but we have hopes that their weight on the ground may have finished them.

The Madstone 36, ashore very much injured.

The Atlanta sloop 24 guns, destroyed.

Brigs Epervier, (brigged) Marily, Phantoms, Ring-dove and Arab, all ashore, much injured.

Alpha schooner, supposed to be lost with all her crew.

Canso, do. ashore, very much injured.

Shelburne, do. dismantled, and otherwise injured.

Transport ship Three Sisters, sunk; do. no. 492 ashore; Hyena, do. lost two masts, and bowsprit; Swift, store ship, much injured; ordnance schooner, lost bowsprit, and otherwise injured.

The Poictiers, Victorious, Nymph, Tenedos, Barrossa, Diadem, Success, Nemesis, Romulus and Arab, rode out the gale; most of them were considerably injured by other vessels running foul of them.

It is probable this disaster may compel admiral Warren to postpone his intended expedition. However, it would be well for every man on the southern coast to stand on his defence; and, among other precautionary measures, be ready to send into the interior his negroes; for a ransom in these miserable creatures will assuredly form a prominent point in the proceedings of the gallant knight, if he visits the shore.

What will the "holy men," the "elect" of Great Britain,—they who live impiously ascribed to the immediate agency of the Almighty, every disaster that has attended the American arms, say to this "act of God?"—At the very moment too, when the enemy was about to depart to conflagrate and steal, to plunder and destroy, without legitimate object?—Who shall scan the ways of Providence, or blasphemously assign to eternal justice its course?—Heaven, in mercy forbid, that I should ever do this thing!—How will they "account" for the things that are alluded to above? But I judge them not.

LIEUTENANT McCALL.—On Wednesday, the 1st instant, this gallant young officer was entertained at Gadsby's hotel, Baltimore, by a mixed company of Americans, about sixty in number. Among the invited guests were captains Ridgley and Spence, of the United States' sloops Erie and Ontario. After dinner the following, among many other excellent toasts, were drank.

The Union—Esto perpetua. [When this toast was announced each gentleman rose by spontaneous impulse from his chair, and it was drank standing.] The President; the memory of Washington; the navy; the army; Hull, Bainbridge, Decatur and Jones; Rodgers, Porter and Smith; O. H. Perry—lake Erie too limited a theatre for a Nelson's soul; the brave Elliot—Perry's right arm in the day of battle; and the memories of Lawrence, Burrows and Allen; Trippe, Somers, Wadsworth, Caldwell and Israel, and Truxton, were gratefully remembered. The memory of a Legion-gen. Covington,—"he fell where he fought, at the head of his men." [See Wilkinson's despatch.] The president gave "our gallant guest," and Lieut. McCall being called upon gave "The citizens of Baltimore; may their happiness and prosperity keep pace with their hospitality and enterprise."

The idea that belongs to the restoration of a captive to his home and country is lost, in considering the state of British women; and the extravagant exertions they frequently make to prevent a return to the beloved service of the king, should teach us to apply this repugnance in aid of the war against man-stealing and piracy.

The arguments we might use to a British prisoner to induce him peaceably to obtain his "freedom," brings to recollection a scene said to have occurred at Veragua [London.] A fellow brought out to be executed, instead of quietly submitting to his fate, kicked and cuffed, and resisted the officers, by every means in his power; swearing he would defend himself to the last! The priest that stood by came forward, and concluded many scolding expressions, with "O dear man—do be hung!"—"I won't" said the fellow—"if I can help it."

The following is from the Salem papers of the 27th ultimo:—

Mutiny on board the cartel.—On Thursday evening last, the British prisoners on board the cartel brig Anolotan, lying below the fort, bound to Halifax, rose upon the officers and crew of the brig, confined the commanding officer (captain Smith being absent) and fifteen men below and took complete possession of the vessel. Their avowed intention was to board the privateer brig Alfred, which was lying within gun shot, and go off with both vessels. Fortunately, in the scuffle, an officer of the cartel jumped into a small boat which was along side, and fled on board the Alfred, whose crew were immediately called to quarters, and the brig prepared to open a fire upon the cartel should she attempt to pass her. In the mean time captain Jeduthun Upton (an officer of the prison ship) who was sent on board the cartel in the revenue-boat just before the mutiny commenced, succeeded with much difficulty in getting on board the boat, several attempts having been made by some of the prisoners to stab him, but others interfered and prevented it; he came up to town, took on board captain Smith and several volunteers, proceeded along side the Alfred, and with about twenty-five of the privateer's crew, well armed, boarded the cartel about 9 P. M. (the wind blowing a gale at the time from the southward) and immediately succeeded in driving the prisoners below, where they were confined for the night. No person was seriously injured in this affair. The number of prisoners on board was about 140. Six of the ring-leaders are in irons. The cartel probably sailed last night for Halifax.

A "peace"-loving gentleman suggests that the duty on bills and notes discounted by the banks may be "evaded" by writing them upon each bank. This was "found out" in Connecticut.

The Columbian ironically states that many fast sailing "Connecticut runners" have made voyages to and from St. Bartholomew's, in twenty days! We trust these "friends of commerce" will be checked.

"MAGNANIMITY."—"The English ship Isabella, of London, from Port-Jackson (with 25,000 seal skins, 50 tons oil and 30 or 40 do. pearl shells) was stranded on one of the Falkland Islands last May; her officers, passengers and crew were saved from their perilous situation by the brig Ninian, Barnegat, of New York, who, at the time of preserving them informed of the war between the United States and Great Britain.—In return for this humane act, she officers, &c. of the Isabella took possession of the Neonian, and carried her to Eagle Island, from whence she was sent to England a war-prize.

More "magnanimity."—The British brig of war Wasp lately captured two boats off Plymouth light, one was in ballast, the other filled with empty barrels—she carried them, as was supposed, ten leagues from the nearest land, then sunk one of them and divested the other of her rigging and sails. After which the crews of both were told they might take the latter, and "go to hell," or remain on board and "go to Halifax." They preferred the chance of the former, and with one day's provisions, only departed; they entreated for a little additional supply, but the captain valiantly swore he would not give them an ounce to save their lives!—Some of the officers of the Wasp, more humane, advised them to stay on board, as it was hardly possible they could reach the shore, situated as they were; but they happily arrived at Boston.

The mediation.—A Russian ship has arrived at Charleston, and brings a report that the British had appointed a plenipotentiary to meet our ministers at St. Petersburg.

Conquest of Canada.—A writer, in the Democratic Press, thus appears to understand his subject, gives in the 1st, a sketch of the several campaigns against Canada to wrest that country from France; from which it appears—"The first campaign (1753) was commenced by the British with 10,000 men, while the whole force of the French in Canada, was not more than 1500 regulars, and 60 militia, and failed.

The second campaign (1756) was commenced with a British force of 18,000 men, against the French force of 5000, and failed.

The third campaign (1757) commenced with a much superior force to that of the last year, against a French force not exceeding 9000 men, and failed.

The fourth campaign (1758) commenced under the command of general Jbercrombie, with a force of 50,000 men, 20,000 of which were Americans, against a vastly inferior French force, and also failed.

The fifth campaign (1759) opened with even a more powerful force than that of 1758, and finally succeeded in expelling the French power from Canada.

"FRENCH INFLUENCE"—Extract from a late patriotic gazette—"Interests (says this writer) inclines every lover of his country, who would promote her prosperity, to espouse the conduct and cause of England, as the advocate of COMMERCIAL PRIVILEGES and of RATIONAL freedom, without which we can never raise to power or influence, or enjoy peace and happiness.

"HUMANITY." Halifax prisoners.—We have been informed from an official source. (says a Boston paper) that three hundred of our unfortunate countrymen at Halifax, were on the tenth of the past month, crowded on board of "two small sloops," for the purpose of proceeding for England, there to experience that humanity and kindness which has so peculiarly characterized the British nation during the present contest with this country.

Terrible! The following picture of the situation of the United States is drawn in a late Boston Centinel.—W. preserve it as a curiosity.

"It is really ludicrous to hear us offer the Canadians liberty!—They, who have no taxes to pay—no embargoes to endure—no commerce checked to please a foreign state—Who chose their own parliaments; make their own laws; and what is more, manage their own private affairs in their own way.—These Canadians are invited by us to partake of our freedom!—We, who are just about to be crushed under our taxes;—we, who pay half a dollar duty on cas, and two hundred per cent. on the first cost of coffee;—we, who cannot put a thing in their lips which has not been siddled with taxes;—we, who cannot ride as they do in their cabriolets, without paying for it to an excise officer and spy;—we, whose country is filled with pumps and spies;—we, whose elections are sometimes carried, as in a town of Vermont lately, by the bayonet;—whose citizens are plundered, and sometimes murdered by hired mercenaries;—He, whose trade is cut up for sport;—whose cities are deprived of their usual support; and whose seamen are pining in our streets; who are compelled to become manufacturers in spite of our natural inclinations;—and thus by the very men who have represented manufactures as the ruin of the morals and fatal to the liberties of the people. "Let our work-benches be in Europe," was the language of the men who compel us to coop up our children in manufactories, to the ruin of their health, and the destruction of their morals.

"The Canadians knew better their own freedom—and they saw what our liberty was. They refused our kind offers of liberty, and participation in embargoes and the thousand other blessings of our happy country. And we, just in character for a free people, tell them, if you do not freely accept our offers, we will burn your churches, conflagrate your dwellings, rob your stores, slaughter your children, and force you to be free. In short, these things we have done."

Who is not horrified at the horrible portraiture?—Lord bless us!—Let us away to Canada, and there enjoy the real liberty that belongs to the subject of Great Britain.

[From the London Courier, June 17, 1813.]

Policy of taking New Orleans.—There are arguments in our colonial journals, tending to prove that there exists a necessity for our government's taking possession of the province of New-Orleans. We extract the following observations on that subject:—"If Great Britain will only take New Orleans, she will divide the states. By shutting that outlet to the fruits of western industry, she will make herself known and respected by those states, in spite of the power of the rest of the union. If in the war of 1755, France had been as superior at sea, as Britain then was, we should never have heard of the United States of America. The back country would have been as well settled before this with Frenchmen, as it now is with the descendants of Britons. We ought at present to take the benefit of former lessons, and make those people our friends when so much is in our power. Take New-Orleans, which is at the threshold of our West-India islands, and which could furnish them with provisions at half the price they have been accustomed to pay. By such conduct firm allies would be created on the continent, our West-India planters would be gratified, and the integrity of the Spanish dominions in America guaranteed from traitorous insults."

This is very good—but the editor of the Courier, does not know, that two millions of people, as hardy, gallant and patriotic as the world can boast of, are immediately interested in an outlet at New-Orleans; who, like the flood of their own Mississippi, would precipitate themselves on the foe, with irresistible force. It would be worse than a new Walden expedition. To be sure, it would be a pretty thing to take New-Orleans; but to keep it—c'est une autre affaire.

American prizes in France.—The Turva publishes the following extract of a letter from Bordeaux, dated Aug. 20.—"By a decision of the minister of commerce explaining the decree of his imperial and royal majesty relating to prizes made by American cruisers, and sent into ports of France, it appears:

"That all re-captured vessels sent into the ports of this empire, shall be obliged to export a contre value equal to the net amount of the sales of such vessels and cargoes. The minister gives, as a reason for this decision, the possibility of American cruisers making arrangements with the enemy for the purpose of introducing British cargoes into France."

"That all bona fide prizes made on the enemy by American cruisers, shall be received in France, and their cargoes (prohibited goods excepted, and even those that may be exported,) be admitted for consumption.

"The duty of enregistrement, and the invalid duty, these prizes are exempted from, provided such vessels and cargoes are proceeded against by the consuls of the United States, in conformity to admiralty laws and forms of the United States, and publicly sold in the chancellery of the American consulate.

"In the case of the re-captured vessel the Criterion, and the prize to the President frigate, the Maria, the former sent into Bayonne and the latter into Bordeaux, this decision of the minister of commerce has been carried into effect."

A letter to the editor of the REGISTER, from Chillicothe, dated November 30, says—"Colonel Evans, with three or four other British officers, and about 80 privates, taken by Harrison, have arrived here from Detroit. They will proceed in a day or two for Newport, Ky. where the officers are to be placed in close confinement, by order of the President of the United States. In pursuance of like orders, the martial of the district of Ohio last week took charge of the prisoners captured by Perry, and put them into close confinement, in the common jail; which is surrounded by a strong guard. The British officers do not relish this measure, but are candid enough to acknowledge its justise, and are not sparing of imprecations on their own government as the cause."

The letter mentions that certain documents are said to have been found among Proctor's papers, of high import—being the correspondence between an officer of the United States, and general Brock; of which, as a trial is about to take place, it would be improper to speak more particularly at present.

CAPT. LAWRENCE.—From the London Star.—"The late captain Lawrence was one of the few commanders in the American service, who had the manners and education of a gentleman."

We are much obliged to the editor of the "London Star" for acknowledging, explicitly, that we had one "gentleman," in our service, and return the compliment, by saying, that we have heard of two in "his majesty's" thousand vessels of war.—The greater part of the rest that have scrapped up an acquaintance with us, are the most pompous, silly and conceited—or savage or drunken creatures we know of. For examples, take fighting Acres, modest Carden; gallant Cockburn, or temperate Bingham and Capel.

On Thursday, the 2d inst. com. Bainbridge was entertained at Philadelphia. About 300 gentlemen of mixed politics, sat down to dinner, to which were invited as guests, the naval and military officers in that city and its vicinity. The chief justice presided, with the commodore on his right, and the bishop of Pennsylvania on his left. After the cloth was removed many American toasts were given, accompanied with music.

General Hampton, having arrived in season, was invited to an entertainment prepared for general Harrison, at New-York, on the 1st inst. at Tammy Hall. The feast was got up in the most splendid stile. Gen. Harrison's toast was—"The freedom of the seas and the adoption by our government of that Roman maxim, which secured to the citizen his inviolability." 12 cheers.

A Portuguese brig has arrived at Newport, R. I. laden with salt, merino wool, &c. She was boarded by a French privateer that "robbed" her of 90 chests of the tea. The capt. of the privateer said that he had captured twenty-seven sail of British vessels.—[Why say "robbed"—are not France and Portugal at war? But so it is in our papers.

Norwich, (Conn.) Dec. 1.

Retaliation.—Mr. William Mayton, sailing master of his majesty's ship Ramilies, who was some months a prisoner of war in this place, and who left here in the expectation of exchange by the Anadolostan cartel, has been detained and put into close confinement at Providence for the safety of Joshua Penny, whom our readers will recollect was taken from his house on Long Island, some time last summer, by order of sir Thomas Hardy, who then commanded on this station.

MILITARY.

Governor Chittenden's emissary to the Vermont volunteers in New-York, was released at Plattsburg, on giving security in the sum of $5,000 dollars for his appearance at the next U. S. district court to be held in the city of New-York.

The campaign to the north is certainly at an end. Generals Hampton, Lewis, Harrison, Boyd, Porter, with many of the colonels, have left the armies with various destinations. Harrison returns to the 8th military district. Generals Lizard and Parker remain with Hampton's division; and general Brown commands at French Mills, general Wilkinson being much indisposed. A letter received in Philadelphia, says the latter has arrived at Albany, and that his life is despaired of.

We are anxious to see Boyd and Brown's accounts of their battles with the enemy descending the St. Lawrence. The latter is spoken of as a very successful affair.

The Buffalo Gazette of Nov. 23, says that the British issue 1500 rations daily at Burlington Heights, including those to the Indian women and children. The force of the enemy is about 500 regulars and the same number of Indians, fit for duty.

Col. Smith, of the rifle regiment, commands at Sackett's Harbor.

The troops at St. Regis have finished the log huts, and are in comfortable winter quarters.

The order for the march of Hampton's division to St. Regis, was countermanded; except as it respected the 2d battalion of the 11th and a company of the 5th.

The Montreal papers are filled with inflated accounts of the battle at Williamsburg—they rate our force engaged at 4,000 men, and state our loss to be one thousand. They acknowledge their own to be 169. It would appear from these papers that their force at Montreal is very respectable.

The Creeks. We have not yet received general Jackson's account of his splendid victory over the Creeks at Tallegada, as noticed in the postscript to our last. But are satisfied that such a victory has been gained, and wait contented for a regular detail of the battle. We may soon expect news of the operations of the troops from Georgia, on the other side of the Indian country.

M. J. gen. Pinkney has proceeded to Milledgeville, (Geo.) to have a general charge of the expeditions against the Creeks. A detachment of 100 U. S. dra-gions left Savannah on the 20th ult. for Fort Mifflin.

The Georgia militia, under general Floyd, in the Creek country, have been delayed in their movements by the default of the contractor. The general having made his case known to the governor, he communicated it to the legislature, and $20,000 were instantly appropriated by that patriotic state to forward the expedition.

Between 4 and 500 men, of the 38th regiment, recruited chiefly in Baltimore, have arrived at New-falls, under the command of major Frailey, where they are to be stationed for the present. They are spoken of as a very fine body of men.

The Albany Argus says, that in the battle of the 11th, at Williamsburg, the enemy made no prisoners but the wounded.

Quebec, Nov. 4, 1813.—On Friday and Saturday last, the following American officers were conducted under an escort of major R. P.'s volunteer cavalry, from Beauport, where they were or parole, and lodged in the jail of this city:—

Major—Christian C. Van de Wenter.

Captain—John M. Chesney, Henry Fleming, Alexander McEwen, D. Van Vechten, Isaac Rouch.

Lieutenants—Thomas Carney, John Waring, Thomas Randall, John Wm. Thompson, John H. Cannon, George Murdoch, Nicholas N. Loshban, Melson Midd, Samuel B. Griswold, James Smith, J. P. Palmer.

Ensigns—Washington Dennison, David P. Polk, John Turnbull, S. W. Osgoode.

Sidney Smith, lieutenant, W. A. Monteth, midshipman, of the navy.

The following non-commissioned officers, from on board the transports, were also imprisoned:—

Non-commissioned officers.—B. W. Stevens, W. Tromble, Nathan Jones, Abel Lawrence, Jo. Whitney, Ems. Marco, Wm. Sampson, J. W. Price alias Pierce, Ben. Burman, J. P. Read, John Moray, W. McCune, Elsha Warren, Seb. Barnes, Chas. West, H. D. Yates, Lym. Baggis, Co. Hassler, Lym. Waring, Richard T. Alor, Jacob Huber, Alvin DeWall, John Ferguson, W. Lyles.

BRITISH OFFICIAL ACCOUNTS OF THE BATTLE NEAR CORNWALL.

Head-Quarters, La Chine, 13th November, 1813.

General Orders.—The governor in chief and commander of the forces has the satisfaction to announce to the troops, that the corps of observation with the division of gun-boats, which he had ordered from Kingston to follow the movements of the enemy's army under major-general Wilkinson, and to be placed under the command of lieutenant-colonel Morrison, of the 89th regiment, has completely defeated a large division of the American army, consisting of cavalry, riflemen and infantry, exceeding four thousand men, which attacked it on the 14th instant, near Crysler's, about twenty miles above Cornwall, taking from the enemy one field piece, six pounder, and four hundred prisoners. As his excellency is not yet in possession of the particulars of this brilliant achievement, he cannot specify the loss sustained by either; that of the enemy is represented by an eye-witness to the action, to have been very considerable.

It is further been reported to his excellency, that lieutenant-colonel Morrison, with the 89th regiment, and captain Mulcaster, of the royal navy, with a division of gun-boats, had effected a landing at Hamlet, where they were put in possession, by the inhabitants of that place, of all the public stores left there for the use of the American army, and among other articles they restored to them the goods that had been taken on board the seven merchant bateaux belonging to Montreal, captured a few weeks ago, and after destroying the public buildings our forces again united and continued to hang on the enemy's rear.

His excellency has also a report from captain Mulcaster, of the royal navy, stating his having brought over from Ordeburg to Prescott, a 13 inch and a 19 inch brass mortar, with their stores, and a large supply of provisions, which had been deposited there by the American army.

It will also be satisfactory to the troops to learn, that our loss of brave and gallant soldiers was not considerable; neither lieutenant colonels Morrison, Hovey or Pearson, has suffered on this occasion, and on the 12th the daring little band were renewing their molestations of the enemy in his progress towards Montreal, where major-general Wilkinson had publicly declared it was the order of his government to take up his winter quarters.

This order to be publicly read at the head of every regiment of regular troops and battalion of militia.

By his excellency's command,
EDW. BAINES, Adj. Gen.

Leat-Quarters, La Chine, 15th Nov. 1813.

General orders.—His excellency the governor general and commander of the forces, has received from lieutenant-colonel Morrison, 89th regiment, the official report of the action which took place on the 14th inst. at Crysler's farm, 2 miles above Cornwall, between the corps of observation, consisting of the 49th and 89th regiments, and a detachment from the garrison of Prescott, under lieutenant-colonel Pearson, the whole amounting to about eight hundred men, and the principal division of the enemy's army commanded by major-general Boyd.—On the day preceding the action, an affair took place in the presence of the corps of observation passing on the enemy, each after a short conflict terminated in a success, the British division occupying that night the ground on which the affair had taken place.

On the 11th lieutenant-colonel Morrison continued his pursuit, when the enemy concentrating his force, made a grand effort to relieve himself from so troublesome an opponent, and advanced with his heavy columns of infantry, supported by artillery, his front covered by a numerous body of cavalry and riflemen. Lieutenant-colonel Morrison fell back gradually, and took up a judicious position (which he had previously made choice of) with his little band, his right on the river, consisting of the flank companies of the 49th regiment and a detachment of the Canadian fencibles, under lieutenant-colonel Pearson, with a six pounder a little advanced, supported by three companies of the 89th regiment under captain Bains—the 49th and 89th regiments formed the main body of reserve extending across the road to a pine wood, occupying a space of seven hundred yards.

Major Heriot, with a detachment of the Canadian voltigeurs, and a small band of Indian warriors under lieutenant Anderson, secured the left flank. The action commenced about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and in half an hour became general, the enemy attempting to turn the left of the British, but were repulsed by the 49th and 89th regiments, which advanced, firing by wings and platoons. The enemy having failed in this attempt, united their utmost effort in an attack on the right, supported by four pieces of artillery and their cavalry, which was in like manner repulsed, the 49th and 89th regts. having moved up in echelon and formed in line; a charge commenced by the 49th regt. was not persevered in, in consequence of the enemy's having charged upon the right, and threatened to gain the rear; but their cavalry were so gallantly received by the three companies of the 89th regt. under capt.

Barns and the well directed fire of the artillery under capt. Jackson, that they were instantly repulse, and by the rapid pursuit of capt. Barns' party, a six pounder was captured from the enemy; whose attention was now solely directed to cover the retreat of his beaten forces. In this last effort he was foiled by a judicious movement of the corps under lieutenant Pearson, who continued to pursue the enemy in his flight.

[Here col. Morrison speaks of the merits of lieutenant Pearson and Plenderlath; majors Clifford and Heriot of the militia and capt. Jackson; also of lieutenant Morley, captains Skinner and Davis, of the staff; lieutenant Anderson, of the Indian department, and lieutenant Hagerman of the militia.]

It is with deep regret that lieutenant col. Morrison transmits a list of casualties, containing the loss of several brave soldiers—but when the unequal contest, and the quadruple loss of the enemy, and the importance of this splendid victory are considered, the comparative British loss will appear less than might reasonably be expected.

Returns of killed, wounded and missing.

[Here follow the particular returns of the killed, wounded and missing, of the several corps, which it is unnecessary to insert.]

Total—1 captain, 2 drummers, and 19 rank and file killed; 1 captain, 9 subalterns, 6 sergeants, and 131 rank and file wounded; 12 rank and file missing.

Names of officers killed and wounded.

40th regt.—Capt. Nairne, killed; lieutenant Jones, wounded dangerously; lieutenant Bartley, wounded severely not dangerously; lieutenant Clans, wounded, left leg amputated; lieutenant Morton, wounded severely, not dangerously; lieutenant Richmond, wounded slightly.

89th regt.—Capt. Brown, wounded severely, not dangerously; Ensign Leaden, wounded slightly.

40th flank company.—Lieut. Holland, wounded severely.

Canadian Fencibles.—Lieut. Beloriniere, wounded dangerously, since dead; Lt. Armstrong, wounded dangerously. By his excellency's command.

EDWARD BAYNES, Adj. Gen. N. A.

The following remarks on the preceding "official" is from the Plattsburg Republican. It well exposes its strange falsehoods. Another account says that we took about 50 prisoners; that our whole loss, killed, wounded and missing was but 350; that not one of our men was taken prisoner during the action; that those that the enemy took were only a few stragglers, not exceeding 20 or 30; and that the few wounded left on the field was entirely owing to the neglect of officers commanding corps, who had ample time to remove them.

"If you would tell a great lie, take care not to enter into particulars."

The importance of the above maxim to all writers of "British official," which have become other terms for great lies, will appear by comparing the main assertions in the "British official" account of general Boyd's late action, with the detail given in the same statement. The "official" declares in the first place, that our force consisted of more than four thousand men!!

In the next place it asserts that the whole British force, of all descriptions, was only eight hundred!!!

But it gives a detail:

"40th and 89th regiments of infantry formed } the body of reserve from the main to come } wood occupying a space of 700 yards." }
"A detachment from the garrison of Pres- } cott."

"Major Heriot, commanding a detachment } of Canadian Voltigeurs."

"A band of Indian warriors secured the left } flank under lieutenant Anderson."

"A corps of the royal artillery under captain } Jackson."

Lieutenant Hagerman of the militia acted } for the line as aid; of course there was } militia }

The reader will observe that the two regiments, occupying a space of 700 yards, formed only the corps of reserve; of course they must have had their main body to fight their battle distinct from them; then let him carry out the numbers severally, according to his discretion, no larger than they must necessarily have been: Then compare the amount with 800 men! and he will be able to form some idea of the difference between the "official" statements, and the truth.

The truth, (which is well known known, and for which all our gallant officers who were engaged in that well fought action, will pledge their reputation,) is, that the whole number of American troops who were either in, or near the action, was less than 1600 men. And it is also equally true, that the British outnumbered us in regulars, and including Indians and militia they were superior in number by at least one third. This last will also be found to agree with the above detail from the British account.

As for the assertion of their having taken 400 prisoners, it is wholly a fiction, added only to keep the rest of the statement in countenance.

We have good reason for believing that the British loss in killed and wounded far exceeded ours: else why, after making several desperate but unsuccessful attacks to prevent our "little band" from embarking, did they deem it proper to stand aloof and suffer them to get into their boats and depart without attempting further to molest them; although they had four pieces of artillery and 12 gun boats, which had they been thus far successful, must have destroyed our detachment.

NAVAL.

Captain Elliott has arrived at Buffalo; and has regained his health.

The President frigate.—It is stated that commodore Rodgers went to sea, some days ago, the British blockade notwithstanding.

It is said that admiral Warren by proclamation, has also blockaded Newport and Norharen, with the intermediate ports.

The Essex and Congress.—Midshipman Clarke and seven seamen of the Essex, have arrived at Newport, R. I. from Rio Janeiro. He is reserved in his communications as to where he supposes the frigate now is, when she may be expected, &c. He states the following—that in January last, he was sent to Rio Janeiro with a prize; that the prince regent ordered him immediately to sea; and the vessel not being supposed fit to be carried to the United States, he took her out of the harbor and burnt her. About four weeks previous to his sailing from Rio Janeiro, the Rosa, a prize to the Essex, had arrived there, with the crews of seven merchant vessels captured by the frigate. Captain Porter, who was "almost adored by his officers and crew," had fitted out one of his prizes, and called her the "Essex Junier." She had sent several prizes into Valparaiso (Chili). The last account of the frigate was, that she sailed from that port on the 24th of June, on cruise.

The British frigate Nemesis had arrived at Ri from the river Plate with $2, 60,000. They hear that an American frigate (the Congress) was waiting for her, and the cash was shifted to the Mont gue, of 74 guns. The Congress is said to have watered near Pernambuco on the 1st of August.

A frigate and two sloops of war had sailed from Rio Janeiro, to proceed round Cape Horn to intercept the Essex, and take possession of our settlement on Columbia river.

The famous privateers Rattlenake and Scourge were yet off the North Cape, Aug. 19, doing an active business.

A person who was lately on board the Majestic, says that the officers stated that ten sail of the line were coming out from England in the spring, when Boston would be blockaded. The bulwarks of the Majestic are twelve feet high and eighteen inches thick, of solid timber.

Capt. Stafford, famous for his defence of the Dolphin privateer in the Chesapeake last summer, was attacked close in with Charleston, on the 27th ult. by five boats from a British brig of war; when close upon him, he tore one of the boats to pieces with grape shot, and gave the rest employ in saving their comrades. The brig after discharging a broadside at him, hauled off. Capt. S. had one man wounded. The loss of the enemy unknown.

Capt. Kemeely, of the sloop Betsey, from Maurice river for Newbern, N. C. was captured by the Lancemontain, who put 5 men and a prize master on board, leaving capt. K. and another person on board; which two made out to surround the six Englishmen, and take them safely to Newbern. In one of the attempts of the enemy to re-take the vessel, the prize master fell overboard; but capt. K. put out the boat and saved him. He promised that no further resistance should thereafter be made, and he did not attempt it; but he was well watched.

On the 23d ult. the U. S. schooners Carolina, of 14 guns, and "General Horsford," were at Wilmington, N. C. They are to remain on that station. The latter is not yet fitted for service.

It is stated from Bermuda, that the enemy vessels on the North American station have orders to keep on our coasts during the winter. We are glad of this; for admiral North-West will have some of them.

A British barge belonging to the Jason sloop of war, with a lieutenant and 7 men, entered Wilmington creek, Delaware, a few days ago, and captured two shallops;—but their retreat was cut off by a party of militia; their barge captured and they themselves made prisoners of. Three others came in as deserters.

Copy of a letter from commodore Jacob Lewis, commanding the New-York flotilla to the secretary of the navy.

New-York, November 30, 1813.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you, that on the 29th the flotilla force re-captured from the Plantaganet, a schooner from New-Orleans, loaded with cotton and lead.

The enemy had chased the schooner on shore about thirteen miles from where the flotilla laid at anchor; however, before the enemy had time to get the vessel off, or to unladen the cargo, they were attacked, beaten off, and the vessel taken possession of. The enemy sent a flag to demand a ransom for the schooner and cargo, stating she was in their power, and unless we consented to ransom the vessel, he would destroy her—also also all the houses on shore. All his threats did not answer his purpose—the vessel and cargo are ours.

I have the honor to assure you of my consideration and respect,

JACOB LEWIS.

THE DAYS OF THE GOTH, RETURNING.

Extract of a letter from captain J.F. Donough, commanding the U. S. naval force on lake Champlain, dated Plattsburg Bay, 23d November, 1813, to the secretary of the navy.

"Accompanying this is the voluntary statement of Abraham Walter, who was pilot of one of the sloops taken last summer. He made his escape from Quebec; and, after a severe journey of ten days, reported himself to me yesterday."

Affidavit of Abraham Walter, pilot of the U. S. sloop Growler, on lake Champlain, viz.

State of New-York, Clinton county, ss.

Abraham Walter, formerly pilot to the sloop of war Growler, on lake Champlain, being duly sworn, deposed and saith, that he was employed on board the sloop when it was taken by the British in June last; that after the sloops Growler and Eagle were surrendered, the prisoners, both officers and sailors, were taken to Quebec, where they were immediately confined on board a British prison ship; there they were examined by a public officer or examiner, and about eight or ten of the prisoners were declared to be British subjects; these were immediately separated from the rest, and put on board a man of war and sent to England, to be tried for treason. One of these was known to be a native of New-Hampshire by captain Herreck, of the New-Hampshire volunteers, who was also a prisoner, and who had known him from his infancy; and several of the rest were declared by other of their acquaintance to be native citizens of the United States. These representations were unavailing with British officers who commanded, and they were torn thus from their companions to defend themselves against the charge of treason in England.

The residue were still confined to their prison-ships, in a situation more disagreeable than can well be imagined.

Some time after, a number of British vessels were wishing to proceed to Halifax, the crews of which had mostly been pressed out of them to fight the American forces on the upper lakes, and seamen were wanted to supply their place. Gen. Prevost sent an order to general Glasgow, who then commanded there, directing him to proceed on board the prison-ship and to induce the prisoners to volunteer to man their fleet for Halifax; and in case they refused to comply, to force them on board for that purpose. The application was made; but the American prisoners, considering the measure unjustifiable towards their own government, refused to volunteer, and were accordingly forced on board the vessels by a British press gang, where this deponent understood they had quarters assigned them, and were compelled to assist them in navigating British vessels to Halifax, and afterwards to England, as this deponent has since been informed; and further, that not one of the seamen who was a prisoner there was exempted from this proceeding.

And this deponent further saith, that in the beginning of the present month of November an order was received in conformity to the prince regent's order or proclamation to seize forty-six American officers and non-commissioned officers, who were then prisoners of war and to imprison them, to be kept in close confinement, agreeably to the tenor of that proclamation. Prisoners to that number, most of whom were officers there on their parole, many of them in a delicate state of health, were immediately put under arrest, and marched guarded to the public prison, and immured for what fate is to him unknown. Among these destined for close imprisonment, are lieutenant Smith, then in a declining state of health, and Dr. James Wood, a citizen of Champlain, who was taken from his home whilst he was the employment of the revenue, but as this deponent believes no way connected with the army. They were imprisoned on the 5th of November instant.

This deponent further saith, that the enemy has uniformly at that place treated American prisoners, both officers and privates, with extreme rigor; that some time since an American midshipman and two masters' mates, merely for having proceeded on a party of pleasure, about half a mile beyond the limits assigned them, though they immediately returned within them, were seized and put into prison and kept in irons, till the general imprisonment of officers and non-commissioned officers as above related took place. And this deponent further saith, that all that was allowed for the American prisoners on board the prison ship was daily one pound of ordinary bread, which the inhabitants declared had been twice to the West Indies, and condemned for spoiled bread; and one half pound of exceedingly bad meat, which in almost any other situation would be absolutely not eatable; no liquors; no soap to prevent themselves from becoming lousy; no candles; and a meagre of the other comforts of life: and that it was the opinion of all the prisoners, that many of them had actually starved to death, not being able to eat the provisions; and further, that immediately on the prince regent's proclamation being received, Colonel Gardner the American agent there, who had been occupied in paying off the sick and privates of the land service, was immediately notified by Governor Prevost to consider himself confined to the same limits which were assigned for the officers at Beaufort; and when this deponent left that place, he was compelled to remain with general Winchester and others, and was not permitted to visit the prisoners who were in distress on board the prison ships, or to visit the town to negotiate his bills for the relief of the officers, and had already been obliged to share what little private money he had with him among them for their temporary relief. This deponent further saith, that he started from the neighborhood of Quebec, and came by the way of Derby in Vermont, and arrived at this place two days since; and further this deponent saith not.

ABRAHAM WALTER.

Sworn before me, this 23d day of Nov. 1813.

Copy of a letter from Commodore Rodgers to the secretary of the navy, dated

U. S. Frigate President,
Providence, November 5, 1813.

SIR—Mr. West, the bearer herewith, and late acting captain of this ship, was sent by me to England in June last, in the British government packet Duke of Montrose, which vessel after her capture, I converted into a cartel for the purpose of conveying 79 prisoners on parole to Falmouth.

You have already had copies of the stipulations on which I granted the cartel, as well as of the terms on which the 79 prisoners above mentioned were permitted to return to England; but as the British government found it convenient to prefer the forfeiture of the honor of 79 of their subjects, to a compliance with the sacred obligations under which they had voluntarily bound themselves to the United States, I have thought it proper to direct Mr. West, who has just returned from England, to proceed to Washington in order that you may the more distinctly hear from himself the bad faith with which the British government behaved on the occasion.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

(Signed)

JOHN RODGERS.

Hon. Wm. Jones, secretary of the navy.

To Commodore Rodgers.

SIR—I am sorry to inform you that the British government has refused to sanction the terms of exchange entered into and signed at the time you captured the Montrose under my command, and assign as a reason that "such transactions are inconsistent with the established understanding between the two nations." I feel much regret at this determination of the government under which I have the honor to serve, and beg to assure you that nothing in my power has been wanting to procure the intended exchange, but your good understanding of the situation I hold, and that my individual interest can have no influence with the established laws of the two belligerents, will, I have no doubt, excuse me from any blame on this head.

I beg to return you my sincere thanks for your attention and politeness to me while I had the misfortune of being on board the President, and am, with the greatest respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. G. BLEWITT.

Falmouth, 5th July, 1813.

The case of those unfortunate individuals as represented below, is the lot of thousands of their fellow citizens so feloniously held and outrageously treated. The petitions were handed to the editors of the New-York Gazette, by a passenger in the sloop Lady Washington, from Savannah, captured off New-York, a few days ago, by the Plantagenet and ransomed. The bearer of the petitions was a prisoner on board the man of war for five days, and received the paper from one of the petitioners.

H. M. S. Plantagenet, R. Lloyd, captain, cruising off New-York, November 21st, 1813.

SIR,—WE YOUR PETITIONERS DO HUMBLY PRAY, That you will please to lay our case before the president and the house of representatives, as being citizens of the United States, and being compelled to serve on board of his Britannic majesty's ship, as above, contrary to the law of nations; and moreover, we your petitioners, have made application to the board of admiralty at London, before the said ship sailed for the coast of America; and before we wrote to the board. As soon as we heard hostilities had commenced between Great Britain and the United States, we made application to the captain of the above ship, and the said captain gave us abuse and threatened to send us on board of a guard ship. When we your petitioners, could get no redress, we laid our case before the board of admiralty, and have every reason to believe, that we were ordered to be discharged, or considered as prisoners of war. We, your petitioners, are not allowed to speak or hold conversation with any Americans, who are at times on board, from coasters and small craft, that the above ship at times detains.

[The petitioner then, at great length and minuteness, tells how he served his apprenticeship to the hating business in Philadelphia, naming his master and where he lived, and many of his relations, with the streets, &c. in which they resided. How that he began business for himself in "Callowhill-street," how and when he married, &c. and went to sea in a ship for Canton, 1793, &c. &c. and then adds]—

I hope that you will be pleased to investigate into this affair, and not let me be considered as an enemy to my country, which I am bound to protect, by all laws human and divine.—And I am certain that it must be against nature to be against ones flesh and blood: but I am determined they shall have no life before they shall force me. I hope you will take my case under your sage consideration, and your petitioner shall ever pray.

JAMES KILLIGAN.

Your petitioner, Joseph Parker, a native of the state of Virginia, seaman, served his time out at Norfolk, in the above state, humbly begs that you will please to capture of captain Barron, who formerly commanded the Chesapeake frigate, when I sailed with him in that time, or to Stephen Decatur, who personally knows me, as I was a servant under his command. I hope that you will please to take my case in for your consideration, and your petitioner shall ever pray.

JOSEPH PARKER.

The Austrian Manifesto.

Cobden has the following remarks on the Austrian Manifesto—page 181.

"I shall then suppose that my neighbor Brindley of Hensham, has a daughter who is dear to him as his heart's blood—(I suppose the case of my friend Dudley, because, to his sorrow, he has no daughter, and is too honest a man to be offended by my making use of his name in a case in which no man who knows him would ever believe him to be guilty.)—and that my neighbor Hildreth, of Lower Farm, is desirous of putting an end to an old family quarrel, by marrying farmer Brindley's daughter. I shall suppose that farmer Brindley, who attends church on Sunday and holidays, pays his tythes and taxes with great apparent satisfaction, has conceived a grudge against young Hildreth, and envies the prosperous manner in which he pursues husbandry, and the fine condition of his live stock; that he conceives an antipathy even at his high reputation in Hampshire, inasmuch as Hildreth, though he does not attend church so often, nor flatter the parson, is still as good a man in the main. I shall suppose, for I am only supposing, that old Brindley consents to give his daughter, dearest to his heart, to Hildreth in marriage, and that the grand children of Hildreth by Brindley's daughter, are to inherit his fine farm and farm house in fee simple, and the live stock; that they shall, as the scripture says, "become bone of one bone and flesh of one flesh;" and that old Brindley, in order to render every thing complete, proposes to swear upon the holy evangelists, to bury all enmities, and to live in that affection and friendship, which should become the father and husband of this fair and innocent peace offering. Now, if it should afterwards appear, in one or two years after that Brindley's daughter brings him a grandson, that at the very time of his giving his daughter away, he did so with the premeditated purpose to lay a scheme among his neighbors to destroy his son-in-law, nay, to cut his throat and burn his farm, and by imputations the most iniquitous cast on his son-in-law, he should premeditatedly and secretly arm all his neighbors with clubs and staves and pitchforks, to go and destroy poor Hildreth, his wife, child, farm, farmhouse and cattle; and that when Hildreth, suspecting or hearing of his design, should endeavor to persuade him to remain peacefully at home, and that no one should molest him; yet, that Brindley should still promise friendship, and still continue to labor until the neighbors were again so completely enraged and mad as to cut his throat; what should we say of old farmer Brindley? would not any man say, that that day was too good a birth for him; and that such a monster should be banished from human society. I make no comments; if farmer Brindley would merit punishment and abhorrence, would he deserve better, merely because he is emperor of Austria. I shall leave this common life story to the consideration of a thinking people."

"The winds and seas are Britain's wide domain,
"And not a sail, but by permission spreads!"
British Naval Register.

701. A Brig Dart, sent into Salem.

702. A ship, richly laden with dry goods, said to be worth from 1 to 200,000 dollars taken by the fort at Eastport!—This vessel was said to be bound from St. Andrews for Halifax, but supposed really bound for the United States, expecting to be captured by a smuggling privateer boat, according to previous arrangements; for she had been off the port for some days, a part of which time she was in company with two British vessels of war. But it so happened, that having got under way, apparently to return to St. Andrews, the wind being light and the tide strong, she was drifted under the very guns of the fort, and made prize of!

703. Ship General Hodgkinson, from Curacao for Martinique, with sail, &c. and some specie, captured by the Saratoga, but cast away near Charleston, S. C. where the prize-master and crew have arrived.

704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710. S-seven small craft, captured on the St. Lawrence, laden with merchandise, stated in a Montserrat paper to be worth 5000 pounds sterling.

711. Brig Edward, from N. w-Brunswick, laden with oil and fish, and sent into Folly Landing, by the Fox privateer of Baltimore.

712. Swedish brig Janstoft, from Halifax bound to the enemy squadron off New-London, laden with dry goods, taken by the Washington, of Portland, and sent into Plymouth. It is suspected this is mere smuggling. "A PRIZE NO PRIZE!"

713. Brig Lloyd, from Goree, captured by the Saratoga; her cargo of cannon, muskets and pistols taken out, and burnt.

714. Ship Vesta, of 10 guns, from London for Bonavista, captured by the Saratoga, divested of her guns and all her valuables and suffered to proceed with a little "friendly advice," not being worth sending in. The Saratoga had thrown 10 of her guns over when chased by some British vessels of war, and supplied herself very opportunely from the Vesta.

715. Schr. Eagle, from Barbadoes for Berlice with the mail and a quantity of government stores, captured by the Saratoga.

716. Schr. Joseph, of Surinam, laden with government stores; captured by the Saratoga, who took out her cargo and ransomed the vessel, putting on board 29 prisoners on parole.

717. Schr. Lady Cockburn, with a cargo of indigo and some coffee—took out the cargo and let her pass, being lucky.

718. The Saratoga has arrived at Wilmington, N. C. and besides the cargoes of the above vessels, is said to have on board a pretty considerable sum in specie. She watered at the Canary Islands, where she was very generously treated; and at La Guayra was saluted by the fort and handsomely supplied with live stock, and every thing she wanted, in consequence of the benevolent behavior of the government of the United States after the earthquake.

718. Brig, from Halifax for Jamaica, laden with fish and oil, sent into St. Mary's, by the Saucy Jack.

Proceedings of Congress.

Both houses formed a quorum on Monday.

Tuesday, Dec. 7—Several additional members appeared—at 12 o'clock a message was received from the President, (see page 246) and read; and after some unimportant business both houses adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, Dec. 8—The following committees were appointed, in pursuance of the order of yesterday:

Committee of Ways and Means.—Messrs. Eppes, Taylor, Roberts, Creighton, Alston, McKim, and Cox.

Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.—Messrs. Newton, Murfree, Seybert, Jackson of R. I. Baylis, Gourdin, and Grosvenor.

Committee of Claims.—Messrs. Archer, Yancey, Goodwyn, Law, Alexander, Bard and Davenport.

Committee on Public Lands.—Messrs. McKee, Robertson, Humphreys, Mosby, Irwin, Pickens and McCoy.

Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.—Messrs. Rhea, of Tenn. Lyle, Sturges, Bizzow, Writter, Frazer, and Hall.

Committee for the District of Columbia.—Messrs. Kent of Md. Lewis, Pearson, Crawford, Sharp, Brown and Bradley.

Committee on the Judiciary.—Messrs. Ingersoll, Nelson, Pitkin, Stoughton, Pickens, Montgomery, and Oakley.

of Retail and Unfinished business.—Messrs. Condit, Stanford, and Wheaton.

Committee of accounts.—Messrs. Moore, Barnett and John Reed.

Thursday, Dec. 9—No public business of importance done—a confidential message was received from the president, supposed to relate to an embargo.

Legislature of Pennsylvania.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

FELLOW CITIZENS,—Never has the general assembly of Pennsylvania met at a period when duties more important were to be discharged, or rights more sacred to be defended. Since the last session of the legislature, events the most interesting have followed one another in rapid succession. Our sister states on the lakes and on the Atlantic have been invaded, and the capital of the union menaced by hostile fleets and armies. I am happy and grateful to say that under Divine Providence, the savage invaders have been repelled. A territory has been restored to the union, our western fellow-citizens now sleep in safety and pursue without fear their lawful occupations. The hands, dyed in innocent blood, which were uplifted to slay and scalp our fellow citizens, are now raised to supplicate their mercy. The mighty fleets laden with men and engines of destruction, which hovered on our coasts, infested our bays and rivers, and threatened to lay our cities in ashes, have found it expedient to depart without having accomplished any other object than that of inflaming the public resentment and exciting the profoundest detestation by their brutal inhumanity.—Will do they estimate the American people, who presume that the wrongs done them can be consumed in the flames of defenceless villages, their resentments assuaged by the tears of their violated countrywomen, or their courage quenched by the blood of faithlessly massacred prisoners. The heart sickens, but the arm is invigorated in the recollection of the scenes of barbarism which have been exhibited on our lake frontier and our Atlantic borders.—The implacable hatred of the enemy, and his desire to do evil have been sufficiently manifested, but his power has been found more impotent than had been imagined; nor have the privations of the nation been at all proportioned to what was expected, much less have we suffered the manifold calamities, which the fears of the timid, or the treachery of the factious had portrayed. But if all that had been predicted had been inflicted, I trust and believe the fortitude and valor of Americans would have borne them without a murmur, and that the same virtues would conduct them to victory and safety. When war was declared, the people of the United States knew that they must breast its dangers and overcome its difficulties, and they prepared accordingly; they unsheathed the sword, not to do wrong, but to compel right, and they know the value of the rights for which they contend too well ever to abandon them.

For thirty years was the attention of our government and of our people solely directed to cultivate the arts of peace as congenial with the principles of the former as they are with the dispositions of the latter. Scarcely was the theory of military tactics studied, and the happy situation of our country precluded equally the necessity of practice. To these circumstances and the having to contend with a foe inured to war, blood and desolation, it is owing that we met with partial reverses. Disasters and defeats are incident to all wars, they were anticipated—we could not expect to be exempt from the lot of other nations, but as we have more at stake than any other people upon earth, so, unshrinkingly and undismayed, ought we to meet misfortunes as to convince the enemy that our spirit is as unconquerable as our cause is just. And as the prowess of our military officers is rapidly developing and the discipline of our forces constantly improving, there is rational ground for confidence, that with the blessing of Heaven our efforts will result in a complete triumph over our enemies.—As a prelude we refer with pride to the glorious victory on lake Erie, which if ever equalled, was, in naval warfare never excelled. A victory not less brilliant in its achievement than important in its effects, not less honorable to the nation, than to the highly distinguished Perry who commanded and to the brave officers and men who composed that heroic force. Already is the brow of the young warrior Croghan encircled with laurels, and the blessings of thousands of women and children rescued from the scalping knife of the ruthless savage of the wilderness and from the still more savage Proctor rest on Harrison and his gallant army. Chauncey, though not equally successful with the renowned hero of lake Erie, has sought and deserves to be so. On that element claimed by Britain as her exclusive domain, the American flag waved triumphant in every equal conflict. The infant navy of the United States has given a deep, can we not with truth say, a mortal wound to the fell monster of the deep: with these truths before us, can it be deemed presumptuous to hazard the prediction, that the so lately, by the tyrant of the ocean, despised American navy, is destined completely to humble his pride—control his power, and coerce him to respect justice and the rights of independent nations. Were it not the province of another upon which I should regret to intrude, it would be delightful further to dwell upon this proud and resplendent page of our history.

The state of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania is in every point of view gratifying; our treasury is more full than at any former period, and the receipts of the last year greater than that of any former.—In the treasury remains as you will perceive by an exhibit to be made of your financial concerns by the accountant department, an unexpended balance of more than three hundred and forty six thousand dollars.—The produce of the earth has been abundant.—All our old manufactures are thriving and many new ones are introduced, and in a prosperous way; these, however we may deprecate and deplore the calamities of a protracted war, will console us with a prospect of permanent and extensive manufacturing establishments equal to our wants, and such as will ensure the real and practical independence of our country; the erection of bridges—the completion of roads and the clearing of lands, shew the general welfare.—And the recent elections not only throughout this state, but all our sister states, demonstrate the increase of public confidence to the general government and the determination also of the people to support the war with all their energies until an honorable peace can be obtained. That no effort has been left untried to attain this desirable object, with, I am confident, be satisfactorily shown by the chief magistrate of the union in his communication to congress.

In obedience to regulations from the president of the United States, a third and a fourth detachment of Pennsylvania militia of 1000 men each, were ordered into the service of the union. The fourth detachment was to protect the shores of the Delaware, and the third to protect the vessels of war then building and equipping in the harbor of Erie in this state. The happy result of this service is amply manifested in a glorious victory to which I have alluded and the consequences that have flowed from it. The organizing and officering of these detachments agreeably to the directions of the secretary at war, was attended with considerable difficulty arising out of the inefficiency of our militia law and the discordance between our military system and that of the United States. The many defects of our system render a complete and thorough revision not only desirable and expedient but indispensable.—A conformity with the organization and regulation of the army of the United States, would facilitate the detaching for service any requisition which may hereafter be made, and prevent many of those contests between corps and officers for rank and precedence which have too frequently tended to injure the reputation of our citizen soldiers and the public service. The strong presumption that early in the spring and during the summer the enemy will invade, for the purpose of plunder and devastation, the shores of the Delaware, is, independent of all other considerations, motives sufficient to induce the adoption of all precautionary measures which prudence and foresight can suggest. The purchase of arms and ammunition and the encouragement of efficient volunteer corps, would certainly tend to inspire confidence as well as multiply the means of resistance.—Circumstanced as we are, one of our most important duties is to give the state an energetic militia law: our constituents expect it and our country demands it. Shall we disappoint expectations so just, demands so reasonable? In the message I had the honor to transmit to the legislature under date of the 7th of December, 1809, I submitted my opinion on this subject so fully that I cannot deem it necessary now to occupy your time with farther details.

Amongst the measures adopted by the general government for supporting the just and necessary war in which the nation is engaged, is a direct tax upon property.—Possessing as our state does, the means, I cannot doubt the disposition of her legislature to give effect to her repeated professions, by appropriating a portion of her treasure for the commutation and prompt payment of the state's quota of the tax. Interest and patriotism unite so obviously in recommending this measure that the executive would not have recurred to it, were it not for the necessity there is, that the subject should be legislated upon without delay. The 7th section of the act imposing that tax, provides, that each state which determines to pay its quota, and thus avail itself of the 15 per cent. deduction, must give information thereof to the treasury department of the United States before the 10th day of January next.

At no period of our history has the immense importance of internal navigation been so strikingly exemplified as since the commencement of hostilities. The transportation of produce and the intercourse between citizens of different states, which but more strongly the bands of social and political union, are greatly retarded, and through many of their accustomed channels, entirely interrupted by the war-craft of the enemy, sailing, burning and otherwise destroying the property which it cannot appropriate to its own use. The clearing and improving our rivers and creeks, and connecting them by canals would afford us a safe, cheap and expeditious mode of transportation, in defiance of the thousand ships of our enemy. Permit me to hazard the opinion that less than one half the treasure expended by the United States for the protection of foreign commerce, if combined with state and individual wealth, and judiciously expended, would have perfected an inland water communication from Maine to Georgia. Though the accomplishment of so extensive a work may be distant, yet, much may be done towards it. Pennsylvania has the means, and I trust its legislature the disposition, to appropriate them towards perfecting one of the great links of the chain, by connecting the waters flowing in the Chesapeake with those of the Delaware.

The preservation of morals and our free institutions, together with the true interest of humanity would be much promoted and their perpetuation secured by the general diffusion of knowledge amongst all our citizens. A solemn injunction contemplating these important objects, by the establishment of schools throughout the state, though contained in the instrument from which the departments constituting the government derive their powers, remains yet to be fulfilled, on the broad plan and liberal principles which actuated those who enjoined the duty. The laws in force have done much good, a careful revision of them would probably do much more, by extending the benefits of this important branch of republican polity.

The sale of unseated lands for taxes has ceased to be a source of revenue in some counties, because the coercing payment under the present laws is unpopular and inefficient—I would suggest a forfeiture to the commonwealth of all such lands, the owner for a short period of time to have the right of redemption on payment of a double tax, the penalty in case of redemption and the whole value of the land in case a forfeiture becomes absolute, to form a school fund. Such a provision would remove the odium attached to the present procedure and the liberal minded sufferer would console himself by reflecting, that his want of attention had contributed to the promotion of a plan equally humane and patriotic.

Four years existence has proved the practical excellence of the arbitration principle, which is now incorporated with and in a great measure pervades our civil code. It is generally resorted to by the honest suitor whose object is to have an early and economical termination of a controversy. Amongst the many satisfactory results from the system is the almost immediate lien which the vigilant plaintiff creates on the state of the defendant without doing him the slightest wrong. The defects of the law, are, if any, in the detail. The local experience collected by, and concentrated in, the legislature, will detect and secure appropriate remedies.

Permit me to suggest that the law which directs that two verdicts rendered one way and judgments thereon shall be conclusive on the parties litigant as to real estate, is by the latter requisite rendered almost inoperative. The frequent setting aside the verdicts of juries, perpetuates the evil intended to be remedied by that wholesome provision. Experience has shown that many rules of court and rules of evidence become arbitrary and subversive of justice by their application to cases of a peculiar nature and admitted for the application of general rules. It may facilitate and perhaps mitigate the harshness of the preceding observation to state one case of hardship from among many which occur.—Written evidence upon which principally a plaintiff may have recovered on a first trial, will not be permitted to be read in evidence on a second trial, for no other reason but because the party who had been plaintiff in the first guilt happens to be defendant on the second trial: in every other respect the cause is the same, throughout in all its bearing, and the controversy about the same property. Is there not in such decisions something repulsive to the dictates of common sense, and would it not be promotive of justice to direct that in all cases "necessity either absolute or moral shall be sufficient ground for dispensing with rules of court and of evidence?"

The able and elaborate report of the attorney general on the subject of criminal jurisprudence, well merits an early attention. Its philanthropic principles will, I doubt not, animate the new system which humanity anticipates as the result of your deliberations.

Agreeably to a late decision of our supreme court, it would seem that in a case of larceny, committed in an adjoining state, the offender if he flies hither and brings with him the property stolen, cannot be here punished. Under this decision, which is now considered settled law, some daring offenders have already escaped, and if such a practice be continued, it will encourage theft in the adjoining states in proportion as the impunity afforded by our courts becomes known. This rule of action thus laid down by our supreme court must become still more alarming and injurious if extended, as it is presumed it must be, to the receivers of such stolen property.—It would seem also, that the efficacy of the writ of habeas corpus is much weakened by the act of the 3d of April, 1899, defining contempt of court: For the information of the legislature on this subject, I shall shortly transmit extracts of a letter from the attorney-general, shewing the inefficiency, and pointing out also defects in that important law—the habeas corpus act.

The frequent applications made for pardons for convicts sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor, founded solely on the want of apartments wherein to employ them, and of necessary tools and materials, point out the necessity of an imperative injunction on county commissioners to provide the requisite means for the attainment of the ends contemplated by our humane penal code. The case of an unfortunate fellow mortal, now under sentence of death, and who has from the most conscientious motives been twice respited, impels me to state to you, my fellow-citizens—That in Pennsylvania, famed for the justice and mildness of her penal code, where a contest for six dollars has the full scope of legal investigation extended, even to the supreme judicial tribunal of the state, yet when the life of a citizen is at stake, he shall be hurried through all misapprehensions of witnesses and jurors and errors of courts to an untimely and disgraceful death. For him there is no court of revision, of errors or appeals, nor has he any remedy other than in the mercy of the executive, and that remedy is an absolute pardon, the justice of which must be often doubtful, and would sometimes be culpable: To your judgment and feelings it is submitted whether essential alterations ought not to take place in this system.

Horse-racing, a vice of the most baleful kind, both as to its immediate and consequent effects on morals, continues to be predominant over the laws making penal that cruel and unchristian sport. In despite of the magistracy and the efforts of other good citizens, the laws are violated with impunity, because of the extreme difficulty to prove facts, essential to a conviction, which ingenuity is never at a loss to conceal. I beg leave to reiterate the opinion, that the forfeiture of the animal, brought for the purpose of racing on any ground, is the most effectual mode to stay the mischief.

Much mischief to the morals and to the industry of the state are likely to result from the flood of paper thrown into circulation by unincorporated banks. That this is done in despite of an existing law is too obvious to have escaped your notice. The objections which I felt it my imperious duty to submit to your predecessors against the passage of a general banking law, and to which I beg leave to refer you, apply with double force against the practices now pursuing by unauthorised associations throughout the state. The hand of an independent, disinterested and enlightened legislature will, I trust, correct the evil.

Tavern licenses, regarded as sources of revenue, from the sanctities of the sum paid for them throughout the state, with the exception of the city of Philadelphia, and some contiguous places, operates very unequal, when we compare the emoluments arising from houses of entertainment in different districts of the state. The sum to be paid into the treasury ought to be in proportion to the benefit derived from the privilege granted. A discrimination, founded on some general principle, suppose on the rent paid or the value assessed on the premises occupied as a tavern; such a scale of prices would be more equitable, and would in all probability be productive of other advantages besides those connected with the treasury.

The provisions of a resolution of a late legislature, have resulted in the accumulation of materials believed to be amply sufficient for the formation of an explicit fee bill. It is due to the people and to the public officer that fees of office, for similar services, should be uniform, and in no case should the sum to be paid depend on the discretion of the officer receiving or the individual paying. I would suggest also the establishing by law, of the pay and other expences to be allowed sheriffs for the transportation of convicts to the Philadelphia prison, as a measure calculated to prevent embarrassment in the accountant department.

The number of new counties which have been erected out of old ones, has so entirely deranged the districts heretofore established for the appointment of justices of the peace as to render difficult a compliance with the constitutional injunction, that a competent number of these officers shall be commissioned, in convenient districts. Inconvenience is also felt in all the counties lately organized for judicial purposes, to which the law of the 4th April, 1803, does not extend. A new law containing similar provisions to the law just referred to, has therefore become necessary.

The threatening attitude assumed by the enemy on Lake Erie and the Delaware, induced the expenditure of a portion of the $50,000 placed by the legislature at the discretion of the executive. It has been appropriated to the repair of arms, the purchase of ammunition and camp equipage, an account of it and of the monies expended, as additional compensation to those of our militia who had faithfully served under any of the requisitions of the president of the United States, will so soon as the proper department shall have been furnished with necessary vouchers, be laid before you; and also an account of expences incurred by the call of major-general Mead, on the first brigade of its division, for the defence of the United States' flotilla then in the harbor of Erie.

The million of dollars authorised by a law of the last session to be subscribed to the loan opened by the United States government has not been subscribed. The time necessarily consumed in executing the provisions deemed necessary by some of the banks before they would pay over the sums they proposed to loan to the commonwealth, so far delayed the completion of the loan required by the state, that the books for receiving subscriptions to the loan of the U. States were closed before a copy of the supplementary law passed by the legislature could reach Philadelphia. Full information of every thing done by the agents I had appointed to negotiate and complete the loan, subsequent to my communication of the 25th March last, shall be laid before the legislature.

Agreeable to a law of the last legislature, a plan has been approved for an arsenal in the city of Philadelphia, and a contract for its execution formed, now nearly executed. The various other duties enjoined on the executive, by laws and resolutions, have, I trust, been performed in a spirit correspondent with the motive that dictated the several injunctions.

I have thus, fellow-citizens, explicitly communicated such information, and recommended such measures as experience and reflection have suggested, and it will be gratifying to my feelings, and I trust not injurious to the interests of our constituents, if you, agreeing in opinion with me, shall sanction with your approbation the measures I have suggested. If we differ as to the policy or expediency of any particular measure, I am sure it will be an honest difference, and mutual respect will teach us to give credit to each other, for upright intentions, pure motives, and conscientious convictions emanating from patriotic principles.—Your selection from, and residence in, the various districts of the state, has given you such opportunities of knowing the wants and wishes of the people, and assemble in you such a body of information, of public feeling and public opinion as never can be collected under any other form a republican government, truly impresses you with the character of representatives of the people, and secures for you that respect and confidence which necessarily attaches to so important a station. I shall at all times cheerfully cooperate with you in the adoption of any measure calculated to promote the freedom, interest and happiness of our constituents.

Harrisburgh, 18th December, 1813.

Legislature of Maryland.

LEGISLATIVE COMMUNICATION.—IN COUNCIL.

Annapolis, December 5, 1813.

Communications.—In virtue of a resolution of the general assembly, at its May session, the treasurer was directed to borrow $207,000 dollars, the terms of which the loan was effected, will appear by the report of the treasurer. As soon as the money was obtained, steps were taken to procure muscarbine and military stores for the state, and considerable progress was made; but owing to the interruption of intercourse between the states, the goods could not all be received in time to be sent to those parts of Maryland which are most exposed to danger.

Soon after the adjournment of the legislature, an order was passed after a review of the public records and papers to the seat of government; but in consequence of the approach of a considerable force of the enemy, it was found necessary again to order their removal, and they were sent to the town of Upper Marlborough. It has been deemed expedient to direct, from time to time, a number of each of them to be sent to the several courts; but the board has passed a resolution for the removal of the rest, and it is submitted to the Legislature what shall be done in regard to them. It is certainly much to be desired that the offices should be kept open for the transaction of business; but besides the difficulty of removing the records from the seat of government in time, whenever the appearance of the enemy may require it, there is considerable danger of their being lost or destroyed by frequent removals. The Legislature will see the necessity of making some further provision with respect to them. The resolution of the last session does not make it the duty of the officers to open the offices at the place to which they are ordered to be moved, and by confiding the authority to the officer conferred upon their respective courts, it has been found impracticable to procure the necessary accommodations at the office.

The adjournment of the Legislature will of course be directed to the militia system; in its present state it is almost a dead letter, and without power to compel the service of those who, in any sudden emergency, are unwilling to assist in the defence of the country, it is not, and cannot be expected, but what those who understand the defect of the militia, regret to avoid the service, others will engage in it with cheerfulness, and consent to bear an undue proportion of its burthen and sufferings. It was not designed by the wise framers of the constitution to leave it to each member of the union to defend itself, and after having surrendered to the general government the most material sources of revenue, it is impracticable for the individual states to bear the burthen of any extensive system of defence. It was therefore expressly provided, that the United States should protect each individual state against invasion; and the militia or other force of the latter, was designed to be employed only on sudden emergencies, and until the national government should be come to its relief. If the expense of a war was difficult to the nation, that the state treasury will soon be exhausted, and the annihilation of the state government must follow. We had an unquestionable right to exist, that in a ward, closed by our laws, the nation would have precisely afforded to us the protection which the constitution has so solemnly guaranteed to every member of the union. Instead of this, however, we have to endure ravages and distress which have been produced in different parts of Maryland, by the incursions of the enemy, and that in most exposed places have been left in a defenceless and unprotected situation. Thus abandoned by the national authority, and without any well founded prospect of a speedy termination of the present disastrous war, it is for the wisdom of the legislature to devise the means of defence, which, upon any future invasion, the state authorities shall afford. We must again be permitted to recommend to the legislature the organization of volunteer corps of infantry (both mounted and unmounted) and which would at this time be found the most effectual force for the kind of warfare in which we are engaged. In some places, protection of the militia, this species of force has been started, and it is not to be denied that it was authorized, and became found capable of affording the most service; the pay-rolls of those in it, who I presented to us, may bear witness to the necessity of its protection, because the legislature had refused its sanction to their organization.

We would also call the attention of the legislature to these clauses of the militia law, which establish the rules and articles of war for the government of the militia, while in actual service; we do not mean to question the propriety of such rigorous rules for the government of a regular army, nor do we mean to say, that the militia, while in service, ought to be subject to no regulation, but we press solemnly, that the legislature can devise rules for the government of the militia, without depriving them of any of the essential privileges of freedom, and subjecting them, for a few unadvised and to the most cruel and opprobrious punishment.

We take the liberty also of submitting to the legislature, the propriety of adopting a system of general education; no subject upon which its wisdom can be employed, is of more vital importance, or can have a more imperative claim to its attention. Generalizations like those under which we have the happiness to live, and virtue of their existence and prosperity upon the intelligence and talents of the citizens; and to place the means of education within the reach of every description of the people, ought to be the primary concern, as it is the unquestionable duty, of the Legislature of every free state. It is one among the many causes which we have for deplored the present war, that it diminishes these resources, which ought to be employed in the education of our youth; we still, however, think, that in the opinion of the legislature, funds can be spared for the purpose, the work should be commenced, and a system matured for the establishment of schools in every part of the state.

The amount of claims for pay and rations of militia, called into service in the course of the last summer, already enumerated by this department, exceeds one hundred and six thousand dollars; a more particular account cannot, at this time, be given, as the bonds are still lying upon these claims, and many of them are yet to arrive.

For the purchase of arms and military stores, orders have been drawn to the amount of sixty-nine thousand six hundred and seventy-five dollars; but a considerable sum is yet due on this account. We have the honor to be, with much respect, your obedient servant,
LEW. WINDER.

The Honorable the Governor of the Assembly of Maryland.

Legislature of Virginia.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

General Chamber, December 6th, 1813.

TO THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF DELEGATES.

Tell me, O!—I had the honor to communicate to you at your extra session the most important events of the war in relation to this commonwealth which had occurred previous to that period. Among which the occupation of our waters by the enemy, was the most prominent. His conduct, after your adjournment, continued to excite large expectations; on board of which it was ascertained there were considerable land forces. The conclusion seemed to be inevitable, that he had various designs against our safety, and had determined to make us bear the brunt of the war. Virginia did not regret that she had been thus honorably distinguished. Although sacrifices both private and public might be the consequence, they were not equal to the dust of the balance in the estimate of a brave and generous people, waging a war in defence of the inalienable rights of freedom. Notwithstanding the enemy's force was an imposing one, particularly in relation to the peculiar nature of our exposed frontier, and therefore, called for our new and additional attention; yet an application was indulged as to the final result, if even a small portion of our ancient resources should be judiciously applied. The Executive adapted its measures to the necessities, and in anticipation of the state of the enemy, which had been adopted in the purchase of military stores, a few days elapsed, after the scouts had been taken, before the enemy commenced his operations by an attack, in part, force by land and water, on Crany Island. The result of this attempt, so humiliating to him and so honorable to our brave country, in which he is known to you. It would have been scarcely credible, but for the fact having fully occurred, that three thousand disciplined troops could have been repulsed with slaughter, by six hundred militia, recently called into service, with no other than a half finished assault, and the generous cooperation of a few brave volunteers from the navy. For and in consequence of this disastrous catastrophe, the enemy retreated and burnt his camp at Cherry-Branch, and retreated to his quarters less than thirty miles from the place where his attack was made by land and water, with a force variously estimated; but without doubt, in a ratio compared with ours, of five to one. An opportunity had been constrained to yield to the vigorous over-throwing, yet they are glad that they should have become fugitives, and by the impression they made upon the enemy, gave him a small portion of regret for his attempt. Having obtained possession of this little harbor, a large vessel was sent to reinforce and to repair, and to last winter I have an honorable station on the Bates' command. Private news were plain, and they have been exposed to various ordeals; a sick man in his bed was murdered, under circumstances of peculiar aggravation; our respectable and well known public servant, to suffer the last degree of unutterable violence from a rascal who turned a deaf ear to his supplications; and fratricidal scenes; and filling up the measure of their cruelties, they so egregiously plundered the house of God. The march and flight of the fat of H. Hampton were heard with horror; and that the essential office of indignation is not forth throughout America. Our rag's his, the so-called for severe and aversion. They should have been atoned for by the complete punishment of the offenders, or by some terrible measure of retributive justice. The subject, however, belongs to the general government, to which it was referred. The only spontaneous relative thereto was a resolution in the House of Representatives, relative to the grant of a reward to the war; having one of a part of our territory, his force represented as very considerable, and it is difficult to conjecture, what would be his next object, by the entire adoption of such defensive measures, as in this opinion, the exigency called for, transmitted to the president of the United States full information of our situation, and advised him of their having called out considerable numbers of militia; a measure, which received the sanction of his approbation. I have caused the adjutant-general to prepare, for the information of the general assembly, a full table of militia (which is among the documents in record B.) of these measures, as well as of every other adopted by us, for the defence of the state, and also of the operations of the enemy, which have been limited to predatory incursions along the banks of our navigable bays and rivers, and every where marked with a character of utter unworthiness of a civilized nation. In reference to which report will be seen the various calls which have been made upon the militia at different periods, with the names of the soldiers who, the number now in the service of the United States, and of their respective positions. This information, its publication or particular parts thereof, being deemed expedient. I think it prudent will also be seen the incongruity with our state system, of the grant of a reward, part of it, relative to the system of officers of militia, and of militia called for by the general government; my unavailing endeavors to obviate their effects on our requisitions, and the unjust exclusion from service of some of the officers of militia by my general orders of the 15th April, 1813. In conformity with the request of the secretary of war, I beg leave to present the subject to your consideration.

Notwithstanding the calls on our citizen soldiers have been numerous, and in the section of the country, and contiguous to the theatre of a most particularly incongruous, as well as dangerous, have been frequently placed in service, they have nevertheless displayed generally a degree of alacrity and cheerfulness which gives them lasting claims to the gratitude of their country. Numerous were the examples of patriotic citizens who voluntarily abandoned their domestic enjoyments, and with dauntless intrepidity, exposed their country in the hour of her supposed danger. It furnished a noble and highly gratifying to the patriot, and an illustrious proof of the courage of the nation. Nor was this generous ardor confined to the ranks of the militia. Not a few illustrious citizens of North Carolina, who ennobling under foreign mercenary arms, made a tender of their services. The documents transmitted (marked C.) will exhibit their very satisfactory reasons which prevented the consummation of their honorable intentions. Such a distinguished proof of friendship cannot but make an impression on our minds, the remembrance of which will be cherished with our fondest recollections.

In reviewing the events of the year, reflecting upon the great forces of the enemy, and the extent of his designs, the length of time he remained in our waters, his capacity to fly or fight as circumstances dictated, and the result of his achievements, every where covered with disgrace, there is on our part ample ground for exultation, mingled with gratitude to that Providence which deigns to dispense to us so many instances of his kindness. The various measures of defence adopted by the executive, as well as frequent calls upon their respective regiments by the colored and white militia, under the militia law, have necessarily been productive of considerable expensures. The amount will be seen by reference to the accompanying document marked D; and it is believed on investigation, they will have been warranted by a just regard to the protection of the state, and consequently, will find an irrefragable claim upon the justice of the general government.

Congress at their last session imposed a direct tax on the United States, with an alternative to the state governments of discharging their respective quotas; in which event a discount is to be made of fifteen per centum if it be paid into the treasury of the United States before the tenth day of February next, or of ten per centum if paid before the first of May. The quota of Virginia is three hundred and sixty-nine thousand eight hundred and forty-four cents.

It is submitted to the legislature whether the priority of an appropriation on our parts not dictated as well by considerations of economy as with a view to furnish to the world a solid proof of our determination heartily to co-operate with the general government.

The painful duty devolves on me of announcing to you a vacancy in the council of state by the death of General Wood. Thus was another hero of the revolution paid the great debt of nature; his distinguished services will still survive in the memory of a grateful country.

Nothing has transpired, since your last session, which indicates the least change to our foreign relations. The enemy can be made sensible of the unjust and unprofitable conflict in which he is engaged, only by a vigorous and successful prosecution of the war. The distinguished success which, with scarcely an exception, has every where crowned our efforts, both by sea and land, is to be ascribed to a peculiar source of gratification, and on which I beg leave to congratulate you. The illustrious proofs of the valor and skill of our army and navy which the events of every day are evolving, united with perseverance on the part of the nation and the hope of Divine assistance by the justice of our cause, leave us little to apprehend as to the issue of the war.

The period, I believe, citizens, in which we are called to act, is the most eventful in the annals of the world. Both hemispheres are bleeding under the dreadful scourge of war. And from the profuse and various efforts which are made in the old, the present crisis seems to be to prevail with the destinies of half mankind. What will be the result, or what will be its consequences to us, all trying it is difficult to predict. In any event it behoves us to be sensibly alive to the necessities of the occasion, and to prepare for any result. Let us practice firmness and moderation one to another, cherish concord and brotherly love, draw close the cord of union, and thereby give it a firm and unshakable scope to the energies of our country. Watch with vigilant vigilance the lamp of liberty which can be kept alive only by preserving republican virtues; let above all let us in all our efforts be before the throne of God, who, in the moment of his displeasure, seems to be employing the vial of wrath upon a guilty world, and fervently conjure him to avert from our comparatively happy shores that wide waste of desolation which has over a beloved and other hemisphere. The present crisis, I believe, citizens, is one of probation both to the nation and to individuals. Should America, and not by a just regard for her rights, perseveringly continue the contest in despite of the sacrifices so abundantly incident to war, until she shall have completed an honorable peace, the heroes and patriots of the present day will be deservedly ranked with those of the revolution. Should a contrary course obtain, the consequences would be such as the mind of the patriotic shrinks from contemplating. Every individual is solemnly bound to discharge with fidelity the part assigned him; and in proportion to the share of public confidence he enjoys, the sacredness of this obligation is increased. Suffer me to assure you that by a strong sense of this duty, I have been invariably guided in performing the various acts of high responsibility which have devolved on me, at a time as momentous as emulous days; and should I have erred (as is highly probable, being bereft by a very fallible judgment) I shall, nevertheless, confidently allow myself on the liberality of an individual country; not forgetting it will duly appreciate the difficulties of the occasion, and in any event, do a ample justice to the motives which have influenced my endeavors to discharge the solemn duties imposed on me by my station. I tend to the representatives of the people conceived in general, as naturally best wishes for their personal happiness, with a fervent prayer that their counsel may continue to be guided by energy, patriotism and wisdom, and that the result may be propitious to the safety, liberty and happiness of our country.

J. BARREUR.

Legislature of South-Carolina.

Message from his excellency the governor, delivered to the legislature of this state, on Tuesday, 23d November, 1815.

Fellow Citizens—To have been able to congratulate you upon the prospect of returning peace, and a frank and honorable accommodation of all differences with our enemy while it would have been manifestly gratifying to myself, it might have been the source, I am persuaded, of no less satisfaction to you, and to our country generally. To humiliate to behold the effusion of blood with European indifference, or to consider the materials of which fleets and armies are composed, as mere instruments for the gratification of the angry passions or selfish policy of those who direct them, we do not forget that, however unaccountable the contest, the fall of every patriot soldier cloths some family in mourning; too just to offend or violate the rights of others, we should only to resist encroachments, and to repel the violation of our own rights; too wise and reflecting to be dazzled by the glare of military trophies, or seduced by the false glory of conquest, the only object of our ambition is the quiet enjoyment of the blessings which result from a peaceful and honest intercourse with the world. True to this policy, which I have uniformly professed, and honestly acted upon, those to whom has been committed the conduct of our foreign negotiations, have not ceased, since the commencement of hostilities, to manifest an anxiety for the restoration of peace, commensurate with the reluctance with which they had themselves been compelled to resort to arms. In its final result the promotion of a virtuous and lasting treaty to humanity, and so long as demanded by the true policy to both hemispheres, our government has not scrupled to adopt measures for its negotiation which certainly might have been rejected, withost any other ration of either fastidiousness or unreasoning pride. Unhappily, however, the moderate and conciliatory disposition manifested on our part have not only failed in meeting a correspondent disposition on the part of the enemy, but there is too much reason to believe that such a disposition is only to be induced by the firm and vigorous application of our means of annoyance and distress. To insinuate measures adapted to this end, and to direct the energies of the nation in such a manner as shall produce upon the enemy the strongest impressions, belongs exclusively to the general government. The defensive preparations, however, which shall be considered necessary to the better security of our own coast, as they cannot fail to be deeply interesting to us, so they will doubtless obtain from you all the attention they deserve. Every thing, it is believed, which depended upon the executive, has been done. Purchases of arms and munitions of war, to the full extent of the appropriations subject to the control of this department, have been either actually made, or contracted for; the general staff has been organized; the militia have been classed that should occasion require, any number of regiments can be gotten into the field without delay; and such military positions as were deemed requisite have been directed to be occupied. The extension, or contraction, of these plans of defence will, of course, be determined by the appropriations which you shall think proper to make.

A report of the expenditures for military purposes during the present year, will in a few days be laid before you.

In inviting your attention to our militia system, the subject has been so often under your review, it is scarcely necessary to remind you of its defects. A general revision of it is strongly recommended. In doing this, the necessity of rendering more frequent, at the discretion of the commanding officers, musters by companies, battalions, regiments and brigades, and also of making at least annual, instead of biennial, the encampment of the officers of each brigade, will not fail to present itself. I suggest to you also the policy of increasing the number of our divisions. While these are, at present, so few, that in the event of our troops acting in conjunction with those of either of the United States or a sister state, our general officers must always invariably be outranked; they are so large, and embrace such an extent of territory, that the command of them is not only inconvenient but burdensome.

It is not in the military system only, that you will find room for improvement. One penal code calls loudly for correction. To adopt laws to the character of the people for whom they are intended, is the first maxim of the legislators. The political institutions derived from our ancestors, have been long since liberalized and improved; let us not continue to outrage the feelings of our countrymen, by retaining the barbarous and unequal system of punishment derived from the same source. That punishment should be proportioned to crime, is the language not only of humanity, but of justice. In a code, however, where the ultima supplicium is allotted to not less than one hundred and sixty-five offences, the idea of observing this proportion is idle. Let me earnestly recommend to you then, to substitute for the punishment of death, imprisonment and hard labor. Penitentiaries have been established in so many of our sister states, that the superiority of this species of punishment is no longer theoretical, but demonstrated by experience. It is urged therefore with the more confidence upon your adoption.

In examining our judiciary system, it offers so much to be admired, that perhaps, it may be considered almost inviolable to search for defects. One improvement, however, so forcibly suggested itself, that I cannot forbear presenting it to your consideration: it is the establishment of a high court of error and appeal, to be composed of judges, separate and distinct from the circuit court judges, and to exercise appellate jurisdiction only. The delicacy and in revising the decisions, the reciprocal bias towards the opinions of each other, inseparable from the strongest and purest merits, where the original and appellate jurisdictions are committed to the same persons, though a weighty, is by no means the only objection to the existing system. At present, the judges assemble for the purpose of hearing appeals at the close of every circuit. With this burdened and worn out by previous exertion, it is obviously not very possible, however distinguished their ability, that they should be capable of that full, deliberate and patient investigation due to the important points usually submitted to them; but the annual accumulation of cases on the appeal docket demonstrates, that, with all their diligence, more time is requisite for the business of the appeal, than can be spared from the circuit courts. The institution of the court suggested would not only obviate these objections, but, it is believed, would be the most effectual means of securing that uniformity, impartiality, and correctness of decision, so desirable in our judicial proceedings.

Other subjects of communication, omitted on the present occasion, from the indisposition under which I write, will in a few days be laid before you.

I supplicate for you the favor of our God, and beseech him in his infinite goodness, to render you the instruments of usefulness, of honor and happiness to our country. JOS. ALSTON.

Columbian, November 28, 1813.

Maria Louisa Bonaparte.

The situation of this lady, empress, queen and regent of France and Italy, wife of Bonaparte and daughter of the emperor of Austria, with whom her husband is at war, is very peculiar, and her conduct is calculated to excite more than ordinary interest. The following proceedings may serve to illustrate her sentiments and develop her chaacter, in the conflict of opinion that may be supposed to agitate her.

PARIS, Oct. 8.—Yesterday at one o'clock her majesty the empress, queen and regent, sat out in state for the Thuilleries, to repair to the senate; and having ascended her throne, placed on the left of the emperor, and the grand dignitaries of the empire having taken their proper places, she pronounced the following speech:

“SENATORS: The principal powers of Europe, indignant at the pretensions of England, had, last year re-mitted their armies to ours, in order to obtain the peace of the world, and the re-establishment of the rights of every nation. At the first vicissitudes of the war, the slumbering passions awoke.—England and Russia have dragged Prussia and Austria into their cause. Our enemies wish to destroy our allies in revenge for their fidelity; they wish to bring war into the bosom of our beloved country, as a retaliation for the triumphs which have carried our victorious eagles into the heart of their states. I know better than any one, what our people would have to suffer, if they ever were conquered. Before I ascended the throne, where the choice of my august husband and the will of my father called me, I had the highest opinion of the courage and energy of this great nation. This opinion has daily increased, by every thing that has fallen under my observation. Familiar for four years with the most intimate thoughts of my husband, I know the sentiments that would agonize him upon a throne disgraced, or a crown without glory.

Frenchmen! Your emperor, your country and honor call you.”

After which the minister of war ascended the tribune, read a report addressed to the emperor. At the conclusion of which, count Liegnault, one of the two orators of the council of state, presented to the senate a project of a Senatus Consultum, the object of which was the levy of 280,000 men, besides 30,000 to reinforce the armies in Spain.

Count de Lacedpede rose and addressing himself to H. L. and R. majesty, said—

“MADAM: Before proposing to the senate measures relative to the project which has just been laid before the senate, I have the honor to beg you, H. L. and R. M. to deign to permit me to offer you, in the name of my colleagues, the respectful homage of all those sentiments with which we are penetrated, in seeing your majesty preside over the senate, and hearing the memorable words that you have just uttered from the height of your throne.

With what gratitude, with what religious cares, we shall forever preserve the remembrance of it!”

SENATORS! I have the honor to propose to you to refer to a commission, the project of the Senatus Consultum which has just been presented by the orators of the council of state. This passed non, con.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ARTS OF THE ENEMY.—At the moment that congress convened, the sound was blockaded by the British, to let us know that we should not send out provisions, if we would feed our enemy—and, the English papers in our sea-port towns were simultaneously filled with extracts of letters from Lisbon, &c. &c. &c. to shew, that if we did send out provisions, they would not pay the freight. This concord and concert is perfectly understood, and will avail the enemy nothing.—It may be well to observe, for the sake of future times, that many of these accounts of the price of provisions, were headed with the word “IMPORTANT” in capital letters!

CONTEMPTIBLE.—Many of the little craft captured by the Plant genet, of seventy-four guns, are ransomed at the price of from one to two hundred dollars each. A great business this, for a ship of the line! Among his captures was a vessel with an organ for one of the episcopal churches in New York. No. 7, a gentleman might suppose that this article would have passed harmless. No; no;—hey who robbed the church at Hampden, demanded and received for its ransom $2,200. I speak emphatically, and let every one answer the question—Is there an officer in the American navy that would do this thing? The commander of a row-boat privateer would despise it.

MARITIME POWER.—The navy of Great Britain consists of about 1050 vessels, large and small, 60 of which are in commission—that of Russia is 53 sail of the line, 34 frigates, 59 cutters and brigs, in all carrying 4,428 pieces of cannon. The Swedish, of 12 sail of the line, 8 frigates besides cutters and gun-boats, &c. building two of the line and 3 frigates. The Portuguese have 8 sail of the line, 3 frigates and 4 sloops at the Brazils, and some unseaworthy vessels left at Lisbon. The Danes have 4 ships of the line, 2 frigates, and many gun-vessels. And the French navy consists of 65 ships of the line, 61 frigates, ready for sea, and 32 sail of the line, and 26 frigates fitting out or building. The American navy is only 8 or 9 frigates and 10 or 15 smaller vessels (the Lake flotilla excepted) which make more noise, and excite more apprehension to the British, than all the other navies of the world.—This is fact. The capture of Rodgers by an equal force, would, in the opinion of mankind, surpass in glory the conquests of the Medo or Prof-Leon; and, when Rodgers is taken alive, by an equal force, the enemy may rejoice.

EMIGRATION.—A Worthington, (O.) paper of the 24th ult. says, "my families have lately arrived here from Lower Canada, and we are informed that a great number are on their way thence to this state." A mighty population is pouring into Ohio, since the capture and dispersion of the wild savages.

PIES AND BIVERTENTIAL.—From the Boston Gazette—Extract of a letter from a gentleman in Albany, Nov. 24.—"Every hour is fraught with doleful tidings from the north: humanity groans from the frontiers—Hampden's army is reduced to about 2000—Wilkinson's cut up and famishing—crimination and reclamation is the order of the day. Democracy has rolled herself up in weeds, and lain down for her last wallowing in the slough of disgrace. Armstrong, the cold-blooded director of all this military anarchy, is still here, but chop fallen.

"No profane allusion; but
Now sit ye saints, your heads on high,
And shout—for your redemption's night."

"A PEACE PARTY MAN."—A writer in the Democratic Press declares that PERRY is the greatest "peace-party-man" in America—for that he gave peace to all that part of Upper Canada that lies above the lower end of lake Erie, and to the whole of our frontiers from Buffalo to St. Louis: saying, that when he had made peace on the water, he volunteered his aid to make peace on the land. He therefore devoutly exclaims, "blessed be PERRY the peace maker." To which we heartily say, AMEN.

A NEW PORK MARKET.—New-York city has, heretofore, obtained a large portion of its supply of pork from Connecticut; but the Columbian tells us that one person in New-York put up $15,000 worth of that article for an eastern market the present season.

BRITISH SYMPATHIES.—As every thing that is British is to be extolled by the English "writers" in America, the following notice has run its round in our papers.

"Norton, the Indian chief, frequently spoken of during the present war, in Upper Canada, is a man of education, has travelled in Europe, and been received with distinguished attention for his talents and amenity. While in England in 1804, he translated the gospel of St. John into the Mohawk language, which was printed at the expense of the British society. His Indian name is Tevosinkoharawan."

Now this Norton must be a very devout, "religious" and magnanimous man. He fights for England, and that shows his devotion to "liberty." But why did not the knaves tell us that this plans "translator of the gospel of St. John," crossed the Niagara river in the dead of the night for the purpose of shooting an American sentinel in cold blood? Ho! Norton!—ALLY OF ENGLAND!—MIDNIGHT MURDERER!

COMMODORE BAINBRIDGE was introduced to the common council of New-York, last week, and presented with the freedom of the city. He also partook of a public dinner in that city.

HARRISON AND PERRY.—In the signal victories gained over Barclay's fleet and Proctor's army, (says the Boston Chronicle.) it is impossible to separate the brave and victorious commanders, Perry and Harrison. The circumstances are indeed very striking. Harrison sent re-inforcements to assist Perry, and the action terminated in the capture of the whole British fleet. In return, com. Perry, volunteered with Harrison, and assisted him in the capture of the British army.

In the following letter Perry does justice to the zeal of Harrison and his gallant soldiers—

U. S. sloop, Arial, Sept. 15, 1813.

SIR—The very great assistance, in the action of the 10th inst. derived from those men you were pleased to send on board the squadron, render it a duty to return you my sincere thanks for so timely a reinforcement. In fact, sir, I may say, without those men the victory could not have been achieved; and equally to assure you, that those officers and men behaved as became good soldiers and seamen. Those who were under my immediate observation, evinced great ardor and bravery. Captain Brevort, of the second regiment of infantry, serving on board the Niagara, I beg leave to recommend particularly to your notice: he is a brave and gallant officer, and as far as I am capable of judging an excellent one. I am convinced you will present the merit of this officer to the view of the honorable secretary of war as I shall to the honorable secretary of the navy.

Very respectfully, I am, sir, your obedient servant.
(Signed) OLIVER H. PERRY.

Maj. gen. W. H. Harrison, commander in chief of the N. W. army.

Commodore Perry, also, while at Albany, spoke in the highest terms of eulogium on the Kenickee volunteers, and in strains of admiration of the veteran Shelley. He represented them as "brave even to imprudence" as "liberal, generous and humane, almost to a fault."

GENERAL HARRISON partook of an entertainment at Philadelphia, on Thursday the 9th inst. His suit was also invited. The regular toasts being drunk, the general rose, and "with much impressiveness of manner" said—

"Gentlemen—Permit me to offer you a volunteer toast and very briefly to state the motive which prompts me to take one of the regular toasts of the day as a mean of communicating my opinion. Believing, as I do, that a sentiment is gaining ground unfriendly to republicanism and injurious to the nation, and knowing from my own experience, that this sentiment is not well founded, I will give you

"The militia of the United States—they possess the Roman spirit, and when our government shall think proper to give them that organization and discipline of which they are susceptible, they will perform deeds that will emulate those of the legions led by Marcellus, and Scipio."

On his way to the seat of government and route home, general Harrison stopped at Baltimore on Monday last, and was waited upon and congratulated by many of our citizens. It would seem as if he and commodore Perry had agreed to praise each other; for while the former speaks of the commodore, his officers and men with rapture, the latter is no less eloquent in praise of the general and the brave men under him. This is delightful. General Harrison, also speaks of Chauncey as a patriot, gentleman and seaman, with great warmth.

"Our friends in the north." A Baltic paper, of October 8, has the following paragraph, speaking of the "gloom" occasioned by the capture of Barclay's fleet, and Proctor's army—

"Had we not the means of being as well prepared as the Americans? Certainly we had every superiority in that respect, and in every other—but we wisely forbore to make offensive war in Canada, lest our ENEMIES OF THE NORTHERN STATES SHOULD BE OFFENDED, and therefore made actual invasion in the southern with a force inadequate to cause a division."

"Straws show which way the wind blows." The English printers on both sides of the Atlantic, always speak of British vessels of war, as "his majesty's," that is, as belonging to their king; for they give no national designation. We might collect fifty cases a week of this kind of—"French influence."

The British prisoners taken by com. Chauncey [210] on lake Ontario, have arrived at Pittsfield, (Mass.) where they will remain for the present.

The legislature of Georgia have passed a bill for the immediate payment of that state's quota of the direct tax, from the funds of the state.

A New York paper of the 13th notices, in its ship news, the arrival of nineteen coasters at that port, the blockade notwithstanding.

Notwithstanding the blockade of our coast, many valuable vessels get out and many arrive. Among the latter, during the last week, we notice three or four very rich ships from the South Sea, laden with oil, &c.

A writer in the Albany Argus, with great ability, urges the appointment of a lieutenant general for the command of the armies on the northern frontier. If the measure should be adopted, it appears as if the people would expect John Armstrong or James Monroe, to fill that high office.

GOVERNOR CHITRELDEN.—The following extracts from a law of the United States, passed 28th February, 1795, approved by president WASHINGTON, has been published as applicable to the proceedings of the governor of Vermont, and his agent.

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted, That whenever the United States shall be invaded, or in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the state or states most convenient to the place of danger, or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion; and to issue his orders for that purpose, to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper.

"Sec. 2. It is enacted, That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed or the execution thereof obstructed in any state by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States to call forth the militia of such state or states as may be necessary to suppress such combination, and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and the use of the militia so to be called forth, may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the then next session of congress.

SEC. 5th Provides, That every officer who shall fail to obey the orders of the president of the United States, in any of the laws before cited, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one year's pay; and such non-commissioned officers and privates shall be liable to be imprisoned.

"Sec. 9. Gives the same power to marshals and their deputies, in executing the laws of the United States, as sheriffs and their deputies in the several states."

The articles of war provide—"That officers in the service of the United States do solemnly swear, that they will bear true allegiance to the United States of America, and serve them honestly and faithfully against all their enemies or opposers whatsoever; and observe and obey the orders of the president of the United States, and the orders of the officers appointed by him, according to the rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States."

The 2nd article inflicts "The punishment of death on any officer or soldier who shall advise any other officer or soldier to desert the service of the United States."

PROVIDENCE, Dec. 4.—At the circuit court now sitting in this town, the decree of the district court, restoring the American brig Mary, laden with British goods and sailing under a British license, has been reversed, and the property condemned to the captors—she was brought in by the Paul Jones privateer of New-York.

BLOCKADE OF THE SOUND.

By the right honorable sir JOHN BORLASE WARREN, bart. K. B. admiral of the blue, and commander in chief of his majesty's ships and vessels employed and to be employed on the American and West-Indian station, &c. &c. &c.

A PROCLAMATION.—Whereas, his royal highness the prince regent hath caused his pleasure to be signified to the right honorable the lords commissioners of the admiralty, to direct, that I should institute a strict and rigorous blockade of the Chesapeake, the Delaware, and the ports and harbors of New-York, Charleston, Port Royal, Savannah, and the river Mississippi, in the United States of America, and to maintain, and enforce the same, according to the usages of war in similar cases, and the ministers of neutral powers have been duly notified, agreeably to the orders of his royal highness, that all the measures authorised by the law of nations, would be adopted and exercised with respect to all vessels which may attempt to violate the said blockade.

And whereas in obedience to his royal highness's commands, I did without delay, station a naval force off each of the before mentioned bays, rivers, ports and harbors, sufficient to carry his royal highness's order for the blockade thereof into strict and rigorous effect; but finding that the enemy by withdrawing his naval force from the port of New-York and establishing at the port of New-London, a naval station to cover the trade to, and from the port of New-York, thereby endeavoring to prevent, as far as in his power, the execution of his royal highness's said orders; and also finding, that the enemy has through the medium of inland carriage, established a commercial intercourse between the said blockaded ports and the rivers, harbors, creeks, bays and outlets contiguous thereto, whereby the full effect of the said blockade has been to a certain degree prevented: in order to put a stop to the same,

I do, by virtue of the power and authority to me given, and in obedience to the orders I have received from the right honorable the lords commissioners of the admiralty, declare, that not only the ports and harbors of the Chesapeake, Delaware, New-York, Charleston, Port Royal, Savannah, and the river Mississippi herein before-mentioned, are continued in a state of strict and rigorous blockade; but that I have also ordered all that part of Long Island Sound, so called, being the sea-coast lying within Montuck Point, or the Eastern Point of Long-Island and the point of land opposite thereto, commonly called Black Point, situate on the sea-coast of the main land or continent, together with all the ports, harbors, creeks and entrances of the East and North Rivers of New-York, as well as all other ports, creeks and bays along the sea-coast of Long-Island, and the state of New-York, and all the ports, harbors, rivers and creeks, lying and being on the sea-coasts of the states of East and West Jersey, Pennsylvania, the lower countries on the Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North and South-Carolina, Georgia, and all the entrances from the sea into the said river of Mississippi, to be strictly and rigorously blockaded; and I do hereby in virtue of the power and authority in me vested, declare the whole of the said harbors, bays, rivers, creeks and the sea-coasts of the said several states to be in a state of strict and rigorous blockade. And I do further declare, that I have stationed on the sea-coasts, bays, rivers and harbors of the several states, a naval force, adequate and sufficient, to enforce and maintain the blockade thereof, in the most strict and rigorous manner.

And I do hereby require the respective flag officers, captains, commanders, and commanding officers of his majesty's ships and vessels, employed and to be employed on the American and West India station, and all others whom it may concern, to pay the strictest attention to the execution of the said orders of his royal highness the prince regent and also the execution of this order. And I do caution and forbid the ships of all and every nation in peace and amity with the crown of Great Britain, from entering, or attempting to enter, or from coming out, or attempting to come out, of any of the ports, harbors, bays, creeks or rivers before mentioned, under any pretence whatsoever: and that none shall hereafter plead ignorance of the measures which his majesty has been reluctantly compelled to adopt, in order to force the enemy to put an end to a war on their part so unjustly declared his majesty, and his subjects, I have caused this proclamation to be published.

Given under my hand at Halifax the 16th day of November, 1813.

JOHN BORLASE WARREN,
Admiral of the blue, and commander in chief, &c. &c. &c.

To the respective flag officers, captains, commanders, and commanding officers of his majesty's ships and vessels, employed and to be employed on the American and West India station, and all whom it may concern.

By command of the Admiral,

GEO. REDMOND HULBERT, Sec'ry.
H. M. ship Valiant, off New-London,
December 2, 1813.

Sir—Having received orders from sir John Borlase Warren, commander in chief of his Britannic majesty's naval forces in North America, to declare Long Island Sound in a state of rigorous blockade, and to enforce the same: I beg leave to inform you of this measure, and that after the 6th of December, no vessels whatever will be permitted to sail from any port in Long Island Sound. I beg you will be pleased to communicate this intelligence to the other neutral consuls, in your district.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

ROBERT DUDLEY OLIVER,

Capt. and senior officer in Long Island Sound
To Don Thomas Stoughton, Spanish consul at New-York.

MILITARY.

Third victory over the allies in the south.—General White, of the Tennessee volunteers, was detached on the 12th ult. with 1200 mounted men, (including upwards of 300 Cherokees) to the [Greek] Hillabee towns. On the 17th, at one o'clock at night, being within 8 miles of the upper town, he received information from a half-breed, that his family and property would be sacrificed the next morning, if gen. W. did not relieve them; on which he pushed forward with 300 troops and a part of the Indians, and at sun-rise on the 18th completely surrounded and surprized the enemy. They fired several guns, but the bayonet, in 10 or 15 minutes, settled the business. They held up a flag and were spared: 65 had been killed, and 251 were taken prisoners. We had not one man even wounded. The Cherokees behaved in the best possible manner.

Of this affair, we shall have the pleasure to record the official details. The wretched and deluded Creeks by this time must see (as all people will see), the worse than madness that tempted them into alliance with the pest of the world—blood-stained England. But we trust the gallant spirits of the south and west will not believe their work done, until they teach fear and trembling to the base Spaniards who made themselves the “go-between” of the barbarian British, to place the tomahawk and scalping knife in the hands of this people, for whom, in the true spirit of justice and humanity, we had done so much. The massacre at Fort Mims demands this. How cruel was it in the British to excite this war; which they must have seen would begin in murder and end in the destruction of the Indians? If this thing be weighed in the mind, connected with the fact, that the Creeks had not even the semblance of a complaint to prefer against us,—we shall discover the bloody turpitude, and savage disposition of the foe, in its true colors. A disposition that would ally itself to any thing, in any way, for a temporary purpose, careless of the issue.

Our anxieties.—Wilkinson is at Madrid, N. Y. in a good way to regain his health. Hampton was very ill at Philadelphia. Isard has been confined to his room at Plattsburg.

The Plattsburg paper of the 4th inst. unequivocally states, that major Pinkney, aid to gen. Wilkinson, had arrived at that place for the purpose of arresting gen. Hampton; the general, however, had proceeded to the southward, and maj. P. went on to execute his orders.

Six British gallees came to Cumberland Head, (lake Champlain) on the 4th inst.—and burnt the large “board store on hovel,” built by gen. Hampton and his then acting commissaries. It was entirely empty. The enemy returned without committing any other damage.

A British general order, dated at La Chine, Nov. 17, disbands the sedentary militia.

Lieut. Smith.—It is with much pleasure we learn that this gallant young officer, so excellently spoken of in maj. gen. Wilkinson's despatch, for his behaviour at Williamsburg, was not killed, as stated by the general. He was alive nine days after the battle, dangerously wounded; but with a possibility of recovering. He was seen to fall, and supposed dead but he had been immediately removed to a farm-house, where he was taken prisoner.

The Buffalo paper of the 30th ult. says, an expedition has gone from Fort George against the enemy at Burlington Heights—that 3419 [late] hostile Indians had tendered their services at Detroit—that a ball was given in that village to capt. Elliot, in honor of his behavior in the battle on Erie.

Copy of a letter from brigadier general J. P. Boyd, who commanded in the battle of Williamsburgh, to major-general James Wilkinson, commander in chief, Camp, near Cornwall, November 17.

SIR,—I have the honor to report to you that yesterday while the rear division of the army, consisting of detachments from the 1st, 3d and 4th brigades, and placed under my command to protect the flotilla from the enemy that hung on our rear, was under arms in order to move, agreeably to your orders, down the bank of the St. Lawrence, a report was brought to me from the rear guard, that a body of about two hundred British and Indians had advanced into the woods that skirted our rear. General Swartwout with the 4th brigade was immediately ordered to dislodge them; general Covington, with the 3d brigade, being directed to be within supporting distance. General Swartwout dashed into the woods, and with the 21st infantry, (a part of his brigade) after a short skirmish, drove them back to the position of their main body. Here he was joined by general Covington. The enemy had judiciously chosen his ground among the deep ravines which every where intersected the extensive plain, and discharged a heavy and galling fire upon our advancing columns. No opposition, or obstacle, however, checked their ardor. The enemy retired more than a mile before their resolute and repeated charges. During this time the detachment of the 1st brigade, under colonel Coles, whose greater distance from the scene of action retarded its arrival, rapidly entered the field.

Being directed to attack the enemy's left flank, this movement was promptly and bravely executed amid a shower of musquetry and grape-shot. The fight now became more stationary, until the brigade first engaged, having expended all their ammunition, were directed to retire to a more defensible position, to await for a re-supply. This movement so discommodated the line, as to render it expedient for the 1st brigade likewise to retire. It should be remarked, that the artillery, (excepting two pieces under captain Irvine, attached to the rear division, (which, from the nature of the ground, and the circuitous route they had to take, were likewise much retarded in their arrival) did not reach the ground until the line, for the want of ammunition, had already begun to fall back. When they were arranged, in doing which I was assisted by the skill of colonel Swift, of the engineers, their fire was true and destructive. When the artillery was finally directed to retire, having to cross a deep, and, excepting in one place, (to artillery) impassible ravine, one piece was unfortunately lost. The fall of its gallant commander, lieutenant Smith, and most of his men, may account for this accident. In the death of this young man, the army has lost one of its most promising officers. The squadron of the 2d regiment of dragoons, under major Woodford, was early on the field, and much exposed to the enemy's fire; but the nature of the ground, and the disposition of his line, did not admit of those successful charges, which their discipline and ardor, under more favorable circumstances, are calculated to make. The reserve, under colonel Urban and major M'Coolin, did not arrive from the boats in time to participate in but a small part of the action; but the activity and zeal they displayed while engaged, crowned the benefit that might have been derived from their earlier assistance.

The whole line was now re-formed on the borders of those woods from which the enemy had first been driven; when night coming on and the storm returning, and conceiving that the object you had in view, which was to beat back the enemy that would retard our junction with the main body below, to have been accomplished, the troops were directed to return to the ground near the flotilla, which movement was executed in good order, and without any molestation from the enemy.

I cannot close my representation of this battle, without indulging in a few remarks upon the merits of those officers, whose conduct will give a character to the conflict of this day. General Covington, whose readiness to enter the field was an earnest of his subsequent activity, received a mortal wound, while leading his men on to a successful charge. His troops, still feeling the effect of his gallant example, continued to advance long after their brave commander had fallen. His fate will perpetuate the pain which has been crimsoned by his blood. Col. Preston was severely wounded while nobly fighting at the head of his regiment. The universal sympathy which is excited by the honorable misfortune of this amiable officer, attests the high estimation which is entertained of his talents as a soldier, and his virtues as a man. Major Cummings, with whose military merits and exertions I have long been acquainted, met with a similar fate while leading to a charge, and, undiscouraged by the wound, continued to advance, until loss of blood obliged him to retire. Many platoon officers received disabling or slight wounds in the honorable discharge of their duty, a report of whose names and merits I have directed the several chiefs of brigades to make to me, in order that I may transmit it to you. It is with great satisfaction I acknowledge my warmest approbation of the gallantry and zeal which was constantly displayed throughout this eventful day, by brigadier-general Swartwout and colonel Coles, who commanded the detachment of the first brigade.

After the fall of general Covington, colonel Pierce, on whom the command of the 3d brigade devolved, conducted with his characteristic coolness and valor. In speaking of the other numerous field officers who participated in this battle, colonels Gaines and Ripley, lieutenant-colonel Aspinwall, and majors Morgan, Gratton and Gardner, their equal claim to applause forbids the invidious task of discrimination. I find a pleasure, likewise, in acknowledging the eminent service derived from the experience and activity of adjutant-general colonel Walback; from the assistance of inspector-general colonel Johnson, and assistant adjutant-generals majors Beebe and Chambers; the latter was wounded in the honorable discharge of his duty. In addition to these acknowledgments, a sense of justice, as well as personal friendship, induces me to express my entire approbation of the conduct of lieutenant Henry Whiting, my aid-de-camp, who was in this instance, as he has been during the whole campaign, my zealous and brave assistant; lieutenant Worth, aid-de-camp to major general Lewis, led by a laudable emulation, left the flotilla, and volunteered his acceptable services to me on the field.

Permit me now to add, sir, that though the result of this action was not so brilliant and decisive as I could have wished, and the first stages of it seemed to promise, yet when it is recollected that the troops had been long exposed to privations and fatigues, to meet at stems from which they often could have no shelter; that the enemy were superior to us in numbers, and greatly superior to us in position, and supported by 7 or 8 heavy gun-boats; that the action being unexpected, was necessarily commenced without much concert; that we were, by unavoidable circumstances, long deprived of our artillery; and that the action was obstinately and warmly contested for more than three hours, during which there were but a few short cessations of musketry and cannon; when all these circumstances are recollected, perhaps this day may be thought to have added some reputation to the American arms. And if, on this occasion, you shall believe me to have done my duty and accomplished any one of your purposes, I shall be satisfied.

Allow me to adjoin my regret, which is felt in common with the army, that the severity of your disposition deprived us of your presence on this occasion. The adjutant-general has been directed to furnish a report of the killed, wounded and casualties.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great consideration and respect, your most obedient humble servant,
(Signed) JNO. P. BOYD,

Brig. gen. commanding.

SECOND VICTORY OVER THE CREEKS.

NASHVILLE, Nov. 23—Official papers—Communicated on Thursday last.

Senators and Representatives of Tennessee.

I have the honor to transmit an extract of a letter received yesterday from general Jackson now in the service of the United States, acting against the Creek Indians; containing all the details of the late engagement between the detachment from West Tennessee and the Creeks; and informing of the favorable result of that important achievement—they deserve well of their country for their gallant conduct.

(EXTRACT.)

Camp Strother, near Ten Islands of Coosa, Nov. 11.
SIR—I am just returned from an excursion which I took a few days ago, and hasten to acquaint you with the result.

Late on the evening of the 7th inst. a runner arrived from the friendly party in Lashley's fort, (Talladega) distant about thirty miles below us, with the information that the hostile Creeks in great force had encamped near the place, and were preparing to destroy it; and earnestly entreated that I would lose no time in affording relief. Urged by their situation as well as by a wish to meet the enemy so soon as an opportunity would offer, I determined upon commencing my march thither with all my disposable force, in the course of the night; and immediately dispatched an express to general White, advising him of my intended movement, and urging him to hasten to this encampment by a forced march, in order to protect it in my absence. I had repeatedly written to the general to form a junction with me as speedily as practicable, and a few days before had received his assurance, that on the 7th he would join me. I commenced crossing the river at the Ten Islands, leaving behind me my baggage waggons and whatever might retard my progress; and we encamped that night within six miles of the fort I had set out to relieve. At midnight I received by an Indian runner, a letter from general White, informing me that he had received my order, but that he had altered his course; and was on his march backwards to join major-general Cocke, near the mouth of Chatuga. I will not now remark upon the strangeness of this manœuvre; but it was now too late to change my plan, or make any new arrangement; and between three or four o'clock I recommenced my march to meet the enemy, who were encamped within a quarter of a mile of the fort. At sunrise we came within half a mile of them, and having formed my men, I moved on in battle order. The infantry were in three lines—the militia on the left and the volunteers on the right. The cavalry formed the extreme wings; and were ordered to advance in a curve, keeping their rear connected with the advance of their infantry lines, and enclose the enemy in a circle. The advanced guard whom I sent forward to bring on the engagement, met the attack of the enemy with great intrepidity; and having poured upon them four or five very gallant rounds, fell back as they had been previously ordered, to the main army. The enemy pursued, and the front line was now ordered to advance and meet him; but owing to some misunderstanding a few companies of militia, who composed a part of it, commenced a retreat. At this moment a corps of cavalry commanded by lieutenant-col. Dyer, which I had kept as a reserve, was ordered to dismount and fill up the vacancy occasioned by the retreat.—This order was executed with a great deal of promptitude and effect.

The militia, seeing this, speedily rallied; and the fire became general along the first line, and on that part of the wings which were contiguous. The enemy, unable to stand it, began to retreat; but were met at every turn, and pursued in every direction. The right wing chased them with a most destructive fire to the mountains, a distance of about three miles; and had I not been compelled by the four pas of the militia in the onset of the battle, to dismount my reserve, I believe not a man of them would have escaped. The victory however was very decisive—two hundred and ninety of the enemy were left dead; and there can be no doubt but many more were killed who were not found. Wherever they ran, they left behind traces of blood; and it is believed, that very few will return to their villages in as sound a condition as they left them. I was compelled to return to this place to protect the sick and wounded, and get my baggage. In the engagement we lost 15 killed and 15 wounded, two of whom have since died. All the officers acted with the utmost bravery, and so did all the privates, except that part of the militia who retreated, at the commencement of the battle; and they hastened to atone for their error. Taking the whole together, they have realized the high expectations I had formed of them, and have fairly entitled themselves to the gratitude of their country.

In haste, I have the honor to be,
(Signed) ANDREW JACKSON.

His excellency, William B. Hunt, Nashville.

The foregoing is an extract from the general's letter to me—other parts of it give no other details of the engagement, or the order of battle—the general had not received information that the president had accepted into the public service the 3,500 men, authorized by the act of the 27th September, to be raised; or the foregoing would no doubt have been addressed to the secretary of war; a copy of his letter will be transmitted to that department; and the foregoing is transmitted to the general assembly for their information of the good conduct of the troops; their act in part authorized the raising of the said troops; and from a desire that the citizens of Tennessee may know it. As the Tennessee, Georgia and regular troops ordered on the campaign against the Creeks, are by the government, expected to act in concert, it is not improbable that general Cocke has thought it advisable, from the information he may have received from the regular or Georgia detachments, respecting possibly their exposed situation, to go on to them, and after uniting with them, to join general Jackson; this may account for general White's not proceeding to the Ten Islands—he never will do an act to injure the service; neither will general Jackson or Cocke injure it by any act of theirs; they are all acting in support of one cause, and no doubt they will do their duty well, as will the detachments generally upon any and every proper occasion.

WILLIE BLOUNT.

NAVAL.

The President frigate went to sea on Sunday evening, the 4th inst. from Newport: where an embargo had been laid three days previous to her sailing. She has been met with at sea, by a vessel that has arrived at New-York. If it should so happen that Rodgers were to make a dash along the coast of North and South Carolina and Georgia, he might pick up several English vessels that would be very useful for its future defence.

There is good reason to believe that some villain, immediately after the departure of commodore Rodgers, went from Newport off to the British, to give them the information. Captain Perry has instituted an enquiry into the matter; and we hope he may catch the fellow.

We have letters from captain Porter below. There is cause to believe that he knew of the sailing of the frigate and two sloops of war from Rio Janeiro in search of him. To which he appears to allude where the cypher is used.

A coaster that was captured by the enemy off New-London, states that an admiral and two frigates were duly expected.

The British papers complain grievously of the operations of an American schooner privateer, off the coast of Portugal.

The famous privateer Decatur, with 18 guns and 139 men, has sailed from Charleston. She had positive orders to engage either of the British briggs off that port, if she fell in with them singly.

The water chief Cockburn was at Bermuda, November 18, with 10 vessels of war, about to sail on an expedition.

Admiral Warren has sailed from Halifax in the St. Domingo, 74—some other vessels in company, supposed first for Bermuda,

Copies of letters from captain David Porter, commanding the United States frigate Essex, to the secretary of the navy, dated

U. S. frigate Essex, Pacific ocean, July 2, 1813.

Sir—I have the honor to inform you that on the 29th of April, in the latitude of 4 1/2 N. long. 91, 15 W. about 29 miles to the northward of the island of Albemarle, one of the Galapagos on the Pacific ocean, I captured the British ship Montezuma; two others being in sight, close together, distant from us about 7 miles, which we were informed were the British letters of marque ships Policy and Georgiana; the first mounting 10 guns, 6 and 9 pounders; the other six 18 pounders, four swivels, and six long blunderbusses, mounted on swivels. The wind being light and variable, and confiding greatly in the bravery and enterprize of my officers and men, and apprehensive of their escape, from the prevalence of fogs in that climate, I directed the boats of this ship to be armed and manned, and divided into two divisions, placing the first under the command of lieutenant Downes, first lieutenant in a whale boat, accompanied by midshipman Farragutt. The officers in command of the boats under lieutenant Downes, were, lieutenant S. D. McKnight, in the 3d cutter, accompanied by midshipman W. H. Olenheimer, sailing-master John P. Cowell, in the jolly boat, accompanied by midshipman H. W. Ogden, and midshipman George Isaacs, in the 2d cutter. The 2d division under the command of lieutenant Wilmer, 2d lieutenant, in the pinnace, accompanied by midshipman Henry Gray, and master's mate James Terry; lieutenant Wil- son and Mr. Shaw, purser, in the first cutter; and lieutenant Gamble, of the marines, in the gig. Suitable signals were established, and each boat had her particular station pointed out for the attack, and every other previous arrangement was made to prevent confusion. The boats, 7 in number, rowed off in an admirable order. Guns were fired from the enemy to terrify them: they rowed up under the muzzles of the guns and took their stations for attacking the first ship, and no sooner was the American flag displayed, by lieutenant Downes, as the signal for boarding, and the intention was discovered by the enemy, than the colors were struck, without a shot being fired; so much were they daunted by the intrepidity of our brave officers and men. They then left a crew on board the prize and took their stations for attacking the other vessel, when her flag was also struck, on the first call to surrender. Thus were two fine British ships, each pierced for twenty guns, worth near half a million of dollars, mounting between them 16 guns, and manned with 55 men, well supplied with small arms, surrendered, without the slightest resistance, to seven small open boats, with fifty men, armed only with muskets, pistols, boarding axes and cutlasses! Be assured, sir, that Britons have either learned to respect the courage of Americans, or they are not so courageous themselves as they would wish us to believe.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

The secretary of the navy, Washington.

United States Frigate Essex, at Sea, Pacific Ocean, July 2nd, 1813.

Sir—On the 23d March last, I sailed from shaping my course to the northward, and on the 26th of the same month, fell in with the Peruvian corsair ship Nereyda, mounting 15 guns: she had a few days before, captured two American whale ships, the crews of which (amounting in number to 24 men) were then detained prisoners on board her; and they assign no other motive for the capture, than that they were the allies of Great Britain, and as such, should capture the American vessels they could fall in with; therefore, to prevent in future such vexatious proceedings, I threw all her armament into the sea, liberated the Americans, and dismissed the Nereyda.

I then proceeded with all possible dispatch for Lima, to intercept one of the detained vessels, which had parted with the Nereyda only three days before, and I was so fortunate as to arrive there and recapture her on the 5th April, at the moment she was entering the port. This vessel (the ship Barclay, captain Gideon Randall, of New Bedford.) I took under my protection, and have had her with me ever since.

From Lima I proceeded for the Galapagos Island, where I captured the following British ships, viz:

	Letters of marque.
Montezuma	270 tons	21 men	2 guns.
Policy	275	26	10
Georgiana	289	25	6
Atlantic	331	24	8
Greenwich	338	25	10

The Georgiana being reputed a very fast sailer, and apparently well calculated for a cruiser, I mounted 16 guns on her, and gave the command of her to that excellent officer, lieutenant John Downes, with a complement of 42 men; appointing midshipman W. H. Haddaway acting lieutenant on board her, and sent her on a cruise.

Lieutenant Downes joined me at Tumbez, near Guiaquil, on the coast of Peru, on the 29th June, after capturing three prizes, to wit:

Letters of marque ships.

Hector	270 tons	25 men	11 guns.
Catharine	270	29	8
Rose	220	21	8

The first had two men killed and six badly wounded in her rencontre with the Georgiana—and the Rose was discharged (after being deprived of her armament) with all the prisoners captured by the Georgiana, as they amounted to nearly double her crew; she was furnished with a passport to proceed to St. Helena.

My own prisoners I liberated on parole at Tumbez. I found by experience that the Georgiana did not deserve the character given of her for sailing. I therefore shipped her officers and crew to the Atlantic, and mounted on her 20 guns, with a complement of 60 men, and appointed midshipman Rich. Dashiell, acting sailing master, on board her; to this vessel I gave the name of the Essex Junior, I also fitted up the ship Greenwich as a store ship, and mounted on her 20 guns, placing her under the command of Lieutenant Gamble, of the marines. On board her I have put all the provisions and stores of my other prizes, except a supply of three and a half months for each, and have by this means secured myself a full supply of every necessary article for seven months. I had hoped to dispose of my other prizes at Guayaquil: the governors in Peru, however, are excessively alarmed at my appearance on the coast, as my fleet amounts now to nine sail of vessels, all formidable in their appearance, and they would if they dare, treat us with a hostility little short of declared enemies.

I have given to Mr. John G. Cowell, sailing master, an appointment to act 3d lieutenant; midshipman John S. Cowan, to act 4th lieutenant; and 1 midshipman Olenheimer as sailing master. I beg, sir, that the appointment of those officers, as well as of lieutenant S. D. McKnight, who is acting second lieutenant, and those serving on board the Essex Junior, may be confirmed by the department. I have given to Mr. M. W. Bostwick, my clerk, the appointment of acting midshipman; not that he is desirous of coming forward in the navy in that line, but I hoped by this means to introduce him to the department; and I shall take the liberty to recommend him strongly as a suitable person to hold the appointment of purser. Drs. Richard R. Hoffman and Alexander M. Montgomery, who volunteered their services with me at the commencement of hostilities, have received acting appointments from me, the first as surgeon, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Dr. Miller; the other as surgeon's mate. To the great care and attention of those gentlemen, may, in a considerable degree, be attributed the extraordinary health of the crew; and as they are both desirous of joining the navy, I hope their appointments may be confirmed.

I have also appointed my marine officer and chaplain to the command of prizes; they all enter with much cheerfulness, into their new duties; and if the expedition should prove unsuccessful, it will not be, I am persuaded, owing to our want of activity or vigilance; and of this you must be satisfied, as for the last eight months we have been constantly at sea, with the exception of twenty-three days, and yet, sir, we have enjoyed extraordinary health and spirits; no symptom of the scurvy having yet appeared in the ship, nor have we, at this moment, more than two on the sick list; and their diseases are more owing to the infirmities of age than any other cause. Indeed, sir, when I compare my present situation with what it was when I doubled Cape Horn, I cannot but esteem myself fortunate in an extraordinary degree. There my ship was shattered ed by tempestuous weather, and destitute of every thing; my officers and crew half starved, naked, and worn out with fatigue. Now, sir, my ship is in prime order, abundantly supplied with every thing necessary for her. I have a noble ship for a consort of 20 guns and well manned, a store ship of 20 guns and well supplied with the best of every thing that we may want, and prizes which would be worth in England two millions of dollars; and what renders the comparison more pleasing, the enemy has furnished all. Excuse me, sir, for not making known my present intentions, as this letter may not reach you. It, however, may be satisfactory to you to know how I intend to dispose of my prizes: Let it suffice to say that I shall endeavor to [cypher].

British letters of marque are numerous in these seas, and, were it not for my arrival, our whale fishers would have been much harassed; but they now find it necessary to keep together for mutual protection. I expect to [cypher], but shall be [cypher].

Subjoined is a list of deaths since I left the U. S. and I beg you will relieve the anxiety of my family and all our friends, by communicating as much of this letter as you may think proper.

The times of my best men have expired; but their attachment to the ship and their zeal for the service we are engaged on, prevent all complaints on that account. It is not probable that you will hear of me for several months to come, unless some disaster happens; but I beg leave to assure you, sir, that I shall not be idle; and I hope before my return to make the services of the Essex as important as those of any other single ship. We may not be individually benefitted, but we shall do the enemy much injury, which will be a sufficient compensation to us for all the hardships and privations we must naturally experience, while cut off from all communication with the rest of the world, and are dependent on the precarious supplies the enemy may afford.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Honorable William Jones,

Secretary of the navy, Washington.

American Prizes.

"The winds and seas are Britain's wide domain,
"And not a sail, but by permission spreads!"

British Naval Register.

The brig, (no. 718) prize to the Saucy Jack, is the Sir John Sherbrooke, of 10 guns and 40 men, taken after a fight of 20 minutes, in which she had 2 men killed and 5 wounded. The Saucy Jack sustained but little injury, and had three men slightly wounded.

719. The valuable ship Manly, 4 guns laden with wine, oil, &c. from Halifax for the West Indies, sent into Charleston, S. C. by the Revenge, of Baltim. and solution. All the settlements are laid waste. The savages received their ammunition from the governor of PENNSYLVANIA, in consequence of an order from the British in Canada.

720. A brig laden with sugar and molasses, captured by the Caroline of Baltimore, re-captured by the British off Charleston and burnt.
 ¶ We have had the pleasure to notice the exploits of the Lion privateer (of Baltimore) off the coasts of Spain and Portugal. She has safely arrived at L'Orient, in France, with about $400,000 on board, after having destroyed 15 or 20 English vessels.—Particulars shall be noticed when received.

721. Schir. Messenger, from the West-Indies, laden with rum and molasses, sent into Wilmington, N. C. by the Comet, of Baltimore.

722. Ship Montezuma, 270 tons, 2 guns, 21 men, captured by the Essex frigate, in the south sea.

723. Ship Policy, 275 tons, 10 guns, 26 men, captured by ditto in ditto.

724. Ship Georgiana, 260 tons, 6 guns, 23 men, captured by ditto in ditto.

725. Ship Atlantic, 357 tons, 8 guns, 24 men, captured by ditto in ditto.

726. Ship Greenwich, 338 tons, 10 guns, 25 men, captured by ditto in ditto.

727. Ship Hector, 270 tons, 11 guns, 25 men, captured by the Essex junior, in the south sea.

728. Ship Catharine, 270 ton, 8 guns, 29 men, captured by ditto in ditto.

729. Ship Rose, 220 tons, 8 guns, 21 men, captured by ditto in ditto.

¶ These vessels are estimated, as worth to the enemy, two millions of dollars. See commander Porter's official letters, page 263. We have reason to believe that they are not all the vessels that Porter has captured.

The destiny of the Creeks.

The invariable attack upon fort Mims, and subsequent slaughter of the garrison, with all the women and children, in the whole about 500 persons, only seventeen of whom made their escape, has already been registered. A letter to the editor, dated at Tombigbee, contains many particulars of that horrible massacre by the Creeks, as well as some pointed remarks on the character of the savages—both which, as they belong to the enquiry, shall be noticed.

The letter says—the fort was attacked by 725 Indians, with great fury, at 12 o'clock in the day; they were entirely naked, except a flap; they rushed up to the port holes, and disputed the possession with those within, and finally prevailed; the women were butchered, then stripped and subjected to every brutal indignity that the savages could think of. Indeed there was a refinement of horror that ought to be mentioned; pregnant women were cut open; and the unborn infant taken out of them and tomahawked!—Many of the women had two scalps taken from them, and numerous instances were afforded that several savages had assisted in the murder of an individual. The report of the party that returned from burying the dead, rivals any that the history of the Indian affords; but decorum forbids a full statement of what they beheld. It is a tale of terror.

The writer then goes on to describe the savages of the Creeks, through a great extent of country, lately flourishing and happy, and filling with an industrious population. "To those who never beheld people flying from the savages, it would be useless to attempt to convey the picture." A solitary farm house did not remain in the possession of the owner; every thing was abandoned; and the few persons that remained were cooped up in two small forts, surrounded by the blood-thirsty allies of the "Sunder of the faith!" The tomahawk of the savage and torch of Cockburn, a more atrocious finished the work of death and destruction. All the settlements are laid waste. The savages received their ammunition from the governor of PENNSYLVANIA, in consequence of an order from the British in Canada.

These facts are notorious and indisputable—Such were the doings of the Creeks, and such the agency of the British government in their murders.

Our indignant correspondent adds—

"This account will be read as the many we have received from the west, and the sensation on the mass of men produced by the recital will be only the same—but a most important—an awfully important question or two flashes on the mind of every reflecting man. IS THIS THE NATION OF INDIANS WITH WHOM THE GOVERNMENT HAS BEEN, THROUGH COLONEL BENJAMIN HAWKINS, NOW ABOUT SIXTEEN YEARS ENGAGED IN THE WORK OF CIVILIZATION? Is this the nation of whom the colonel has made so many reports of their high state of civilization? Is this the nation of savages on whom thousands have been expended, produced by the labor and sweat of our citizens? And, good God! is this the point at which they have arrived? Even gratitude to a benefactor has not yet been infused into their breasts? Even regard for the female character is unknown amongst them. Without a single provocation, in the moment while they are receiving the benevolence of our government, they fly to the assistance of our enemies. They take advantage of the moment of our distress to plunder, murder, burn and destroy, our country. Since the commencement of our government to the present day, there has always been a number of persons, well and practically acquainted with the savage character, who have smiled at the benevolent but weak attempt of our system for the civilization of savages. They viewed it as the production of the closet, generated with brains of speculative theorists. If the subject is not now at rest it never can be decided. If after sixteen years we cannot secure even the friendship of a nation of savages, if we cannot give existence to the most common effects of the slightest degree of civilization, when are we to expect to make any impression on them? Or is the whole attempt a farce?"

"Among the party who committed the before-mentioned massacre, were a number of Indians, nay, hundreds, who spoke the English language, had a constant intercourse with the whites, and many of them were raised among the white people.

"At this moment a medal chief of the Choctaw nation is soliciting to be employed with his nation by the white people; for he says his warriors cannot be restrained; and if we do not employ them they must fight for somebody. This is another nation we are engaged in civilizing!"

We sincerely lament that these remarks appear too strongly buttressed by truth, in the facts that have happened, to have their force weakened by philanthropy; but we cannot regret that the attempt was made to render this people happy. The scheme of humanity, that began with Washington, that was patronized by Adams, and zealously extended and encouraged by Jefferson and Madison, has COMPLETELY FAILED, through the native propensity of the Indians to rapine, and the universal disposition of Britain to encourage it. Colonel Hawkins had persuaded himself; (and I apprehend sincerely believed) that the Creeks had made great progress in civilization, as well in their sentiments as in their manner of life. Many of them were regular farmers; the men labored in the field, the women plied the wheel and the shuttle at home. Schools, apparently well attended, had been established; one half of the various tribes known by the general name of Creeks, spoke the English language; and very few of them and altogether refused to adopt the habits of civilized man. Much time, labor and money had been spent upon them—their lands and rights had been carefully guarded—they are without excuse, for they had nothing to complain of. They listened to the serpent, and became the murderers of their benefactors—the horrible assassins of women and children. The vile nation that contrived the partition of France, and that inveigled or bullied Holland, Switzerland, Sardeina, Tuscany, the pope, Naples, many states of Germany; and, indeed, that has been in alliance and at war with every nation of Europe, protestant, Catholic or Mahometan, no matter what, within a few years, France only excepted!—that has brought about the utter extinction of many, and deluged the whole with rivers of blood, for her commerce—has also machinated the destruction of the Creeks; and with it annihilated the hope of humanity, that, through justice and benevolence, they might be civilized.—Let the British "bible societies," the "societies for propagating the gospel among the heathens," and other like institutions, examine this matter!

If the United States have not "commanded success" in their persevering attempts to ameliorate the condition of the Indian, they have, at least, "deserved" it;—but, having failed, self-preservation requires, and justice sanctions, the adoption of a new course.

From the three victories obtained over the Creeks, (where the existing were spared) and the powerful body of troops that are in their country, we consider the war as finished; for the wretches have no back country to fly to, to escape the vengeance due them. If they are received by the Spaniards in Florida, they will be pursued; if they are protected, a common cause will be made against both—for it is impossible that the Spaniards can be permitted to proceed in the diabolical course Great Britain has directed. What shall be done with them? We cannot reconcile ourselves to the extermination of them, however just the retaliation might be; nor should we banish them from the land of their ancestors to the wilds of the Mississippi, where they might hereafter perplex us—or become extinct through their wars with the tribes in possession, for the right of soil. We should be "angry with them but sin not;" and carry our resentment no further than our safety requires.

Their country is ours by every principle of the natural or civil law, and we have a right to prescribe the terms on which they shall reside in it.—Let these be as lenient as possible, so that peace shall finally destroy the savage spirit that humanity vainly strove to subdue. Their whole population, before the war, did not, perhaps, exceed 25,000 souls—but their territory, among which is large tracts of the finest land in the world, would support millions of civilized men. Suppose small tracts, slips of land, not more than 10 or 15 miles wide, were reserved for them, with intervals 20 or 30 miles wide, to be settled by the whites! The spaces allotted would be more than an hundred times sufficient for them as agriculturalists, but not enough as hunters; and they would be compelled, more or less, to attend to husbandry. This, in time, would ameliorate their manners; and though they might commit some petty depredations on their neighbors, they never could do extensive mischief; and they might, generally, govern themselves by their own laws with a few simple regulations to secure good order between them and the people of their vicinity. Some provision should be made for the ultimate right of the reserved land, by prescribing on what conditions the Indian title may become extinct; but forbidding that they themselves should dispose of it, without the consent of the United States. The hourly intercourse they would have with the white people, and their detached situation, might, in a few years, totally eradicate their savage propensities, and finally incorporate them with the body of the people. As Indians, they would decrease; and, if scattered in society, could have no effect upon it.

This project I think reasonable and rightful—and may, at least, afford some idea to the many persons enquiring, "what shall be done with the Creeks."

Proceedings of Congress.

Many private petitions were presented and referred.

A message in writing was received from the president of the United States, which the speaker declared to be of a confidential nature. The galleries were accordingly cleared, and the doors closed; but were again opened in a few minutes. And the house adjourned.

Friday, Dec. 10.—After many private petitions and some local affairs had been presented to the house, the galleries were cleared and so remained till five o'clock, when the house adjourned.

Saturday, Dec. 11.—The house sat with closed doors from eleven o'clock in the morning until nine at night.

Monday, Dec. 12.—The house adjourned a little after twelve o'clock after receiving some private petitions, &c.

Tuesday, Dec. 13.—Some private petitions were presented and referred.

Mr. Desha submitted the following resolutions; which passed—

Resolved, That the committee of claims be instructed to enquire into the expediency of paying for the waggons and horses, that have been left in the public service.

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to enquire into the expediency of paying for the horses lost by the volunteers who turned out under his excellency Isaac Shelby, governor of the commonwealth of Kentucky, on the Canada expedition last fall; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to enquire into the expediency of paying the mounted volunteers who turned out under his excellency, Isaac Shelby, governor of the commonwealth of Kentucky, on the Canada expedition last fall, additional pay for their horses furnished; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. Wright moved the following resolution.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire into the expediency of providing by an act of congress an uniform mode of electing senators, representatives to congress, and electors of president and vice-president.

The resolution was adopted, and referred to a committee of seven members.

Thursday, Dec. 15.—No business of importance transacted.

THE CHRONICLE.

The legislature of Pennsylvania met at Harrisburg on the 7th instant. P. C. Lane was elected speaker of the senate, and Robert Smith speaker of the house of representatives.

The war between the whigs and Tories of Chili yet prevails. The former, in general, possess the courts, but the royal troops are pretty numerous in the interior. They have, however, been much reduced by several late battles with the patriots, who have severely beaten them.

The Boston Patriot of the 8th instant says, "it is so warm and pleasant that many thousand sheep, merran, mixed and common, are browsing all round Boston."

The steam-boat Vesuvius, 140 feet keel, 400 tons burthen, has been launched at Pittsburg, designed as a regular trader between the falls of Ohio and New Orleans! Another of the like dimensions will soon be off the stocks!

James Barbour, esq. has been re-elected governor of Virginia. For Mr. Burbour 133. For Mr. James Pleasants 53. The latter was not a candidate.

MARYLAND ELECTION.—On Monday last, Levin Winder, esq. (ed.) was re-elected governor of Maryland, for the ensuing year.

As some time ago stated that the executive of Maryland would be changed, it becomes us to show how the result is different. When the temper of the people is a little moderated by time, and we are less pressed for room than at present, the facts and papers that belong to this interesting procedure shall be recorded. The following may suffice for the moment:
